FOREWORD

This two-volume Legislative History of the National Labor Relations Act of 1935 is part of a collection of publications reprinted in 1985 on the 50th anniversary of the Act. The other publications in this reprint series are: the two-volume Legislative History of the Labor Management Relations Act of 1947, the two-volume Legislative History of the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act of 1959, and the four-volume set of the Annual Reports of the National Labor Relations Board from 1936 through 1960.

The republication of these documents will assure their ready availability for legal and historical research into the National Labor Relations Act.

NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD

THURSDAY, MARCH 21, 1935

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION AND LABOR,
Washington, D. C.

The committee met, pursuant to adjournment, at 10:30 a. m., in room 318, Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C. Senator David I. Walsh (presiding).

Present: Senators Walsh (chairman), Murray, and Metcalf.

Present also: Senator Robert F. Wagner.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will please come to order.

Mr. Harnischfeger, will you please come forward and give your full name?

Mr. HARNISCHFEGER. My name is Walter Harnischfeger.

The CHAIRMAN. You reside in Milwaukee, Wis.?

Mr. HARNISCHFEGER. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. Whom are you representing here?

Mr. HARNISCHFEGER. I am a director of the National Manufacturers' Association, a director of the Milwaukee Chamber of Commerce, and I belong to the National Metal Trades Association of Milwaukee.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you representing all of those organizations before this committee?

Mr. HARNISCHFEGER. I am.

The CHAIRMAN. You appear in opposition to the bill now before this committee?

Mr. HARNISCHFEGER. Yes; I do.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you a prepared statement you would like to submit to the committee?

Mr. HARNISCHFEGER. I have.

The CHAIRMAN. We will be glad to receive it and put it in the record, you agreeing to present it in the form of a brief, rather than in oral argument.

Mr. HARNISCHFEGER. Yes; that is correct.

STATEMENT OF WALTER HARNISCHFEGER, MILWAUKEE, WIS.

Mr. HARNISCHFEGER. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, in addition to representing the associations I have above named, I am president of the Harnischfeger Corporation, which is engaged in the manufacture of heavy machinery and industrial products. Our plant extends over 35 acres and employs in normal time about 1,800 full-time workers. At present we have about 850 workers on our pay roll, some, however, on part time. The company was started by my father with a mere handful of workers 50 years ago, and during that period could only have grown to its present size by according all workers fair treatment in matters of wages, conditions of work, and opportunities for advancement and larger earnings, and by scrupulous observance and regard for the workers' welfare.

As the representative of such an organization, I am appearing before this committee to register my emphatic opposition to the Wagner labor disputes bill now being heard, and to assign some reasons for that opposition.

In the first place, my opposition is grounded upon the broad general objection that there is no universal demand or necessity for such one-sided legislation at present, and moreover that it seeks to impose Federal regulation and control over a matter that is reserved to and should very properly be exercised by the States.

Specifically, the provisions of the bill will operate to provoke and encourage labor disputes, rather than diminish them, as is the declared purpose of the bill. Its real effect will be to serve as a vehicle for the advancement of the selfish interests of minority labor organizations. That the membership of such organizations constitutes but a small minority of the workers of the country is conceded by every thinking person, and amply supported by the results of elections in the automobile industry's plants. On the premise that this bill is for the benefit of such organizations and in practice of no benefit to workers or industry, it is nothing more than class legislation.

The definition of unfair trade practices is arbitrary, ill-advised, and utterly lacking in mutuality. The practices condemned, if they are, in fact, unfair, should be prohibited to labor as well as employers. Our experience in Wisconsin in the Kohler Co. and other labor disputes leaves no doubt that organized labor in a certain form follows and is committeed to a policy of coercion, yet the bill embraces no prohibition of that unfair trade practice.

The proposed bill seems to be premised on the indisputable assumption that all so-called " company unions " are vicious per se. A mere statement of that assumption demonstrates its inaccuracy and fallacy.

The bill seeks to enact into permanent law the much discussed " majority rule " in labor relations. This rule is wrong in principle and in practice in that it operates to impose majority representation and views upon a minority, and thereby effectually deprive the workers constituting such minority of their freedom of action in matters of bargaining.

It creates one more permanent board with its attendant expenses, thereby constituting a vehicle for further Government participation in and control of intrastate business contrary to constitutional warrant.

The powers invested in such board are arbitrary and so broad that the board in reality takes on dictatorial powers.

Relief from the orders of such board—that is to say, by petition to circuit courts of appeal—will, of necessity, involve so much time and burdensome expense and effort, that for all practical purposes it can be said that the bill denies relief by appeal to persons aggrieved.

This measure is the second attempt to secure legislation which would in effect impose universal unionism in industry. The original effort of March 1, 1934, never came to vote, but was replaced by Public Resolution No. 44 which created the National Labor Relations Board for a period of 1 year, expiring June 16 next.

The current bill seeks to create a permanent National Labor Relations Board of three members, salaries $10,000 yearly each, each appointed from the public irrespective of possible partisanship, which would be empowered to enforce, through the Federal courts, prohibitions against a long line of unfair labor practices.

This measure contains all of the objectionable features of its predecessor, which impelled industry to marshal a great organized national protest against its passage. Whitney H. Eastman, then president of the Milwaukee Association of Commerce, appeared before the Senate hearing committee to present emphatic testimony against it.

The bill would make it unlawful for employers to " interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of ", the " right to self-organization to form, join, or assist labor organizations, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and to engage in concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection."

Judging by the decisions of the present labor board, it is understood that this would give employees the legal right to " assist " labor organizations by means of sympathetic strikes, picketing, boycotting, and other coercive activities; that employees would have the legal right to force employers to " bargain " with them—the Board having ruled that there is no bargaining unless there is a contract.

Since the employer is restricted from " discharging or otherwise discriminating against any employee who has filed charges or given testimony ", the employee is practically licensed to malign his employer, engage in campaigns to incite unrest, and conduct himself in such a way as to make it impossible to maintain morale and discipline in the plant.

A number of " unfair labor practices " are enumerated—certain of which are already forbidden by the N. I. R. A.—which place great restraint upon employers—with none whatsoever as applied to organized labor. This expresses the real purpose of the measure against which industry protests.

It prevents employee organization, except as recognized units of approved organizations, and prohibits the employer from contributing in any way to the organization of his employees independently, thus outlawing company unions on the theory that they are employer-controlled. The employer is permitted, however, to make agreements with an approved organization for a closed shop—the approved organizations to date being affiliates of the American Federation of Labor.

The bill provides that the board may order and conduct elections among employees, certify the names of representatives for collective bargaining and permanently establish the majority rule. This means that employers may be legally compelled to negotiate with professional labor organizers, and independent employees forced to join labor unions at the peril of losing their jobs.

Employers' violations of the provisions of the measure could be construed as impeding or interfering with the board or its agents in the performance of its duties, and made punishable by a fine of $5,000, imprisonment for a year, or both. The findings of the board as to the facts, if supported by any evidence whatever, would become conclusive and final, not subject to being disturbed by any court. These provisions we regard as unwarranted and un-American.

For these reasons and in the interest of all concerned, the organizations which I represent strongly urge that this legislation be not passed.

The CHAIRMAN. The next witness to appear before us is Mr. Emery. Would you come forward, Mr. Emery, and let us have for the record your name, and whom you represent in this legislation?

STATEMENT OF JAMES A. EMERY, GENERAL COUNSEL, NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF MANUFACTURERS

Mr. EMERY. My full name is James A. Emery, and my position is that of general counsel, National Association of Manufacturers of the United States, representing by their authority in opposition to the proposal before you, the following associations:

Associated Industries of Alabama, Birmingham, Ala.
California Manufacturers Association, San Francisco, Calif.
Colorado Manufacturers & Merchants Association, Denver, Colo.
Manufacturers Association of Connecticut, Hartford, Conn.
Manufacturers Association of Wilmington, Wilmington, Del.
Associated Industries of Florida, Jacksonville, Fla.
Georgia Manufacturers Association, Atlanta, Ga.
Illinois Manufacturers Association, Chicago, Ill.
Indiana Manufacturers Association, Indianapolis, Ind.
Iowa Manufacturers Association, Des Moines, Iowa.
Associated Industries of Kansas, Topeka, Kans.
Associated Industries of Kentucky, Louisville, Ky.

The CHAIRMAN. How many associations are there, approximately?

Mr. EMERY. There are about 50, I think, representing altogether between 60,000 and 70,000 employers of labor in the United States, chiefly in the manufacturing industries, and employing at the present time from 2,000,000 to 2,250,000 men. The figures are somewhat difficult to get under the existing circumstances, but that is an approximate estimate.

The first day of spring, Mr. Chairman, is marked by consideration of an exotic in legislation, which we trust will find little favor in your cultivated consideration.

This bill is the lineal descendant or successor in interest of S. 2926, introduced by Mr. Wagner, March 1, 1934, thereafter amended, subject to elaborate hearings before this committee between March 14 and April 9, 1934, and, in modified form, reported to the Senate May 26. It differs in many material respects from the original proposal and the measure reported by this committee. It contains all its original errors and no remedial improvement either from the hearings, the concessions to argument made by its distinguished author, the modifications made by this committee and reported to the Senate, or the continuing decisions of the courts which, during the past year, have had many occasions to consider and pass upon the principles involved in the measure before you.

What does the pending bill undertake to do, how does it undertake to do it, and how does it differ from the original measure or that submitted to the Senate? We must assume, in an examination of the measure, that changes made in the bill, in the light of criticism and report, are deliberate. Opportunity for mature consideration gives an air of determined purpose to proposals in the light of a year's consideration.

This bill, as we see it, proposes the creation of a National Labor Relations Board as distinguished from the National Industrial Adjustment Board, originally proposed. The Board is now to consist of three members appointed by the President, with the consent of the Senate, where formerly it was to have been composed of 9 members, 3 of whom represented the public, the remaining 6 being drawn from panels respectively of employers and employees. The former measure, as reported, defined four forms of what were termed "unfair labor practices." Such practices, when threatening to lead to a labor dispute that might affect commerce or obstruct its flow, became the subject of notification by the Secretary of Labor to the Board, which thereupon issued and caused to be served upon the employer engaged in such practice a complaint requiring him to appear at a time and place fixed by the Board to answer thereto. The Board possessed the power to amend this complaint prior to the conclusion of taking evidence, while the person complained of was given the right and opportunity to file an answer to the original or amended complaint, to have the assistance of the Board in procuring witnesses, the Board possessing the authority to require the production of testimony and the presence of witnesses. If the complaint were sustained, the Board issued a cease and desist order directed to the unfair practice, and, upon failure to obey, undertook to enforce its order through appeal to the Circuit Court of Appeals in the circuit wherein the practice occurred or the defendant resided. The defendant possessed an equal right to review, through the same court, the Board's finding of fact, when sustained by evidence, being conclusive. Neither the original nor the reported bill conform to the declaration of the President of March 1934:

> The Government makes clear that it favors no particular union or particular form of employee organization or representation. The Government's only duty is to secure absolute and uninfluenced freedom of choice without coercion, restraint, or intimidation from any source.

In the consideration of the measure last year, which the committee gave such extended attention, the distinguished Senator from New York, when his attention was called to the propriety of prohibiting coercion from any source, frankly declared, "I think the act ought to be amended just as you suggest; that is, intimidation, when it comes from any source, either a trade organization or a company union, or an employer, ought to be made an unfair labor practice", so we were in agreement on that, and I trust we still are.

Senator WAGNER. No; we are not.

Mr. EMERY. The Senator has changed his mind then with regard to his own suggestion?

Senator WAGNER. The chairman of this committee, by his statement on the floor last June, did as much as anybody to cause me to change my mind about that observation, and I think he is absolutely right. As we study these things reflectively we do change our minds at times.

Mr. EMERY. The bill reported declared it to be an unfair practice for employees to interfere with or coerce employers to the same extent and in the same manner that employers were prohibited from interfering with employees in forming employer organizations or designating representatives.

That is left out of the proposal which is now before this committee.

The pending bill establishes a permanent board of three members, appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. It is empowered to prevent any person from engaging in any unfair labor practice "affecting commerce." The unfair practices defined include interference, or restraint or coercion of employees, interference with the right of self-organization, formation, membership in or assistance to labor organizations, collective bargaining through representatives of their own choosing, and engagement in concerted activities or other mutual aid or protection. A second unfair labor practice is domination or interference with any labor organization or financial contribution or other support to it. The employer is permitted, subject to the rules of the Board, to permit employees to confer with him during working hours without loss of pay. That permission does not extend to conference among themselves specifically permitted in the old bill and stricken from the new. Discrimination in regard to hire, tenure, or any term or condition of employment, to encourage or discourage membership in any labor organization is forbidden, with an exception permitting agreement with any labor organization making condition of membership in it a prerequisite of employment if it represents a majority of the employees in the collective bargaining unit covered by the agreement. A proviso expressly denying that the employer is bound to enter upon such agreements is omitted from the pending bill.

With respect to the determination of representatives and elections, the new and the old proposal differ essentially. The former establishes as a rule of substantive law, majority representation for all employees for collective bargaining, to the exclusion of individuals and minorities. The old bill authorized the Board only in a dispute threatening to "affect" commerce to investigate and determine who were authorized representatives or to hold an election for that purpose and determine the majority in an appropriate unit of employment.

With the exception of thus determining in a dispute who were the authorized representatives of employees, the old bill limited the power of investigation and authority to issue subpenas to the production of evidence relating to any matter "under complaint" and limited the amendment of complaints to the period during the taking of evidence, and specifically provided for the right to file an answer to the original or amended complaint. The new bill, by section 6 (b), section 10, and section 13, not only grants the power of subpena with respect to the investigation of complaints pending before the board but a general authority of inquisition, including examination at will of books, records, and persons, plans of employment, and employment relations generally, but may amend complaints pending before the board at any time before it issues orders, without provision for notice or hearing on the amended complaint.

The new bill further provides and authorizes the board not merely to enforce cease-and-desist orders but to provide for affirmative action, in its discretion, including restitution. Its cease-and-desist orders are not only enforceable on application to the Circuit Court of Appeals, to which the defendant has equal access for review, but it may appeal to the District Court of the United States, through each district attorney, for restraint of alleged unfair practices. Its orders dismissing complaints are subject to judicial review on the application of the aggrieved complainants equally with its orders sustaining complaints, all of which provisions were unknown to the former bill.

The last is a novel and interesting suggestion.

Those, Mr. Chairman, are the major essential differences between the bill reported by this committee last year, and the bill which is now before it. It is to these essential things that I beg to direct your attention.

With respect to its legal features, if we may discuss those first—because much water has gone over the dam, and I trust the chairman will pardon me for referring to the bill reported out as the "old" bill, when in fact it is only a year old, but the period of a year is now a long time in the history of the United States.

We assert the bill is unsound in law and policy:

1. Because in terms and operating effect it undertakes to regulate local employment relations arising out of acts of production under the guise of regulating commerce. Such acts of production and the employment relations arising out of them are reserved to the States under the tenth amendment and denied to the Congress.

2. Assuming for the moment the validity of the method of regulation prescribed, the procedure provided denies due process of law by permitting amendment and enforcement of a complaint without notice to the defendant and permits him to be deprived of valuable rights of liberty and property and damages to be assessed him by orders issued upon amended complaints for which no notice is provided, no opportunity to be heard is given, and by which ultimate orders may be formulated upon declarations of which he has no knowledge. It is equally a denial of due process to authorize an administrative body, even though it were otherwise validly established, to take evidence without regard to established rules of law and to undertake to make findings of fact, founded upon such alleged evidence, conclusive upon a reviewing court.

3. The bill violates the fourth amendment, which guarantees against unreasonable searches and seizures by the inquisitorial power which it grants to the board, its members, and agents, to have access to books, records, and persons, in the absence of any judicial proceeding or any administrative proceeding which it may be authorized to conduct.

4. It violates the seventh amendment by the provisions of section 10 (d), which undertake to authorize the executive body to assess damages, require restitution, and make its findings of fact in such regard conclusive upon the courts.

5. It violates the judiciary section (article III, sec. 1) in that it undertakes to give an executive or administrative body judicial authority in passing final judgment on questions involving matters of civil right, rights of person and property, and make the same enforceable through proceedings in equity in district courts of the United States.

Those are the major propositions I beg to call to the attention of the committee, because we realize they, the members of the committee, have taken a deliberate oath to sustain and enforce the Constitution of the United States. If they are in doubt as to whether, as agents, they may exercise power which is assumed to have been granted to them, they will resolve that doubt before they proceed to act.

I am not going to bore this committee with any lengthy discussion of the first proposition. Its outlines are familiar to this committee. For the past year we have heard much discussion of the extent and nature of the commerce power. I think it agreed among lawyers, and among all legislators that the commerce power is something distinctly different from the power to control and regulate the circumstances and incidents of production; that the commerce power extends to the regulation of intercourse between citizens of the various States and foreign nations and the regulation of the means by which that intercourse is carried on.

I think the state of the law may be well expressed placed in a short phrase repeatedly used by the Supreme Court of the United States, that the control of Congress extends to those acts and things which substantially and directly affect that intercourse. For these it may prescribe the rules.

Commerce is an entirely distinct and separate thing from production in all its forms and from the relations which arise out of the circumstances of production.

The CHAIRMAN. The same question you are arguing now is being argued again before the Finance Committee on the scope of the N. R. A.

Mr. EMERY. It is, and it will now be argued in the Supreme Court of the United States within this month, in an important case now pending before it.

The CHAIRMAN. What case is that?

Mr. EMERY. That is the so-called "Belcher" case, being an appeal from a demurrer sustained by Judge Grubb in the United States District Court of Alabama, the allegations being the general violation of a provision of the Lumber Code with respect to minimum wages and maximum hours. That is at issue before the Supreme Court of the United States. It is docketed for the month of March, and it seems in all likelihood it will be argued by the first of next month, or the end of this month.

I should think the committee would hesitate to act in matters pending, with cases before the Supreme Court of the United States which will have the effect of finally settling issues involved, if there can be doubt about the answer to the principles of this bill in view of the continuous line of decisions for the past 75 years in which the Court has never hesitated in its distinction between commerce and production, or failed to recognize the fact that manufacture does not extend to commerce and must be concluded before commerce can begin.

No more interesting illustration of this principle can be found, Mr. Chairman, than in a case I beg to call to your attention, decided in the past 2 years by a unanimous Court, that is the case of Utah Power & Light Co. v. Pfost in 286 U. S. 163. It illustrates the distinction very clearly. The Court, after 75 years, still expresses itself in the same language with respect to the distinction between commerce and manufacture, the control of one being in the hands of the State and the control of the other in the hands of Congress. In that case a power company was taxed by the State of Utah upon the production of electrical energy. It resisted the tax on the ground that the energy was delivered in the State of Idaho, flowing in commerce from Utah, and any attempt upon the part of that State to tax it would obviously be a burden on that commerce.

The Supreme Court pointed out that the flow of energy from the stream was mechanical in its nature, and upon passing through the transformer was changed into electrical energy, and that transformation was as much a part of the manufacture as the transformation of a piece of leather hide into shoes, therefore what the State of Utah had done was to tax the act of manufacture, which in no way interfered with the subsequent flow of energy into the different States as an article of commerce. That is typical of 75 years of continuous distinction on this point.

Now, instead of calling the committee's attention to a list of decisions which could easily fill 3 or 4 pages of your already ample record, I prefer to call your attention to an opinion by a very distinguished lawyer who several years ago had occasion to call attention to them, no less personage than the present Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States.

In 1926 he was counsel for the American Petroleum Institute, and on that occasion he delivered an opinion before the Federal Oil Conservation Board at a public hearing in Washington on May 27, 1926.

The question awaiting his answer was: Could the Federal Government regulate the production of petroleum in the different States, either as a part of the commerce power, or under the general welfare clause, or under any other power. Mr. Hughes was advising his client in public in presenting his views at that time, and I will say a lawyer of his distinction, integrity, and sincerity can hardly be presumed to have held an opinion then which he would be unlikely to hold now. He does not happen to belong to that class of practitioners of law whose opinions change to fit the circumstances with which they are confronted or the clients who happen to engage them.

I call this opinion to the committee's attention and ask that it be inserted in the record. I think this discussion of all of the principles here involved is uniquely applicable to this legislation and proceeds from an authoritative source, because he has discussed the different cases in this opinion that I would want to place before the committee, and it will avoid the necessity of calling the committee's attention to a long variety of cases which could be discussed to illustrate the principles to which I have reference.

Mr. Hughes said:

> Petroleum lies beneath the surface of the earth. The territory now under consideration is a part of the domain of the State over which the State has sovereign jurisdiction and control except as the State power is limited by the Federal Constitution. Production is not commerce, and the production of petroleum within a State is not interstate commerce. The case of petroleum in this respect appears to be the same as that of coal. As to coal, the Supreme Court in the United States, by Chief Justice Taft, said upon this point in the United Mine Workers of America v. Coronado Coal Co. (259 U. S. 407, 408):
> "Coal mining is not interstate commerce, and the power of Congress does not extend to its regulation as such." In Hammer v. Dagenhart (247 U. S. 251, 272) we said: "The making of goods and the mining of coal are not commerce, nor does the fact that these things are to be afterward shipped or used in interstate commerce make their production a part thereof." Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Yurkonis (238 U. S. 439). Obstruction to coal mining is not a direct obstruction to interstate commerce in coal, although it, of course, may affect it by reducing the amount of coal to be carried in that commerce.
> Again, it was said by the Supreme Court of the United States in Oliver Iron Mining Co. v. Lord (262 U. S. 171, 178):
> "Mining is not interstate commerce, but like manufacturing it is a local business, subject to local regulation and taxation." Kidd v. Pearson (128 U. S. 1, 20); Capital City Dairy Co. v. Ohio (U. S. 439, 444); Hammer v. Dagenhart (247 U. S. 251, 272); United Mine Workers v. Coronado Coal Co. (259 U. S. 344, 410). Its character in this regard is intrinsic, is not affected by the intended use or disposal of the product, is not controlled by contractual engagements, and persists even though the business be conducted in close connection with interstate commerce. Cornell v. Coyne (192 U. S. 418); Browning v. Waycross (233 U. S. 16, 22); Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Yurkonis (238 U. S. 439, 444); General R. Signal Co. v. Virginia (246 U. S. 500); Hammer v. Dagenhart (247 U. S. 251, 272); Arkadelphia Mill Co. v. St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. (249 U. S. 134, 151); Crescent Cotton Oil Co. v. Mississippi (247 U. S. 129, 136); Heisler v. Thomas Colliery Co. (260 U. S. 245).
> The ore does not enter interstate commerce until after the mining is done.

Again, in Ohio Oil Co. v. Indiana (177 U. S. 190, 211), it is said:

"In view of the fact that regulations of natural deposits of oil and gas and the right of the owner to take them as an incident of title in fee to the surface of the earth, as said by the Supreme Court of Indiana, is ultimately but a regulation of real property, and they must hence be treated as relating to the preservation and protection of rights of an assentially local character."

It may therefore be safely taken for granted that, under the power to regulate commerce, Congress has no constitutional authority to control the mere production of petroleum on lands (other than the Indian lands) within the territory of a State. All plans for requiring unit operation or otherwise, which involve the assertion of such an authority on the part of Congress, do not require discussion. They proceed from an utterly erroneous conception of Federal power. It does not further the policy of conservation to take up the public attention with futile proposals which disregard the essential principles of our system of government.

I am aware that it has been suggested that such Federal power to control production within the States might be asserted by Congress because it could be deemed to relate to the provision for the common defense and the promotion of the general welfare.

Reference is sometimes made, in support of this view, to the words of the preamble of the Federal Constitution. But as Story says:

"The preamble never can be resorted to, to enlarge the powers confided to the general Government or any of its departments. It cannot confer any power per se; it can never amount by implication, to an enlargement of any power expressly given." (1 Story on the Constitution, sec. 462.)

And this statement was approved by the Supreme Court of the United States in Jacobson v. Massachusetts (196 U. S. 11, 22), where it was said:

"Although that preamble indicates the general purposes for which the people obtained and established the Constitution, it has never been regarded as the source of any substantive power conferred on the Government of the United States, or any of its departments. Such powers embrace only those expressly granted in the body of the Constitution, and such as may be implied from those so granted. Although, therefore, one of the declared objects of the Constitution was to secure the blessings of liberty to all under the sovereign jurisdiction and authority of the United States, no power can be exerted to that end by the United States, unless delegation of power, or in some power to be properly implied therefrom." (1 Story on the Constitution, sec. 462.)

The suggestion to which I have referred is an echo of an attempt to construe article I, section 8, subdivision 1, of the Constitution of the United States, not as a power "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States", but as conferring upon Congress two distinct powers, to wit, (1) the power of taxation and (2) the power to provide for the common defense and the general welfare. In this view, it has been urged that Congress has the authority to exercise any power that it might think necessary or expedient for the common defense or the other welfare of the United States. Of course, under such a construction, the Government of the United States would at once cease to be one of enumerated powers and the powers of the States would be wholly illusory and would be at any time subject to be controlled in any matter by the dominant Federal will exercised by Congress on the ground that the general welfare might thereby be advanced. That, however, is not the accepted view of the Constitution. (1 Story on the Constitution, secs. 907–908; 1 Willoughby on the Constitution, sec. 22.) The Government of the United States is one of enumerated powers and is not at liberty to control the internal affairs of the States, respectively, such as production within the States, through assertion by Congress of a desire either to provide for the common defense or to promote the general welfare.

This is too elementary to require discussion, and it is impossible to believe that the legal advisers of the board would suggest that it proceed on any different views.

Provision for governmental uses, to meet the needs of the United States as a proprietor, is quite distinct from an attempted regulation or curtailment of production within the States in a general public interest for the purpose of carrying out a policy of conserving oil in the ground so that it may await the economic needs of the country at large in the future. The latter would be the exercise not of the power to tax and to purchase for governmental uses but of a power to control production upon private property within the States and subject to the sovereignty of the States, respectively. It is not conceivable that any theory will be advanced by the legal advisers of the Government to support such a course of action however desirable a policy of conservation it may be deemed to be. It is idle under the Constitution to attempt to secure by Federal regulation the curtailment of production or to require unified operations in production by private owners within fields subject to the jurisdiction of the States.

The conservation of oils in the ground within such territory by governmental control of mere production, or the taking of oil out of the ground, is a question for the States so far as such control may constitutionally be exerted under our form of government.

I would like to call attention to the case of United Leather Workers International Union v. Herkert & Meisel Trunk Co., which was referred to by Mr. Hughes.

This was an endeavor to procure an injunction by a number of employers in the city of St. Louis, because of a strike called by the leather workers to enforce the demands they had made. They were sought to be enjoined on the ground that the strike had the effect of interfering with production, and therefore interfering with commerce, and consequently was in restraint of trade.

Mr. Justice Taft in sustaining the denial of the injunction on appeal to the Supreme Court, discussed at length the various issues which again are before this committee: Whether strikers, because incidental to the enforcement of their demands, by their withdrawal from their employment, lessens production—does that have such a direct effect upon commerce, because part of the goods which would otherwise have been produced had they been at work, would have moved into commerce—does that make their combination one in restraint of trade?

"If that be true," said Mr. Justice Taft in substance, in commenting on what the lower court had said, "then it would follow that every strike that restrained production that was intended to or might go into commerce between the States, would justify the constant interposition of the United States courts in the enforcement of the antitrust acts."

The CHAIRMAN. That is the very point Mr. Richberg has been arguing before the Finance Committee, claiming that for the purpose of administration of the N. R. A., interstate commerce prevails from the point of production to the outlet, and therefore the N. R. A. should be able to regulate service stations of gas companies, for instance, and department stores, because some of their goods purchased in one State are sold over the counter in another State.

Do you think that dictum of Mr. Justice Taft disposed of that argument?

Mr. EMERY. I am referring here solely to a case in which there is a labor dispute.

Senator WAGNER. Are you speaking of the Coronado case?

Mr. EMERY. No; I am referring to the case of United Leather Workers International Union v. Herkert & Meisel Trunk Co. (265 U. S. 457).

Senator WAGNER. You remember the second Coronado case?

Mr. EMERY. I remember both of them.

Senator WAGNER. In the second case the court held there was Federal jurisdiction because interference with production was apt to affect interstate commerce.

Mr. EMERY. If you will pardon me, it was not quite as loosely held as that.

Senator WAGNER. Everything that differs with your point of view is not loose.

Mr. EMERY. Not necessarily, but it often is.

Senator WAGNER. We will put it this way, then. The court did justify Federal intervention in a case which dealt only with the production of coal within a certain State. Isn't that it?

Mr. EMERY. No; that is not the fact upon which the opinion was predicated. I have the opinion here and will be glad to put it in the record if you desire.

Senator WAGNER. What were the facts?

Mr. EMERY. The Court held that the United Mine Workers, scattered all over the United States, was engaged in a combination, the purpose and effect of which was to restrict the mining of coal over a great area with the direct intention of preventing commerce in that coal. The Court said in that case it directly and substantially affected commerce, and it was the express intent of those engaged in the combination so to do. The Court distinguished it from the first case to which you refer in which the restraint of production was entirely local.

We have had a number of cases, and will have more in the future, where a combination of this nature will go to the extent that the effect of its acts to restrain commerce. A restraint of production in itself does not directly affect commerce.

The proposition that is involved before this committee is that a dispute, however small, between a single group of workers and an employer is said by the Labor Board as it operates today, to affect commerce. But it is so remote in its effect, Mr. Chairman, that it has nothing to do with commerce. It just reminds one of the nursery rhyme about "the flea in the hair of the tail of the dog of the child of the wife of the wild man of Borneo." That is about the relationship between the legal principle that is already said to be established, and the ultimate circumstances which this bill seeks to control.

Senator WAGNER. May I ask whether, in the event a particular dispute such as you mention should not burden or in any way affect interstate commerce, would it come within the jurisdiction of the Board? Does this legislation attempt to deal with any activity which neither affects nor burdens interstate commerce in some way? Why don't you answer that?

Mr. EMERY. I will, if you give me a chance.

Senator WAGNER. I am talking about this legislation.

Mr. EMERY. I may agree with you that certain activities are within the province of this legislation.

Senator WAGNER. Yes, but the impression you are trying to create is that we are trying to do something which is not authorized under the Constitution of the United States, while the bill itself is limited to those activities which affect interstate commerce.

Mr. EMERY. Yes; that may be a fact. The definition here of what effects commerce in your bill on page 4 is that it means "anything burdening or affecting commerce or obstructing the free flow of commerce, or having led, or tending to lead to a labor dispute that might burden or affect commerce or obstruct the free flow of commerce."

What the administrative body gets its jurisdiction from is the proposition that any dispute with respect to the "unfair practices" recited in this act that is of such a nature that it may "affect" interstate commerce. Therefore the board thus created for that purpose has jurisdiction over the dispute. However, I do not quibble over what they intend to do in the light of what has already been done.

Senator WAGNER. I do not want to quibble either, because I know we cannot agree on these matters. Our points of view are entirely different.

Mr. EMERY. You agreed with me last year, but you withdrew your agreement. I have done my best to agree with you.

Senator WAGNER. Let me ask you this: Do you know of a single Federal statute that has been declared unconstitutional on the ground that it was not justified under the interstate-commerce clause, in which Congress in the declaration of policy had found that the particular practice dealt with did interfere with commerce?

Mr. EMERY. I will directly call your attention to 17 cases that have been decided in the last year.

Senator WAGNER. Do you mean the Weirton case?

Mr. EMERY. I am referring to 17 cases decided in the district courts, of which that is one, that may go to the United States Supreme Court, or that will come there. When the Senator was a member of a lower court he had a higher respect for the inferior judiciary.

Senator WAGNER. I have studied some of those cases, none of which have yet been decided by the Supreme Court of the United States. I think some of the lower courts lack appreciation of the problems that confront us, and that they ignore many of the recent and more enlightened decisions of the United States Supreme Court upon the terfere with, or burden interstate commerce?

But can you answer my question? Do you know of any case in which the United States Supreme Court has set aside a congressional act in which Congress in the declaration of policy stated that the particular acts prohibited would, if permitted to go on, restrict, interfere with, or burden interstate commerce?

Mr. EMERY. Yes.

Senator WAGNER. What is the case?

Mr. EMERY. There is the case of Hill v. Wallace (259 U. S. 44).

Senator WAGNER. There was no such declaration in the act under which that case arose.

Mr. EMERY. The act itself undertook to regulate the local sale of future contracts in grain, on the ground it was regulating commerce. The Supreme Court held it was not, but it was undertaking to regulate contracts wholly within a State.

Senator WAGNER. Was there not a later case upon the same subject?

Mr. EMERY. There was, after Congress had corrected its error, and redrafted the statute which had been declared illegal, and reformed and reorganized it. Chicago Board of Trade v. Olsen (262 U. S. 1).

Senator WAGNER. In the first act there was no such declaration of policy; and the second act, in which Congress declared its policy, was upheld.

Mr. EMERY. It corrected the same declaration of policy.

In the employer liability acts Congress undertook to provide remedies for employees of carriers injured in interstate service. The Supreme Court asserted, in 207 U. S., a principle which I think is well worth calling attention to; that this act was a regulation of both intra and interstate commerce, just as in this bill you are undertaking to regulate relations that arise wholly out of occasions which are intrastate as distinguished from interstate commerce.

The case which answers the Senator's question very clearly is the Employment Liability case (207 U. S.), where the Court said:

> It remains only to consider the contention which we have previously quoted, that the act is constitutional, although it embraces subjects not within the power of Congress to regulate commerce, because one who engages in interstate commerce thereby submits all his business concerns to the regulating power of Congress. To state the proposition is to refute it. It assumes that because one engaged in interstate commerce he thereby endows Congress with power not delegated to it by the Constitution, in other words, with the right to legislate concerning matters if purely State concern. It rests upon the conception that the Constitution destroyed that freedom of commerce which it was its purpose to preserve, since it treats the right to engage in interstate commerce as a privilege which cannot be availed of except upon such conditions as Congress may prescribe, even although the conditions would be otherwise beyond the power of Congress. It is apparent that if the contention were well founded it would extend the power of Congress to every conceivable subject, however inherently local, would obliterate all the limitations of power imposed by the Constitution; and would destroy the authority of the States as to all conceivable matters which from the beginning have been, and must continue to be, under their control so long as the Constitution endures.

That is only one of many cases, and Child Labor cases are another, and commodity cases are another.

Senator WAGNER. There was no finding of a relationship to commerce in the Child Labor case.

Mr. EMERY. What has the declaration of policy to do with it?

Senator WAGNER. A great deal. Where it includes findings of fact by Congress, the Court will accept them unless they are unreasonable or arbitrary. Are you familiar with the Bedford Stone Cutters case?

Mr. EMERY. Very well; yes.

Senator WAGNER. The actual labor involved in that case was purely an intrastate transaction. The stone had been shipped from another State to the State of New York, and it had ceased to flow in interstate commerce. It had come to rest at the site of construction.

Mr. EMERY. Where did you say it was? Did I understand you to say it was in New York?

Senator WAGNER. Wherever it was, you know the case, and we will not quarrel about the location.

Mr. EMERY. I just wanted to be sure your geography was more accurate than your law.

Senator WAGNER. All right, wherever it was, the stone was at the place where the building was to be erected, and had ceased to flow in interstate commerce. Yet when the men who were members of a labor organization refused to work upon the stone because it had been manufactured in another State by nonunion labor, the court issued an injunction upon the ground that their action affected interstate commerce by interfering with prospective sales in interstate commerce. That extends interstate commerce pretty far.

Mr. EMERY. It would, if you stated the principle correctly!

Senator WAGNER. In that case you think the court was right because it happened to decide against the workers.

Mr. EMERY. I do not think the decision of the court rested on the grounds you state, because the principle there stated had long been applied to business combinations. It was merely the principle that restraint of trade may operate at either end of commerce, or restrain both ends. If it operates at both ends, it may restrain more effectively than if it operated at one end only.

In this case you present, that union had undertook to prevent interstate commerce in stone by denying it any use in Denver having failed to prevent production in Indiana. You may have a combination of businessmen who undertake to fix forbidden prices on either end, either by controlling production at one end, or distribution at the market. They may establish a monopoly at either end or both ends of the operation. They are more effective than if control were at one end. The principle is that the combination presented does not escape the touch of the law because it happens to be a combination to restrain production at one point and one to prevent use of the article on arrival.

Finally, I want to call attention to the fact that the effect of the restraining combination was to directly prevent interstate commerce, because here were goods shipped which a local combination at the other end prevented from being used.

That would apply to any kind of combination, whether labor or business. For all restraints of trade look alike to the law.

In that regard, the labor combination is excepted from the tendency to monopolize in the control of wages. That is entirely free from the law, whereas a combination to fix prices among businessmen would immediately come within the law, and very properly.

If I may return to the opinion of Mr. Hughes, which was put in the record, I see no occasion to comment upon it further, except to call attention to the fact that Mr. Hughes is emphasizing that the control of production and of the circumstances of that production are constitutionally beyond the control of Congress. All of the acts of production he recites are not commerce or a part of commerce. Indeed, commerce cannot begin until all the acts of production are concluded.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the date of that opinion?

Mr. EMERY. That was May 27, 1926, when he appeared as counsel for the American Petroleum Institute before the Federal Oil Conservation Board, the issue before them being how to formulate a policy for oil conservation for the purpose of control.

Since then he wrote the opinion in the Champlain Refining case in 286 U. S. 210, in which the oil conservation commission of Oklahoma was undertaking to control local production of oil to prevent waste, and the regulatory control was sustained as against the claim made in exactly the terms you used here, that any attempt to regulate the production of oil and prevent its flow would tend to affect, obstruct, or burden interstate commerce in oil.

In that case, Mr. Justice Hughes, speaking for the Court, pointed out that what was at issue was an attempt by a commission created by the State to control acts of production. It was undertaking to prevent waste; and the complete control of these acts of production was committeed to the State by the tenth amendment. It was a valid exercise of regulatory authority, did not burden commerce, and no commerce could be had in oil until the production itself was concluded.

I want especially to recommend to the committee's consideration Mr. Hughes' 1926 statement, because the distinguished Chief Justice not only deals with Congressional control of production, but takes up incidentally the other questions often met with, that is that power could be exercised by Congress by virtue of the general welfare clause, or by virtue of the preamble. He points out from a case that arose in Massachusetts that, of course, you do not look to the preamble for any grant of power.

I also call your attention to what he says as to the general welfare clause. After examining it, he points out the Government of the United States is one of enumerated powers, is not at liberty to control the internal affairs of any State, especially production in the State, notwithstanding any assertion by Congress of a desire to provide for defense or promote general welfare.

This statement is very complete, and it goes to the very root of the question raised in my first proposition to which I followed your attention.

Sentor WAGNER. I do not understand your contention. I think your contention would have some relevance if this law were in effect and the Labor Board undertook to take jurisdiction unjustifiably in some particular controversy. Then you might well contend that the Board has no jurisdiction in the particular case. But your argument that some particular hypothetical activity cannot in any way affect interstate commerce does not sustain your objection to this legislation.

Mr. EMERY. Mr. Chairman, the distinguished members of this committee are practical men, practical legislators. You are confronted with this practical situation, that the present National Labor Relations Board will expire by operation of law on the 16th of June unless its powers are continued.

You have heard the Chairman of that Board, you have heard its members, declaring it cannot fulfill its function because of lack of power. You are asked to give it necessary power. The bill presented to you now is to make permanent that body and permit it to continue to operate in the manner in which it has heretofore operated, and it has operated in the past in any labor dispute presented to it.

As practical men you are being asked to confer upon that body the power to determine whether or not the acts which are described here and which are incident to employment relations in local production can be placed under the control of an executive body by act of Congress.

To that we say it cannot be done without a very plain violation of what the courts have continuously held; that there can be no regulatory measures by Congress which attempt to control local production or the circumstances and relations which arise out of that production.

The CHAIRMAN. You claim this Board has never taken the position that any labor dispute brought to its attention was without its jurisdiction?

Mr. EMERY. The Board has never, in any labor dispute brought to it, considered the question of whether or not the dispute before it affected commerce. It always assumed it, just as the distinguished Senator from New York, when he was chairman of the Labor Board, held that any dispute coming before it was an alleged violation of section 7 (a).

The present Board exists under an Executive order of the President issued under the N. R. A. Act, plus Resolution 44.

The CHAIRMAN. You say the Labor Board has assumed every dispute that was brought before it was under interstate commerce?

Mr. EMERY. It has never examined the question of whether any dispute affected interstate commerce; it assumed it, or that it involved a violation of section 7 (a).

Here is an executive body to be created. It will be acutely sensitive about whether or not any dispute presented to it involves a violation of the so-called "unfair practice" acts. It would assume they affect commerce, and they would not go into that question very carefully.

Senator WAGNER. Mr. Chairman, I do not think I ought to omit saying to Mr. Emery that an aggrieved party, even under Resolution 44, has a right to court review if the Board essays jurisdiction in any case in which it has no authority to act.

Mr. EMERY. I beg pardon; under Resolution 44 the aggrieved party has no right of review except in the single instance of section 2 of the act, with regard to an election.

Senator WAGNER. Aside from elections, the Board has no power to enforce its decisions, so that any party who feels aggrieved can disobey the Board with absolute impunity. I propose to give the Board some power, and if it makes mistakes, the courts will correct them.

I know that you are against the philosophy of this bill, Mr. Emery, and you are free to present your viewpoint just as I present mine. But you are addressing yourself to a question which is not involved here unless this committee is going to decide these constitutional questions rather than have them decided when they come up under the act.

We cannot here tell what particular facts will be involved in every dispute before the Board, and it is only when the facts are known that one can determine whether interstate commerce is affected. You should save your discussion for the Board or the courts.

Mr. EMERY. Will you pardon me a moment, because I do not want this statement of yours to go by unchallenged. It is a very important statement. I know you would not intentionally make a statement of this kind unless you believe it to be true, and I think I can call to your attention that it does not represent a fact.

You say the party who is aggrieved by the act of the Labor Board at the present time has a remedy, and you say as far as he has no remedy, the Board has no power of enforcement, that the Board can make an investigation and come to conclusions, but they cannot enforce it, outside of calling elections. It is the chief complaint against the Board that it undertakes to enforce its authority by "extra-legal" methods and not in the manner provided in the statute under which it was created.

The CHAIRMAN. What do you mean by that?

Mr. EMERY. I mean it undertakes to take away a man's "blue eagle" or his compliance certificate, by virtue of which he cannot do business with the Government. If a man is doing business with the Government and does not obey an order which the Board has no authority to enforce, the Board takes from him his compliance certificate; and from that time on he cannot do business with the United States Government. So the penalty inflicted upon him may be the amount of business he loses, and it may be all of his business.

The present Labor Board, with respect to the enforcement of its orders, has enforced them without respect to the opinion of the Attorney General of the United States holding no executive body may create penalties. They may be established only by legislative act. It is just as lawless as its predecessor, which operated up to December 16, 1933, in excess of its authority, with respect to controversies arising under codes, over which that Board had no jurisdiction.

Perhaps Senator Wagner does not like the Weirton case because the Court held his Board had no authority when it intervened in that case.

I want to point out this present Labor Board in one decision after another, one order after another, may take away a man's compliance certificate or "blue eagle." If he happens to be a garment manufacturer he must have a label in order to sell to the retailer under the code. It means he is exiled from his customers, because they can do business with him no longer.

The Board has also taken upon itself to issue alternative orders which defeat review in the courts of the United States since they say it is not a final order but merely an alternative order and he can obey it or not.

If he does not obey, then the Board will take some further steps and take away the compliance certificate, or revoke the "blue eagle." In either one of those cases the man is severely penalized. He must obey the order of the body or he may risk the complete loss of his business.

The CHAIRMAN. That is a rather strong statement to say this Board exercises power that is lawless.

Mr. EMERY. In that connection I will now direct your attention to the opinion of the Attorney General of the United States.

Will you now permit me to read a line from Mr. Justice Holmes which might interest you in connection with this comparison which has been made?

Senator WAGNER. The comparison about what?

Mr. EMERY. Comparison of decisions. This is what Mr. Justice Holmes said in his address to the Harvard Law School.

Senator WAGNER. Don't you think you should read the dissenting opinion of Justice Holmes in the Child Labor case, if you consider him such an authority? Are you in accord with Mr. Justice Holmes?

Mr. EMERY. I am in accord with him in respect to this statement.

Senator WAGNER. Do you agree with the decision of Mr. Justice Holmes in the Child Labor case?

Mr. EMERY. I do not; it is not the law of the land. But I want to point out with respect to the principle of this bill you are advocating, Mr. Justice Holmes' dissenting opinion in that case is clearly against it. Mr. Justice Holmes said: "I told a labor leader once what they won't favor, if a decision is against them it is wicked", and perhaps that is why you are against me.

Senator WAGNER. I agree and disagree with workers, but you do not.

Mr. EMERY. But you do not regard yourself wicked, because you do, and say I am. However, that does not go to the law of the case.

Senator WAGNER. Your attitude is unchanging. Some day I am going to hear you approve of some legislation in the interest of progress. Then we are going to have a refreshing day.

Mr. EMERY. If your memory was longer, you would remember a lot of it.

Senator WAGNER. I remember your contention that my employment exchange bill, which is now a part of the law of the land, would violate every provision of the Constitution. You were also very apprehensive about the effect that it would have upon the country.

Mr. EMERY. And as usual, I am reminded of the form in which the Senator proposed it, and that Congress passed it in a very different form.

Mr. Chairman, I am afraid I am unduly delaying you in these very interesting discussions with the Senator from New York.

Senator WAGNER. On this question of the effect that certain activities have upon commerce, I shall read what Chief Justice Hughes said, not as a lawyer but as a Justice:

> The interests of producers and consumers are interlinked. When industry is greviously hurt, when producers fail, when unemployment mounts and communities dependent upon production are prostrated, the wells of commerce run dry.

The CHAIRMAN. You do not disagree with that?

Mr. EMERY. No; certainly not.

Senator WAGNER. So that at least if there were industrial warfare which might result in prostration of the industries in a community, you would think it proper for the Federal Government to intervene?

Mr. EMERY. Of course, the Federal Government does intervene in many appropriate cases. It has been intervening throughout this depression, and extending aid to States which are unable to actually care for themselves, and in many other ways.

What we are talking about now is permanent legislation, we are no longer talking about emergency or temporary legislation, so that we may no longer speak with plausibility about "flexibility" in the expansion of power. We are talking about two very great fundamental and different powers in the Government of the United States, the control over commerce, and the control over production. I am trying to call the committee's attention to the fact that the courts have continuously held Congress has plenary power to control the first and none over the second. I would like to proceed to call the committee's attention to other matters which are qeually fundamental here.

has had no notice, no opportunity to be heard, and which ultimate orders may be formulated upon declarations of which he has no knowledge. It is equally a denial of due process to authorize an administrative body, even though it were otherwise validly established, to take evidence without regard to established rules of law and to undertake to make findings of fact, founded upon such alleged evidence, conclusive upon a reviewing court.

Now, I say this was very deliberately put into this bill, because it was in the bill a year ago, and when this committee reported the bill to the Senate it carefully corrected these errors and provided that when a complaint was issued a party should have notice of that complaint, and if the complaint were amended, service of notice to the party had to be had the same as in the original instance, just as in a court of law; and furthermore, that the complaint could not be amended after the evidence had been closed.

The provision which is written in this bill here is a very extraordinary provision. It is one of the number of extraordinary things that appear in here.

On page 12, in section 10, subdivision (c), it says:

> Any such complaint may be amended by the member, agent, or agency conducting the hearing or the board in its discretion at any time prior to the issuance of an order based thereupon. The person so complained of shall have the right to file an answer and to appear in person or otherwise and give testimony at the place and time fixed in the complaint.

I never heard of an administrative body or a court at any time that was possessed of the power to amend its complaint up to the time it issued an order.

The CHAIRMAN. You know what the practice is in the Federal Trade Commission?

Mr. EMERY. The practice in the Federal Trade Commission or any other body is that if the complaint is amended, it must be re-served on the defendant, because he may be charged with an entirely different thing. Of course, ultimately due process of law means that a man have his day in court. Yet it is proposed here to permit amendment of the bill up to the time an order is issued.

Of course the order is issued after the body has reached its decision with regard to what it is to be, and to amend the complaint at any time without due notice of that amendment, is a denial of due process.

While we are on section 10, I would like to say this, that this is the first time in the history of any legislation proposed to Congress, I ever heard of a bill being presented which included the provision that it never could be amended, and that a power granted in it was not subject to repeal or amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Where did you find that?

Mr. EMERY. I find that in section 10 (a), in the second sentence, which reads:

> This power shall be exclusive, and shall not be affected by any other means of adjustment or prevention that has been or may be established by agreement, code, law, or otherwise, except as provided in section 11.

If plain English means anything at all, this means the power so granted cannot be "affected" by any means of adjustment, including "law." There it is, in plain language, "shall not be affected by any other means of adjustment or prevention that has been or may be established by agreement, code, law, or otherwise." What that is intended to accomplish I do not know. But reading it I must assume any layman or lawyer would conclude it is an attempt as far as possible to freeze a grant of authority beyond the action of any future legislation. If it does not mean that, it does not mean anything.

The CHAIRMAN. Section 11 is the court section.

Mr. EMERY. Section 11 is confined to vesting in the District Court of the United States the power to prevent or restrain any "unfair labor practice" through the Attorney General or his district attorneys, at the request of the board.

This section, of course, provides for no hearing before the board. The party may have no knowledge of it, except when he is presented with a restraining order from the District Court of the United States. This is nothing different from what has happened heretofore, perhaps.

Senator WAGNER. That is taken practically word for word from the Clayton Act.

Mr. EMERY. What of that?

Senator WAGNER. You said that it was new and novel.

Mr. EMERY. It is new in this bill, and at this time I am simply calling attention to the changes from the original.

Senator WAGNER. Everything is novel in this bill, because it is a new bill. But it is taken from the Clayton Act, passed in 1914.

Mr. EMERY. You might take something out of the Ten Commandments and it would be novel in such a bill.

What I am directing attention to at the present moment is that the procedure provided in here is not defensible procedure. I call attention to the provision which declares the power vested in the board cannot be changed even by law or by agreement.

I just wanted to call attention to it in passing. Of course that denial of due process does not require any discussion. It needs only to be called to your attention, and it refutes itself.

It has been said this bill is framed on the principle of the Federal Trade Commission Act. Whoever made the comparison was either unfamiliar with the Federal Trade Commission Act or had a somewhat faulty memory after examining it. The Federal Trade Commission Act requires a complaint to be served, in the usual manner, and the order cannot require an answer to be filed in less than 30 days. This bill may require an answer to be filed within 3 days anywhere in the United States or its possessions, and the service can be by telegraph. This is the first time we have invoked the telegraph as a means of serving processes of law, and I suppose one should admire the restraint which did not suggest the use of the radio or telephone for service of process.

The CHAIRMAN. The claim is made that labor disputes are of such a character, and cause so much delay, waste, and trouble, that speed in adjusting those differences is desirable. That is an argument made for the brief time to answer.

Mr. EMERY. Almost any form of attack upon the liberty or property rights may be of such a nature it may involve immediate loss. That is why we have the processes of equity for the purpose of prevention. We are confronted with this peculiar situation here. We realize Congress passed the Norris-LaGuardia injunction bill to prevent labor relations from being limited by the process of the equity court. The whole purpose of this bill is the generous use of injunction. So the relations of the employer and employee may be controlled and regulated by the flexible processes of a court of equity throughout this bill, a somewhat different function of the equity court than has been hitherto urged in labor quarters.

Senator WAGNER. Last year we passed a bill in this Congress, affecting about 2,000,000 railway employees, which enumerated unfair practices almost identical to those in this bill. Thus, when you say that this is something novel, you are not quite accurate. You are simply opposed to the extension to those whom you represent of principles that Congress has approved.

Mr. EMERY. I am opposed to its extension to a field over which Congress has no jurisdiction. When you passed the Railroad Labor Act, you were regulating instrumentalities of interstate commerce, because in contemplation of law a railroad president, a brakeman, or a box car are all instrumentalities of interstate commerce and may be regulated by Congress.

Let me say that in 1920 when the Transportation Act was pending before Congress, a far more drastic regulation of employer and employee as operating instrumentalities of interstate commerce was proposed and passed the Senate. It was more extreme than the suggestion here. I call the committee's attention to that, because of the well understood distinction between regulation of interstate commerce and the regulation of relations in production proposed here.

Senator WAGNER. May I ask this question. Suppose a strike were threatened in a very large plant which manufactures products that obviously go into interstate commerce, would not the Federal Government have the constitutional authority to prevent the unfair practices tending to produce such a strike that might dry up the channels of trade?

Mr. EMERY. Dry up the channels of production?

Senator WAGNER. No; of commerce.

Mr. EMERY. Of course it would have an ultimate but not a direct effect on commerce. I am interested in the way in which in the discussion of this bill you turn to some great major industry to illustrate the need of regulation, whereas the experience of a year and a half of the National Labor Board shows the Board scouring the country for many petty disputes in small plants, small complaints, instead of dealing with major issues that threatened, even on your theory, a serious burden on commerce. The Board has confronted a vast number of little disputes among small employers who are brought down to Washington before this Board, admitting, as they say, their right to enforce the thing they insist upon, but attempting all of the time to drive men completely out of business by extra legal penalties unless they obey their orders.

In a free country that is one of the most arbitrary practices ever attempted under the color of law.

Senator WAGNER. In a free country, the employees in a plant small or large should have rights equal to those of their employers. If they desire to organize in order to attain bargaining equality the law should protect them, and I know that they are not protected today. When we are talking about freedom let us not forget to seek freedom.

Mr. EMERY. This legislation is to bring about economic freedom for the workers. I am trying to get you to think about economic freedom for both employer and employee because no one will go further than those I represent in asserting and defending economic freedom under all circumstances and for all men. But we are constantly confronted with the odd attitude of distinguished men like yourself who become so excited over one kind of coercion that you shut your eyes to every other form. Although you have said in a public statement before this committee that you agree with me, as does the President of the United States, that "coercion from every source" ought to be prohibited, you will not write it into a bill.

Senator WAGNER. As to coercion by employees, present injunctive remedies are sufficient to deal with that. The chairman of this committee has said on the floor of the Senate that this bill deals with the economic relationship between employer and employee, and not the relationship among employees, which is a matter they must settle for themselves.

The employer has economic freedom in self-organization, and we are trying to achieve the same for the employees, so that there will be balance in our economic situation.

I sponsored the N. I. R. A. which, it is generally admitted, has been of advantage to the industries of this country.

That act gave all the rights of association to employers, and tried to give similar rights to workers. But the workers' rights have been denied.

Talking about majority rule, your own association has in its platform that whenever the majority in a trade association agree upon certain prohibitions of vicious trade practices, these prohibitions shall be binding upon the minority. Don't you think workers ought to have the same rights?

Mr. EMERY. After your very interesting speech, you ask me a question at the end of it.

Senator WAGNER. Am I right or wrong in my statement?

Mr. EMERY. Somewhat, but the statement is taken out of a text, and I think the text should be made clear.

Senator WAGNER. I have talked to manufacturers who have a very much more liberal attitude than you have.

Mr. EMERY. So that you may not misunderstand my position, and let me make myself clear. First of all, as to what has been said about majority rule—criticism was directed against the Labor Board asserting the principle of majority rules in the Houde case. There it was held that the representatives elected by a majority of the employees in a unit of employment become the exclusive bargaining agency for all employees. In this bill such representatives become the exclusive makers of agreements with the employer. By such provision, the individual and the minority are excluded from bargaining. Their rights are completely taken away from them.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you going to discuss that later?

Mr. EMERY. Yes; and I want to say this with respect to it now. We are talking about the right of the Labor Board to make this decision. The distinguished chairman of the Labor Board in his appearance before you, as the Senator from New York thought, was making a very strong contribution in defense of his board's action by saying that the manufacturers in their platform had suggested that the majority could impose conditions on a minority of competitors in the making of a code.

I do not say this in criticism of the Labor Board, but their action was predicated upon this proposition, that the Congress having granted to the President power to establish such agencies as he thought necessary to accomplish the policies of the N. R. A., had set up a Labor Board, and afterward enlarged its powers by successive orders. This body then began to interpret its powers in the cases that came before it. It had no authority directly from Congress until the passage of Resolution 44, and when that resolution was passed the issue of majority rule was before you gentlemen.

When you enacted the Railroad Labor Act you specifically provided in that act that the majority of a group or craft should determine who would be its representatives for bargaining purposes.

The Labor Board found no such provision in the law; if Congress had desired to establish that principle, it would have even said so. It discussed, but did not enact it.

When the Labor Board declared the majority rule in the Houde case it amended the act which you passed, but into which you refused to write such a declaration.

When did any board have a right to amend an act of Congress and write into it specific declaration which the legislature itself refused? Why construe an act to diminish the rights of workers it was declared to enlarge? As one reads the bill of the distinguished Senator, he finds every phrase diminishes existing rights of employees, as well as employers. The employees lose many rights which they now possess.

If this bill goes into effect, employees will lose the right to make individual agreements, and their labor agents and working conditions will be determined by the majority. That means out of 5,000 men, 2,501 can determine the representatives and bargain for the other 2,499.

If a man holding his membership voluntarily joins an organization, he can say I will disagree with them over matters of policy. I no longer wish them to represent me in the matter of making agreements with respect to hours and wages, then what does he do? He may withdraw from the organization and not from employment. An employee in any employment unit cannot, under the majority principle as it operates in that employment unit, accept by arrangement with an employer, he cannot make an agreement for himself, he can present a grievance and can utter a complaint, but he cannot bargain for himself. He can only withdraw from employment. There is a fundamental right of both liberty and property in labor, and that is the right to make a contract for yourself, and in not having it made for you by one not selected by you. That principle has been recognized ever since we have had any law.

Now, the Senator says that the parties at issue are so weak they are unable to protect themselves. Well, Mr. Chairman, you are a practical man, you have seen the development of great combinations in the United States. You know that one of the most serious social questions with which we are confronted is the control of combinations, whether it is that of employers or employees. I hold no brief against the equal control and regulation of each.

The thing the Senator from New York does not understand is that we are not objecting to regulation and protection of any parties within the proper jurisdiction. We are objecting to your continually ignoring what everybody that reads the daily press knows, that coercion is not peculiar to employers. There is constant coercion by employees as well as by employers.

At times in the history of the United States in recent years, Presidents of the United States have had to protect the paramount public interests of the people of this country against combinations of employees in time of disturbances and strife. That was done by President Cleveland in the Debs case, it was done by President Wilson against the United Mine Workers. Indeed President Wilson addressed a message to Congress October 27, 1919, after making every effort to prevent a strike which threatened to destroy the fuel production of the United States, wherein he declared "the strike under these circumstances is not only unjustifiable, it is unlawful."

Is there any suggestion in these measures that these powerful combinations shall be put under control, or that they shall accept collective responsibility with collective bargaining?

I say there is no place in the United States for a grant of power without corresponding responsibility for its use, whether by employer or employee, by combinations of workmen or combinations of business men. Neither one of them can, in the public interest, safely operate in association without corresponding responsibility for the exercise of the power they develop.

You are confronted with combinations which I have no desire to criticize as such. No one knows better than myself that the courts of the United States ever since 1843 have recognized the right of working men to organize and by legitimate means protect their own interests. No court of the United States has ever refused to give effect to this right on the part of workmen to associate themselves with others.

The public policy of the United States stated in the Norris-La Guardia Act would insure the right, and would include the right, of men "to decline to associate with their fellows." This bill will enact the majority rule and compel a man to associate with his fellows or else deny himself the right to a representative to write his bargain for him. He can protect himself against the consequences of compelled agency in only one way, and that is by resigning from his employment. If he is a member of a voluntary organization he could protest undesired agency by resigning from the organization, but under this proposal he cannot except by resigning from his employment.

Now this committee realizes the fact it is essential to the paramount public interest that all combinations of whatever character should be regulated in the exercise of the power, which by the very nature of this bill is promoted. But proponents are here asserting a principle of control of which I do not think they realize the consequences, when they undertake to say an administrative body may penalize, and issue a cease-and-desist order against any act which in their opinion may "affect" commerce between the States because that act may ultimately bring on a labor dispute or a strike. If the board may undertake to control the circumstances, leading to a fact obviously it may likewise control the fact itself. If you are going to give an administrative body the right to control relations between employer and employee because failure to correct them may lead to a strike that will interrupt commerce, you are asserting at the same time the right to lead, control, or prohibit the strike itself, because it will actually interrupt commerce.

If you can control the circumstances that lead to it, certainly you can control the thing itself, when it arrives.

I do not deny you can control it, on the contrary I think you can. I think the United States can control any combination that undertakes to directly prevent commerce between the States. It does not make any difference whether the thing which is presented is an economic or physical, whether it is a monopoly, a mob, or a sand bank. But it is within the control of Congress if the threat to commerce is directly and substantially related to it. Here it is argued you can control trivial circumstances through an administrative body whenever presented to it, because any of these unfair practices can be complained of by a single individual, and such individual may be brought before this Board in order that he may have redress by the issuance of an order.

There is nothing in this bill that undertakes to say that the act threatening commerce must be of importance in these acts which are defined in the bill, in order to establish a right to redress. The Senator would not tell a single individual he could not get redress if this act is passed.

Senator WAGNER. Since you ask me, I think that a worker, whether he works in a plant having 2 men or 5,000 men, should have the same protection under the law. Of course, we all know, however, that where there are only 3 or 4 men in a shop, these questions hardly arise. You know, also, that in the cases coming before the Board, the majority of workers are in company unions, which are generally dominated by employers.

Mr. EMERY. The Senator is not very fair in making a statement of that kind. You draw an indictment that Edmund Burke declined to do.

Senator WAGNER. The company unions that have come to my attention are dominated by the employer, and most of them were created as soon as section 7 (a) became a law, and in order to circumvent the law. Let me call to your attention that, where the company union is the majority force, the employer insists upon majority rule. But where the outside union has the majority he insists upon individual bargaining. Why this distinction?

In one instance that I recall an employer wrote a letter in which be protested to the Labor Board that those who were objecting to the arrangement between employer and employee represented only a minority, who were interfering with the majority rule of his company union.

Mr. EMERY. I am afraid you are like the Bishop of Oxford who said "Orthodoxy is my doxy and heterodoxy is somebody else's doxy."

Of course I realize, and I am sure every thinking man does, that employees being human beings, they are like employers, and that human nature does not change because the individual is an employee or because he is an employer. We all have the frailties of our common nature. We are prone to control the people with whom we deal and exercise authority over. Interesting things appear in the cases that come to court where there is an impartial atmosphere as the judge sits down to examine the facts, we get some very interesting cases. I want to illustrate what we have been talking about by one case, a case which has gone to the court, and with which the Senator from New York has had some connection at the beginning, that is, the Weirton Steel case.

That case went to court on the allegation that the union which claimed to be the chosen representative of the men in the plant had been interfered with and denied opportunity to freely organize and exercise its right to choose its own representatives. They had been denied opportunity for collective bargaining on behalf of those whom they represented.

The Government appeared in that case as petitioner through their counsel. The case was tried for 5 weeks. It was then argued for 3 days, and 283 witnesses were examined under oath. The record was between 5,000 and 6,000 pages. The court had two questions before it: Had there been a denial of the right of self-organization or interference with this right of organization? That was the first question, and on that question the court made its finding of fact.

Then, it had the further question of law to decide, and it decided that question. I want to call your attention to what the court found as a matter of fact in this case, because it is a very interesting illustration. We are not talking about controverted facts; we are talking about the finding of fact by the court from testimony under oath. The question was whether, among the 12,000 employees there represented, the union constituted a preponderant majority, and the union therefore had a right to say it represented them. What was the testimony?

I read from the opinion of the court as follows:

> Sander, a teller and member of the canvassing board of the Amalgamated Association, testified that only 17,996 steel workers throughout the United States were eligible to vote in the election of officers of the association in 1934. Of this number only 5,319 exercised their right to vote. Michael Tighe, president of the association, was the choice of only 2,789. Sander's testimony also showed that there were only 183 employees of defendant eligible to vote in 1934. It is absurd that officers chosen by 183 employees of defendant should be the representatives of 12,000 employees.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Emery, I think this is a good time to suspend until tomorrow morning, when you may return and complete your statement.

(See statement of James A. Emery resumed on pp. 840–869.)

We will recess the hearing until 10:30 o'clock tomorrow morning.

(Thereupon, at 12:20 p. m., the hearing was adjourned until 10:30 a. m., tomorrow, Friday, Mar. 22, 1935.)

NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD

FRIDAY, MARCH 22, 1935

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION AND LABOR.
Washington, D. C.

The committee met, at 10:30 a. m., in room 318, Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C., Senator David I. Walsh presiding.

Present: Senators Walsh (chairman) and Murray.

Present also: Senator Robert F. Wagner.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will please come to order. Mr. Emery, we will be glad to have you come forward and resume your statement.

Mr. EMERY. Mr. Chairman, I venture to make a suggestion to the committee, if I may, for their consideration. You have a large number of out-of-town witnesses here, and as I am a resident of Washington, if it would serve their convenience and the convenience of this committee I should be glad for you to hear the out-of-town witnesses, if you will permit me to finish at another time, or at the end of these hearings.

The CHAIRMAN. We thank you very much, and I think that would be very helpful.

Senator WAGNER. Mr. Chairman, before Mr. Emery leaves, may I read into the record what I referred to yesterday as the platform resolution of the Congress of American Industry and the National Association of Manufacturers?

This resolution provides [reading]:

Under proper safeguard, all approved competitive practices and prohibitions submitted by a properly defined majority of a group, trade, or industry shall be binding upon the minority. A minority group, in the absence of a majority request, should likewise be authorized to request a code of its own, limited in effect to its own members and to a period that would automatically terminate when a majority of the industry begin to operate under an approved code.

That is the majority rule for industry. Now, in regard to employment relations, the same platform provides [continues reading]:

The principle therefore is to recognize the equal right of minorities or individuals to bargain for themselves, directly or through representatives of their own choosing.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you care to comment on that, Mr. Emery?

Mr. EMERY. It would take some little time to do that.

Senator WAGNER. I should think it would.

Mr. EMERY. But nevertheless, I would simply like to remark with reference to the movement made by the Labor Board which the Senator defended, like the flowers that bloom in the spring, it has nothing to do with the case.

I simply want to serve your convenience, Mr. Chairman; and I want to ask this, if I may, if the committee will go on to the out-of-town witnesses, I will retire; then at the conclusion of the last day, if you will let me finish and will let my testimony be consecutive, that is all I would ask.

The CHAIRMAN. We will be glad to do that, Mr. Emery.

Mr. EMERY. I will be glad to check Senator Wagner's inquiry and find out about the platform.

Senator WAGNER. The platform is right here.

Mr. EMERY. It seems that the Senator does not happen to see the relation between what he has read, and what I have stated.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Carey, if you will come forward we will be glad to hear you.

STATEMENT OF W. GIBSON CAREY, JR., PRESIDENT OF THE YALE & TOWNE MANUFACTURING CO., NEW YORK, N. Y.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Carey, will you please give us your full name for the record.

Mr. CAREY. My full name is W. Gibson Carey, Jr.

The CHAIRMAN. Where do you live?

Mr. CAREY. Greenwich, Conn.

The CHAIRMAN. What is your occupation?

Mr. CAREY. I am president of the Yale & Towne Manufacturing Co.

The CHAIRMAN. Where are their offices located?

Mr. CAREY. Our executive offices are in New York City, and our head office is actually in Stamford, Conn., legally.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the nature of the business carried on by the Yale & Towne Manufacturing Co.

Mr. CAREY. We manufacture all sorts of locks, and also material and handle equipment, such as electric lifts, trucks, and pulleys, and so forth.

The CHAIRMAN. How many employees have you?

Mr. CAREY. Between 6,000 and 7,000.

The CHAIRMAN. Are they organized in any labor organization?

Mr. CAREY. They are organized in industrial councils at our larger plants, and direct dealing in our smaller plant.

The CHAIRMAN. What do you mean by industrial council?

Mr. CAREY. The so-called "company union."

The CHAIRMAN. In your larger plant you have company unions, but not in all of the smaller plants.

Mr. CAREY. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. How are the company unions organized?

Mr. CAREY. I do not understand the exact significance of your question, but they have all been voted on by the men.

The CHAIRMAN. That is what I mean. You said you have industrial councils?

Mr. CAREY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Who represents your employees in collective bargaining with the employers.

Mr. CAREY. That is correct, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And these industrial councilors are selected by the men?

Mr. CAREY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. In elections held how often?

Mr. CAREY. Once a year.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the name of the organization of your employees?

Mr. CAREY. The industrial council.

The CHAIRMAN. The organization of the men is called the industrial council?

Mr. CAREY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And they select their representatives?

Mr. CAREY. Yes; by secret ballot.

The CHAIRMAN. To negotiate with the employers?

Mr. CAREY. That is correct, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. How often are these elections held?

Mr. CAREY. Once a year.

The CHAIRMAN. Are they voluntary organizations without a constitution, or are they voluntary organizations with a constitution?

Mr. CAREY. With a constitution.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you that constitution here?

Mr. CAREY. I have a constitution here belonging to one of the plants from which I am going to give some excerpts.

The CHAIRMAN. What percentage of your men are connected with these company unions, would you say?

Mr. CAREY. I should say 60 percent.

The CHAIRMAN. I have been using the word men; and I suppose you have women also employed?

Mr. CAREY. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. And they also belong to the organization.

Mr. CAREY. Yes; and I so took your question to mean both men and women.

The CHAIRMAN. Wherever there is a desire or a wish for a company union, you make no objection to the one being set up.

Mr. CAREY. Absolutely not.

The CHAIRMAN. How long have these company unions been in existence?

Mr. CAREY. In our largest plant, which is in Connecticut, our company union runs back to 1919.

The CHAIRMAN. And others have been organized from time to time since that time?

Mr. CAREY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. How many employees would you say you have in your various plants?

Mr. CAREY. About 6,000 to 7,000; some of which are outside of the United States, and between 4,000 and 5,000 in the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. Where are your plants located?

Mr. CAREY. Connecticut, Pennsylvania, Michigan, and Illinois.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you mind telling the places?

Mr. CAREY. Stamford, Conn.; Philadelphia, Pa.; Detroit, Mich.; Chicago, Ill.; and North Chicago, Ill.

The CHAIRMAN. You made reference to plants being located outside of this country?

Mr. CAREY. One plant at St. Catherines, Ontario, Canada.

The CHAIRMAN. Have they a company union?

Mr. CAREY. No, sir; it is a small plant. We also have plants in Europe.

The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed with your statement.

Mr. CAREY. Not being trained in legal affairs, I am appearing before this committee as a business man who has had experience in labor problems and who, furthermore, is tremendously interested in them. It has been my privilege not only to observe but also to participate in negotiations with employees, both as individuals and collectively. By this term "collectively" I mean that I have had experience both with industrial councils or company unions and with groups of employees who have wished only on some temporarily pressing problem to discuss their affairs as a unit. I am mentioning all this so that you may have some knowledge of the background from which I speak and so that you also may know why I am not touching on possible constitutional considerations, which I feel I am not qualified to discuss.

The first point I wish to emphasize is that relationships between labor and management are in my opinion from every practical standpoint best handled locally. Undoubtedly in cases where mediation is desirable in connection with some pending conflict of very large scope the Department of Labor should act. That process, however, is one which has been in existence for a long time and needs, therefore, no further legislative action. By far the largest number of misunderstandings or disputes can for the good of everyone concerned be handled solely within the States in which they occur.

As a business man I cannot emphasize too strongly that the varying conditions in different localities make it almost essential for persons with experience and full knowledge of the immediate circumstances to conduct any negotiations without the direction of or supervision of a Federal board, which may have the best intentions in the world but which is totally unable to know the local circumstances in all of the industrial areas throughout the United States. It is certainly true, furthermore, that violent changes of labor policy will be avoided by having labor relationships controlled within the borders of each State. This avoidance of too quick changes of policy which undoubtedly would occur with the shifting personnel on any Federal board is, I think, much more important to the welfare of business at large, including the employees, than is generally realized.

It is certainly true also that in this whole question of labor policy the immensely complicated reactions of millions of human beings are involved. I need scarcely say that men vary tremendously in what they want and how they react to different kinds of approach to their problems. Certainly the close knowledge of and understanding of conditions within each State and within each community is necessary to attain from these human values the utmost in cooperation and effort. In saying all this I realize fully that a Federal board would have the advantage of using local boards or individuals, but even so I maintain that unquestionably any attempt to handle employment relations throughout the United States from any central source will prove a decided detriment to the welfare of this country. It is my belief that the activities of the present National Labor Board, despite such good work as it may have done in certain instances, stands as a corroboration of what I have said. Certainly any form of Federal labor board with many local representatives will bring about and magnify disputes which by purely local treatment would in most instances be minor incidents. This is true because there will always be some unreasonable persons either in the plants or among the staffs of labor unions to start complaints even though they may be unjustified.

Fair management is labor's best friend. Despite what has been said so many times, there is in well-run American business a unity of purpose extending from the president of a company to the yard laborer. The object, of course, of each constructive officer or employee is to advance the welfare of his individual company, as well as his own interests. In the long run it is my belief that the utmost for the company and for the employees is attained when managements deal either directly with their men or through industrial councils or, as they are sometimes called, company unions. This, I think, is a basic statement, because in dealing either directly or through industrial councils the management has a better opportunity to explain the affairs of the company to the employees and to obtain their cooperation and maximum effort in times of stress.

I do not mean to say that representatives of organized labor may not in eras of bad business be reasonable, but the fact is that such representatives are by no means always in a position to agree even to fair requests. Contracts on wage scales may be involved. The possible effect on other organized plants in the community, even though those plants may be in a different line of business, may control the reasonableness of labor representatives in granting justified demands for wage adjustments. Please do not take from this that I am arguing for, or even hinting at, the desirability of low pay. My belief, and I think nearly all businessmen today agree, is that high wages are desirable from a great many viewpoints, but it must always be remembered that a company cannot be constructive either to the community at large or to its employees unless over the long run the outgo is less than the income. The fact is that over the years it has been possible to reduce costs to the public and at the same time to increase wage levels immensely. As one outstanding example of this I mention the automobile industry, the labor of which has never been higher organized but which has constantly contributed toward the development of the Nation while at the same time it has benefited its employees to a remarkable degree.

The changing status of labor in the United States in the last hundred years has been tremendous. The standard of living has improved fourfold. The hours of labor have been decreased tremendously. Furthermore, the percent of the national income received by labor has advanced constantly from 38 percent in the year 1850 to 63 percent at present. These trends must in any fair man's mind be given great weight, since they show that without the Wagner labor relations bill really immense strides have been made by industrial employees.

Even the most hopeful of us are undoubtedly still worried and greatly perplexed. The fact is that we must get out of this depression. In my opinion even good legislation should be postponed at this time, provided it is so great in scope and influence as to unsettle business and retard recovery. In this connection let me read an excerpt from Mr. Moley's March 23 editorial in the magazine Today.

From this editorial I read the following:

What are the currents of thought and feeling in the stream itself these March days? The happiness and well-being of millions of people are concerned in this prosaic question.

We cannot deny the presence of a vast pessimism among us. This spirit possesses even wise and hopeful friends of the "new deal."

One of the wisest liberals that I know has written me the following letter. I believe it will call to the attention of those who are forgetting fundamentals in their preoccupation with the passing show of controversy, what is being thought by serious men, profoundly concerned with human welfare. I print it because, while I am an optimist, I am no Pollyanna. I do not agree with all that my correspondent says, but I believe his reaction to be that of a great many people.

"I would not be honest if I did not say I do not believe confidence has ever been lower in this country, save during the bank holiday. I am afraid we are running rapidly into another shut-down of some kind. Probably I should not say shut-down; I mean crisis. I am afraid the situation will call for spectacular action to release the energy that will be necessary. Perhaps the crisis will take the form of labor stoppage—perhaps a railroad or a mine strike or both.

"We have a terrible combination in labor these days, a bitter disappointment over the failure of the imagined benefits of the N. R. A., the ability of strikers to use unemployed as pickets, the unwillingness of all local government to protect strike breakers from pickets, the ability of pickets to damage the property of nonstrikers, the mobility of pickets in scattered industries, and the presence of a probable majority of sullen, disillusioned, spiritless and would-be radical citizens.

"Couple this with the fears and the lack of confidence on the part of many business people, and their inability to make their voice heard in Congress, and we have the makings of trouble. Not of revolution, for this people would not know whether to revolt. We are too much hypped by money radicalism to think of the radicalism of goods and services. So long as we are going to redistribute money, we will not get around to redistributing value, though we may destroy the savings of millions.

"If government can't accomplish the impossible, surely labor and all the other private leagues and associations we hear about can't. If Government doesn't deliver a more abundant life, all kinds of people acting in all kinds of ways are not going to. All they will create is confusion. Confusion will breed force. Out of it would rise the demand for responsibility in some quarter."

The CHAIRMAN. Is that an editorial or an article?

Mr. CAREY. I take it to be an editorial. It is from the March 23 issue of the magazine, and is signed by Mr. Moley, in the articles he has in the magazine Today over his signature.

I might add, I do not know the writer of the article; in fact, I never saw anything about it until I read it in this magazine yesterday.

The CHAIRMAN. Do these views express your own?

Mr. CAREY. Not exactly, sir. I am in the same position Mr. Moley is; I do not adhere to a great deal of that, but I just express it as representative of what is in the minds of a great many people, this man being described as wise "Liberal."

This shows the worry of the man who is described as "one of the wisest Liberals." I make the point, therefore, that if the bill we are discussing will harass business that it is unwise legislation. In this connection and as an indication of the feeling of the country at large toward unionization, I wish to bring to your attention the survey made last fall by the National Industrial Conference Board, which asked newspaper editors throughout the United States their opinion of the attitude of their readers on a number of vital questions, one of which was "Does public opinion in your community favor making membership in a labor union a necessary condition of employment?" The replies were 94 percent in the negative. Based on this, I say that if these newspapers editors are anywhere nearly right, it would be a seriously disturbing influence were this bill to be enacted, provided always the bill is, as seems evident, directed toward an increase in the position of organized labor.

Do not think from all that I have said above that I do not realize, or at least believe that I realize, the real meaning of this proposed legislation. I know that this bill does not necessarily stop an industrial council or company union that is not dominated by the management. I realize that individual dealing between employees and employers is not in specific terms outlawed by this measure. Unquestionably, however, in the opinion of businessmen, the effect of this bill would tend to do these very things. To what degree these trends would occur depends on so many factors that I believe no man at this time can make an accurate judgment. My point is that any trend toward the abolition of fair company unions or individual relationships between employees and employers is decidedly not in the public interest nor in the interest of the employees themselves.

We have already, with clause 7–A of the Recovery Act, had sufficient misunderstanding and misinterpretation. In fact, as everyone knows, 7–A has been interpreted differently by Government officials and by different elements of the public. It is absolutely certain that the unfair labor practices in this bill will be misinterpreted and that these misinterpretations will give rise to agitation, misunderstanding, bad feeling and the retarding of business, which is the very thing that the bill says it wishes to avoid. There is, furthermore, in this bill no provision allowing the employer to curb communistic influence in his own plant and there is, furthermore, in my opinion, in spite of the great danger in the United States of communism, no hope of writing provisions into the bill which would cover this point and which would not be subject perhaps to misuses and certainly to great misunderstanding.

It is, I believe, also certain that under the provisions of this bill it would be most difficult and almost impossible to change a majority rule once such a rule had been established in a plant. This factor, of course, is difficult to appraise since the attitude of the personnel of the Federal Board and of the local agents of that Board toward elections in a plant would have a great bearing. In closing this paragraph, I want to ask the rhetorical question, "Does not the attitude which organized labor has already taken toward this bill at least indicate that this proposed legislation will not give an entirely fair choice to workers as to how they will deal with their employers?"

It is unnecessary to take your time to outline in great detail what seem to be some of the unfair provisions proposed. It is certainly true, however, that there is no protection provided against employee domination or intimidation. With what we have been through, does it not seem evident to each one of you that the menace of employee domination is equally as great as that of employer domination? A startling instance of an attempt of this sort, with which you are all I think familiar, is the tragic case of Kohler of Kohler. Perhaps in making this point I should not deal solely with employee domination, since one of the startling facts is that outside agitators, not even connected with the plant, have in many instances fomented trouble and have participated in outrageous destruction of property and intimidation of employees who wish to work. There is, so far as I can find in this proposed legislation, no safeguard for a decent employer or his employees against this sort of racketeering. Another point that seems both unfair and unreasonable, and which by the way is connected with what I have said before about the necessity for local control of labor problems, is the fact that under this bill employers can be summoned anywhere to protect their interests whether there may be any real case against them or not.

I want to make the very definite statement that industrial councils can be, and in many instances are, entirely fair. In this connection I would like to read certain provisions from an industrial council plan which has worked satisfactorily for 16 years. I think you will all admit that if these provisions covering the guarantee of independence of action have been lived up to that there is no doubt that the men have no complaint on the question of domination. The fact is in this particular case that in 16 years there has been no question from anyone on this point.

I now would like to read to you from the constitution of the Yale & Towne Industrial Council as follows:

GUARANTY OF INDEPENDENCE OF ACTION

Every representative serving on the council shall be wholly free in the performance of his duties as such and shall not be discriminated against on account of any action taken by him in good faith in his representative capacity.

To avoid any possibility of such discrimination no representative shall be dismissed during his term of office, or for 6 months thereafter, before having the cause for dismissal submitted to and approved by the council. In the event of a tie vote in the council the matter shall be referred to the president of the company for final decision.

Nothing in this article shall give the council authority to have such dismissal submitted to it if the person to be dismissed refuses to have the council intervene.

To further guarantee to each representative his independence, he shall have the right to appeal directly to the president for relief from any alleged discrimination against him.

ARTICLE XV. NO DISCRIMINATION

There shall be no discrimination under this plan against any employee because of race, sex, political or religious affiliation, or membership in any labor or other organization.

I repeat that I realize that this bill does not propose directly to eliminate councils which are not dominated by the employer although as I have said before, it seems to me that even such councils would be in great jeopardy, for the reasons already given. The point I am trying to make now is that councils can be, and I believe on the whole, are entirely fair to the men and entirely satisfactory to them.

Although I have tried to make a forceful appeal for the rejection of this bill, I do not want it thought by anyone that I am opposed to organized unions. Every fair business man must realize, I believe, that such unions have a proper place in our economic life. For instance, when management is unjust to men in not giving them decent and proper pay based on the income of the business, the introduction of an organized union may well be beneficial not only to the men but to the competitors of that company. There are undoubtedly also certain types of shifting employment where men go from one employer to another and where, in order to preserve proper wage levels, union organization is almost necessary. I do maintain though, that in a well-run industrial institution, where men are receiving fair pay considering the general conditions in the industry and in the business in question, there is no reason why there should be placed on the men the cost of union dues. Furthermore, with the present reasonably conservative and reasonably constructive officers of the American Federation of Labor there is, I think, not great danger of an iniquitous misuse of funds collected from the workingmen. I think it is fair, however, to say that the difficulties which organized labor has already had with agitators should give you great concern about the desirability of passing a measure which, as I have tried to point out, would probably very greatly increase funds in the possession of organized unions. This is especially true because at present unions and union officials are not fully responsible legally.

I make the plea that decent employers who are, in my opinion, greatly in the majority both in numbers and in the numbers of their employees, should not be penalized because of the action of such unscrupulous employers as there may be. I say without qualification that employers who are not giving their men a thoroughly square deal considering the condition of their businesses should be curbed. It is evident that unfair treatment of employees is almost as disastrous to a fair competitor as it is to the employees who are being injured. In my experience, however, and I believe I know personally something of the conditions in a great many of the plants, both large and small in the United States, I have found very few executives who do not realize the basic necessity of giving their men a thoroughly square deal. Sound labor relations are based on confidence and mutual respect built up through years of constructive cooperation. Human nature is such that in most instances undue force on either side is not productive of the best results. Let us remember, that as between men, the application of the golden rule is what counts. Within individual plants proper labor arrangements are not in the largest sense built on legislation.

If you believe in the sincerity of what I have said, and if you concur in the force of the arguments herewith presented, I ask you, gentlemen, not to pass this legislation, which may well bring great strife and at the same time retard our business recovery.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Carey, what is your position with this company?

Mr. CAREY. I am president of the Yale & Towne Manufacturing Co., and I am also representing the board of directors of the National Association of Manufacturers, in this instance.

The CHAIRMAN. How long have you been president of this company?

Mr. CAREY. Since the end of 1932, and before that I was vice president and treasurer.

The CHAIRMAN. Has your family been associated with this company for years?

Mr. CAREY. Not my immediate family.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you, Mr. Carey.

Senator WAGNER. Mr. Carey, have you a written collective bargaining agreement with your employees?

Mr. CAREY. Yes; but they are different at the different plants.

Senator WAGNER. One in each plant?

Mr. CAREY. Yes; the reason for that being, if I may say, is that the men in the different plants have wished different constitutions, which were entirely agreeable to the employer; and also because each of them came into existence at different times.

Senator WAGNER. Yes; I can understand that. Is there any agreement signed by the representatives of the employees?

Mr. CAREY. It is not signed as such, but it is presented to them, and in fact, worked out with them.

Senator WAGNER. Is it a binding contract signed by both sides?

Mr. CAREY. There is no legal form of contract, it is just a continuous arrangement for working out all of the problems of any kind that come up between the men and the employers.

Senator WAGNER. The reason I ask is because I have not yet come across a case where a so-called "company union" is in existence and where there is a written contract binding both sides to certain conditions of employment.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you mean, Senator Wagner, that the collective bargaining between the representatives of the employees and of the employers in these company unions is not resolved to writing?

Senator WAGNER. That is what I inquired about, and apparently that has not been resolved to writing.

Mr. CAREY. Only in this sense, the minutes are kept of all the meetings, and the decision arrived at, and the manner of arriving at the decision, and those results are published in our plant organ so everybody can see them.

Senator WAGNER. You have no binding agreement that for a certain period you will pay your employees a certain wage.

Mr. CAREY. You are entirely correct in that, but may I say from my point of view, that is not constructive for the men themselves.

The attitude in which I approach that is this, that industry must be kept in existence for management as well as employees to get anything out of the effort they are going to put in that organization in the future. What we actually do is to go to our men, and they know almost as much about the finances of our business as I do. We tell them, we told them about the different types of business, talk about the cost, talk about the prices to which we are forced by competition, and I tell you, our men know thoroughly about what we are up against from the standpoint of competition from time to time, our profit and loss sheet, and the whole thing.

Senator WAGNER. What particular unfair labor practice in this bill would interfere with the relationship which you say now exists and is satisfactory to both sides?

Mr. CAREY. What I am afraid of is this, Senator Wagner——

Senator WAGNER. I wonder if there is any one of the unfair labor practices incorporated in this bill that would interfere with your relationship as you have stated it to us.

Mr. CAREY. I don't think so, unless there were great misunderstandings and misinterpretations and all sorts of trouble. But, I do want to make this point in that connection, I do not care how fair any group of men is trying to be with its employees there is always bound to be some very small group of dissatisfied people who will make trouble. That is true even in the Congress of the United States, as you so well know yourself.

Senator WAGNER. Are the representatives of the workers in this council elected by ballot?

Mr. CAREY. Yes; by secret ballot.

Senator WAGNER. And those who receive the majority of the votes cast represent all of the employees in negotiating with their employer?

Mr. CAREY. That is correct.

Senator WAGNER. So that the majority rule prevails?

Mr. CAREY. In that particular sense, yes; and I don't know of any other way.

Senator WAGNER. I do not either.

Mr. CAREY. But I do not think it applies to what I presume your mind is running to. I don't know.

Senator WAGNER. I do not know whether it applies to your situation. Now, do you require that the representative of the workers must be a worker employed in your plant?

Mr. CAREY. Yes, sir.

Senator WAGNER. So that, under the constitution as it is now, the workers could not choose a representative outside of your plant even if they so desired?

Mr. CAREY. That is correct.

Senator WAGNER. Is there a provision in your constitution providing that it cannot be amended without the consent of the management?

Mr. CAREY. I do not know how to answer that question specifically. I think if the question would ever come up, there would be negotiations between the men and the management.

Senator WAGNER. Have you the constitution here?

Mr. CAREY. Yes; but I do not know whether that is covered in that way. The constitution states the following [reading]:

> Amendments to the constitution of this council may be proposed either by the council or by the management. The amendment proposed shall be presented to the council in writing, and when approved by it shall be submitted to the management for consideration. Upon approval by the management, the same shall become a part of the constitution.

Senator WAGNER. In other words, under this constitution the union cannot amend unless the employer consents.

Mr. CAREY. Yes; I think that is undoubtedly correct. May I ask you a question, Senator? Do you think any other arrangement is there when you have mutuality of purpose between employer and employee?

Senator WAGNER. Mutuality does not mean control, and I should say each group should be independent of the other if we are to have effective collective bargaining. So far as I can see, if this bill becomes a law, the only change in your situation will be that the workers will be at liberty to choose their representatives either from among your employees or from an outside organization.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Carey, I have been interested in what you said about informing the representatives of your employees of the financial aspects of the business. I presume they are informed about the earnings.

Mr. CAREY. Yes; they are.

The CHAIRMAN. It has been my observation that such an attitude has been accepted by a great many employers during times of distress when they are not earning much money, but in periods of time when they are prosperous they are not so disposed; and I have observed more in the past, than in recent years, that a good deal of trouble between employers and employees has originated over wages, particularly because in prosperous times the employers do not make known that fact.

Has your observation been in accord with mine?

Mr. CAREY. I think as a general statement that may well be a fair statement. I do not think in our case or in a great many other cases it is true.

The CHAIRMAN. It would be better if that relation of frankness with reference to profits should continue when profits are made, as well as when losses are made.

Mr. CAREY. I should think so.

The CHAIRMAN. May I ask this question? Is the stock in your company held by a limited number of persons, or is it for general sale on the market?

Mr. CAREY. It is for general sale; it is listed on the New York Stock Exchange.

The CHAIRMAN. I think I express the opinion of the entire committee when I say we appreciate the able manner in which you have presented your case, and the favorable impression you have made. Thank you.

Mr. CAREY. I thank you for the opportunity of appearing before your committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Harrington, if you will please come forward we will be glad to hear you.

STATEMENT OF GUY L. HARRINGTON, REPRESENTING THE NATIONAL PUBLISHERS' ASSOCIATION

The CHAIRMAN. Your full name is Guy L. Harrington, and you represent the National Publishers' Association?

Mr. HARRINGTON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Does that organization consist of newspaper publishers or of magazine publishers?

Mr. HARRINGTON. It consists of magazine or periodical publishers.

The CHAIRMAN. How many members have you in that association?

Mr. HARRINGTON. One hundred and fifty members.

The CHAIRMAN. They have a central office here in Washington, and you are their representative?

Mr. HARRINGTON. They have a central office in Washington, but I do not have charge. Mr. Daley is their representative here in Washington.

The CHAIRMAN. In what capacity do you appear?

Mr. HARRINGTON. I am representing the National Publishers' Association.

The CHAIRMAN. Where is your residence?

Mr. HARRINGTON. Greenwich, N. Y.

The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed with your statement.

Mr. HARRINGTON. This testimony is presented at the direction of the National Publishers' Association representing approximately 150 of the leading periodicals of the United States with a total combined circulation of more than 50,000,000 individual copies monthly.

Magazine publishers have a vital three-fold interest in any proposal affecting the wage earners of the country. They are interested in the welfare of the consuming public, largely made up of wage earners, upon whom they depend for circulations; they are interested in the welfare of the individual members of other industries upon whom they depend for advertising patronage and they are interested in the welfare of their own employees.

The bill under consideration relates to man's most important activity—the gaining of a livelihood. Accordingly a careful appraisal of its value and a measure of its future implications are of great importance.

Karl Marx advocated the following steps to State capitalism.

First. Encourage monopolies in industry.

Second. Organize and strengthen the hand of labor.

Third. When conditions fostered by these two steps made it impossible for industry and labor to longer cooperate, then the State would take over industry.

The provisions of the N. I. R. A. abrogating as they did in part the antitrust laws and permitting price-fixing and the limitation of production definitely tended to create monopolies in industry. We now have before us again for discussion a bill, the implied purposes of which are to organize and strengthen the hands of labor.

Is this bill, we ask, a second step in accordance with Karl Marx's philosophy of economics?

In the absence of any evidence that similar systems in other countries, either in the past or present, have contributed to the general welfare or raised the living standards of a single people and in view of the failure of the Government to successfully demonstrate under the N. R. A., the practicality of either directing or controlling the multiplicity of interlacing operations of industry through a central bureau and because this bill would in our opinion in effect impose an unwarranted, unjustified governmental bureaucratic control over the intimate details of employer-employee relationships, which are just as complicated as other industrial problems, we are opposed to it.

With the advent of clause 7–A of the N. I. R. A. granting employees the right to bargain collectively, the representatives of the American Federation of Labor either because of governmental encouragement or on their own initiative, although representing only a small percent of the wage earners of the country, attempted to assume the role of spokesmen for all labor.

Their efforts to gain union recognition as the sole bargaining agency for labor in individual industrial organizations resulted in an immediate tremendous increase in strikes the country over.

These strikes took place at a time when millions were out of work and the country should have conserved its resources to the utmost.

They resulted in a tremendous money loss, the burden of which ultimately fell on the consumers upon whose increased purchasing power recovery depended.

This loss is directly attributable to clause 7–A. The responsibility rests with the American Federation of Labor and those who framed the law.

This is a glaring example of what frequently happens when government attempts to unreasonably regulate or control industrial relations and operations.

The mistake made nearly 2 years ago is still with us. The cause of these labor troubles—namely, clause 7–A, has not been removed. Established last year for the ostensible purpose of correcting the mistake, another bureaucratic body, the National Labor Relations Board, has admitted its inability to properly function in settling labor disputes and asks for more power. Evidently, to correct one mistake, another mistake has been made entailing a tremendous loss to industry in expense and time wasted in long, drawn-out, fruitless, and often justified hearings and investigations. How long shall we continue piling up mistake on mistake at a time when the production of each group of six wage earners in the country on the average is supporting one Government employee?

Those provisions in the present labor disputes bill of particular concern to periodical publishers are contained in sections 7 and 9.

Employers would be prohibited from dominating or interfering with the formation or administration of any labor organization. This, of course, has direct relation to the so-called "company union." What is meant by "dominate or interfere"? If employees asked the advice of their employer and received it, would that constitute interference? If an employer asked for the cooperation of his employees and was accorded it, would that constitute domination? Must he set up a fence between himself and his employees and thereby create a class distinction heretofore unknown in this country? These appear to be silly questions, but they are pertinent.

What is wrong with the company union or even a company-dominated union?

One of the stated purposes of this bill is "to diminish the causes of labor disputes." If an employer can, by encouraging his employees to organize a works council or some other form of employee association, secure a greater measure of cooperation and better understanding on their part, promote their welfare, and facilitate settling disputes, should he be prohibited from doing so? What about those company unions, the members of which share in their companies' profits? Shall they also be prohibited?

What alternative means, other than through one national organization—the American Federation of Labor, no matter whether it is well managed or badly managed in different localities and industries—do you leave open to both employees and employers to collectively bargain? The quickest way to start a guerrilla warfare is to tell the average American that he must do a thing a certain way. What difference does it make about the method providing the result is accomplished? Won't the competition between the A. F. of L. and company unions balance the situation and keep both methods clean? Few labor disturbances or strikes take place which are not called by the unions constituting the American Federation of Labor.

This fact in itself should be conclusive evidence that the real solution to labor disturbances is the close cooperation between employer and employee to be secured through the works councils type of union rather than resort to the cumbersome inefficient, time-wasting procedure of handling labor relations through a permanent Labor Board, the very existence of which stimulates labor disturbances.

We recommend that you investigate and study the records of the present and past National Labor Board—not only the cases decided but the needless claims and disputes brought up.

To place in the hands of a labor board, which might or might not be prejudiced, the power to determine what constituted interference and domination in its varying degrees on the part of the employers located possibly hundreds of miles away, would in our opinion result in endless complications and disputes.

It is contended that real collective bargaining cannot or does not take place in the case of a company union. There seems to be no evidence supporting the need for the extension of collective bargaining in this country. The fact that this system is in general use in England and other countries does not commend its institution here. The living standards and working conditions of wage earners of all other countries are not to be compared with ours. Why should we have incorporated this principle in the N. I. R. A.? There is no evidence that it has contributed to the workers' welfare. While it has long been one of the tenets of the American Federation of Labor, there seems to be no good reason for us to force its adoption generally.

It is our observation that the average wage earner is not interested in joining any union—company or otherwise. Neither is he interested in collective bargaining. So long as he has a steady job, good pay, and good working conditions, he is satisfied and wishes to be left alone. When he wishes an increase in wages he wants to bargain with the boss himself. He prefers that condition to being a member of a union which can order him to strike for no advantage to himself. It is only under pressure or persuasion that the average worker joins a union. Why, then, all this excitement about collective bargaining?

Without collective bargaining, the percentages of the wage earners' share of the country's income has shown a constant increase in the last 30 years. In 1900, this division in the form of wages, salaries, and pensions was 53 percent. In 1929 at the country's production peak, it was 65 percent. During that period, hours of work decreased from 59 to 51 per week.

The workers' share of the national income has automatically increased in proportion to the increase in production.

In view of this record, why should collective bargaining be made obligatory? Even in England where collective bargaining is the rule, it is not mandatory.

That representatives for collective bargaining purposes shall be selected by a majority vote seems, when taken alone, a simple, reasonable provision. Coupled with section 7 granting employees the right " to engage in concerted activities " for " mutual aid " without restrictions, and with paragraph 1, section 8, making it unfair practice for an employer " to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in section 7", it becomes a menace to all open-shop organizations which represent more than five-sixths of the working population of the country.

Under these restrictions, an employer, in case of an election, would be "hog tied" and rendered completely powerless to protect his employees or himself against unfair practices on the part of inside or outside labor agitators. His employees would be subjected to threats, bulldozing, and intimidations on the part of representatives of any local or national labor organization.

Any election held under such circumstances would not and could not register the real choice of a body of employees, whether the election was held under the supervision of a labor board or not. These provisions would give the American Federation of Labor a tremendous advantage and we undoubtedly would have a repetition of the "big drive" initiated immediately following the enactment of the N. I. R. A. when the American Federation of Labor broadcast throughout the land through its labor organizers that it had been chosen as the sole bargaining agency for labor, and in a short time doubled its membership. Many new members secured at that time who had paid their initiation fees, which they could not afford, were later dropped for nonpayment of dues.

It definitely approves closed-shop agreements by which an employee who enters into an agreement with a union must refuse employment to persons not members of that union. Thus 51 percent of the employees can compel every other employee to join their organization and to pay dues into it.

It is interesting to note that at the present time there are about 2,800,000 members of unions affiliated with the American Federation of Labor who are paying dues. These dues average according to the best information available about $24 per year per member. Thus at the present time the gross revenues of those unions associated with the Federation is about $70,000,000.

This amount is enormously greater than revenues of any other organization in the country which devotes a goodly portion of its revenues to propaganda and organization.

It is estimated that there are between eighteen and twenty million employees in this country who might be forced to join the unions in case this bill became law. Should that come about the fund which would then be available for the use of the unions would be between four hundred and five hundred million dollars per year, which is a colossal sum to place at the disposal of one block of our population and which obviously could be used as the basis for tremendous political and social pressure for the benefit of this one group as against the balance of the citizens of the country.

We fully appreciate any contribution which organized labor has made to this country. It has without question been a factor in raising our living standards. In crucial periods, it has used its influence for the common welfare.

If, however, organized labor became too powerful it might prove a serious menace to our institutions. Under unprincipled leaders that would unquestionably be the case. It will always need the beneficial leavening influence of opposition. Threats of defeats at the polls against legislators should not be tolerated.

Strikes when millions are out of work are strikes against the unemployed. The company union supplies the necessary check to organized labor's rise to a position of dangerous power. Union leaders know this.

For that reason company unions are an anathema to them. For the same reason the company union should be retained.

It is highly important to the welfare of this country that proper balance between the union shop and open shop be maintained.

If a measure of this nature is enacted into law, it is of the greatest importance that its provisions protect the workers of this country from coercion from any source.

In our opinion, this bill as it now stands, enacted into law, would result in the unionization of all industry in a short time.

At the present time an overwhelming majority of the printing plants in which magazines are produced are open shop. The skilled labor in these plants is more highly paid than that of any other industry with possibly one or two exceptions.

Magazine publishers must at all times be insured against a break in the continuity of their printing operations. The nonproduction of one issue would mean great loss and might result in the complete ruin of a profitable business which had required years to build. For that reason labor disturbances must be avoided. A very small number of printing plants are equipped to produce magazines of large circulations. A clause in many union contracts extends the privilege to union workers to refuse to handle "struck" work. In case the book and job printing industry became intensively unionized, magazine publishers would be entirely at the mercy of the unions whose actions are more often motivated by the spirit of mob psychology than by reasoning.

Our great concern regarding this measure can best be explained by a brief statement of what has taken place in recent years in New York City, which in the printing trades is highly unionized.

Prior to 1925 New York City was the great job and book printing center of the country. Since that time, there has been a steady withdrawal of printing plants and the printing of magazines to localities offering more stable labor conditions. This exodus really began after the strike of 1919 in the printing trades, when the ruin of several periodicals was seriously threatened. Ten large plants employing nearly 5,000 men and 195 publications are now located or printing elsewhere.

In many localities, the enforcement of drastic union-shop rules renders union labor inefficient. Two years ago, one large New York publisher offered his union labor 10 percent increase in wages if they would withdraw the seniority rule. Its elimination would have saved him 25 percent on his printing costs. His offer was refused and the plant sold.

Frequently, the complement of men required by union rules on a press or some other piece of machinery is beyond all reason. For years, the publisher of Outlook was forced to use 6 men to operate the press on which it was printed. On the removal of this press to a nearby city, it was easily operated by 3 men.

The inability or failure of the union leaders to eliminate the communistic "cells" in the union ranks is generally known.

Because of these and other conditions, a majority of magazine publishers consider their interests in safer hands in open shops.

It would be impossible for any labor board to render fair decision in all cases arising under provisions of paragraphs 3 and 4 of section 7.

How could anyone determine whether discrimination had been made because of membership in a labor organization? How could an employer under some circumstances prove there had been no discrimination, even if there had not been?

If an employee once filed charges against his employer, he could never be discharged. Such an employee could always claim prejudice on the part of the employer.

Not only would the enforcement of these provisions tend to break down the morale and discipline of any industrial organization, but they would entail endless disputes and waste of time in their administration.

These provisions are characteristic of the drastic and impractical nature of the bill as a whole.

Last year, I made the statement before this committee that "The grave danger at this time is that labor will make greater demands than the recovery program at its present point can stand." That statement has now been fully substantiated.

Not only has union labor engaged in strikes at a time when with millions out of work it should have been a crime to strike because the losses entailed would retard recovery, but their demands for higher wages have resulted in higher prices for commodities, thus freezing the expansion of production, the only thing that will put the unemployed back to work permanently. To secure an expansion of production, the prices of commodities must be maintained at as low a level as possible.

Statistics of the operation of industry under codes, graphically demonstrate that shorter hours and higher wages will not promote increased production and accordingly, will not reduce unemployment.

Union labor is quite evidently, not interested in recovery. Higher wages is its first objective. To support labor in this objective by enacting this bill would permanently close the door to recovery.

Section 15 of this bill providing that nothing in the act shall be construed to interfere with or impede or diminish in any way, the right of employees to strike, really invalidates the main purpose of its provisions.

It is difficult for us to conceive how it would be possible for a labor board to enforce a decision against employees or a union under these conditions. From every viewpoint, this bill proposes to place industry absolutely at the mercy of labor, even to the point of destruction.

The employer, or capitalist if you wish, stands between his employees and the consumers of his product. The consumers dictate the price at which he may sell his product. Accordingly, in order to exist or insure a profit on his operations the employer must in turn be in position to control his costs including in a measure the prices he pays for labor and materials. To meet varying market and economic conditions, these costs must be elastic. Prices for labor in an intensively unionized labor market are highly inelastic.

One of the outstanding characteristics of union-labor regulations is their rigidity. It would be impossible to maintain an equilibrium between wages and productivity in an intensively unionized country.

The least concern to us by no means is the persistence with which these attempts are being made to control, in detail, the labor relations of the thousands of industrial organizations of the country. This bill reflects nothing short of regimentation of industry. It stands no better chance in our opinion to succeed, than did the N. R. A., which is now snowed knee-deep under thousands of conflicting exceptions and office orders about trivial matters. And to what purpose? Is it to load production with a sufficient burden to strangle it entirely? What then?

The CHAIRMAN. I did not suppose members of your organization employed many employees as such. Do not the members of your association submit the printing of their publications to organized printers?

Mr. HARRINGTON. A number of our membership own their own plants. Some of them own very large printing plants, employing from 2,000 to 3,000, and up to 4,000 employees in their printing plant.

The CHAIRMAN. I did not know that condition existed. That is not general, is it?

Mr. HARRINGTON. No; that is not general.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the representatives of the Employees Mutual Benefit Association of the Real Silk Hosiery Mills please come forward?

STATEMENTS OF WILLIAM BAUM, FORREST BADDERS, AND ISADORE FEIBLEMAN, REPRESENTING THE EMPLOYEES MUTUAL BENEFIT ASSOCIATION, REAL SILK HOSIERY MILLS

The CHAIRMAN. You three gentlemen, Mr. Baum, Mr. Badders, and Mr. Feibleman, are here representing the Employees' Mutual Benefit Association, Real Silk Hosiery Mills?

Mr. FEIBLEMAN. Yes, sir. We are representing the association from the Real Silk Hosiery Mills, which is a company union in existence for 13 years.

The CHAIRMAN. Where is it located?

Mr. FEIBLEMAN. Indianapolis, Ind.; it has had plants elsewhere, one in Georgia.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Baum, where do you reside?

Mr. BAUM. In Indianapolis, Ind.

The CHAIRMAN. You are employed where?

Mr. BAUM. Real Silk Hosiery Mills, Indianapolis, Ind.

The CHAIRMAN. In what capacity?

Mr. BAUM. Personnel director and industrial engineer.

The CHAIRMAN. In that plant you have an organization known as the "Employees Mutual Benefit Association"?

Mr. BAUM. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. How many members has it?

Mr. BAUM. It has approximately 2,500.

The CHAIRMAN. That is what percentage of all of the employees in the plant?

Mr. BAUM. The total number is approximately 3,000 in the plant.

The CHAIRMAN. Some do not belong?
Mr. BAUM. That is correct.
The CHAIRMAN. Nobody is compelled to belong?
Mr. BAUM. That is correct.
The CHAIRMAN. This is a company union?
Mr. BAUM. Yes; so called.
The CHAIRMAN. When was it organized?
Mr. BAUM. Thirteen years ago.
The CHAIRMAN. It effects representatives to engage in collective bargaining with the employer the Real Silk Hosiery Mills?
Mr. BAUM. Yes, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. How often do you have an election?
Mr. BAUM. Once a year.
The CHAIRMAN. Are the elections secret?
Mr. BAUM. Secret ballot; yes.
The CHAIRMAN. How many employees are chosen?
Mr. BAUM. There are 50 department directors, and an executive board that consists of 8 members, 4 of whom are selected by the employees and representing the employees, and the other 4 being appointed by the management to represent the management.
The CHAIRMAN. They settle all controversies between employees and employers?
Mr. BAUM. They settle everything pertaining to the employee from the time they are engaged until they leave.
The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed with your statement, Mr. Baum.
Mr. BAUM. I happened to overhear the testimony a few minutes ago in which Senator Wagner made the remark he had never heard of a contract between a company union and the company, but I am taking the liberty of informing him that there is such a contract between the Employees Mutual Benefit Association of the Real Silk Hosiery Mills and the company, for the purpose of collective bargaining.
The CHAIRMAN. What does that contract deal with—wages?
Mr. BAUM. It deals with wages, hours, and labor.
The CHAIRMAN. Is there a scale of wages set forth in the contract?
Mr. BAUM. The contract provides that wages must be according to the wages which must be approved by the E. M. B. A.
The CHAIRMAN. What is that?
Mr. BAUM. That is the name of the association, Employees Mutual Benefit Association, and we call it "E. M. B. A." The wage schedule is a contract between the company and the company union, and must be approved by the company union, which we call the "E. M. B. A."
Senator WAGNER. Is that contract approved by all of the employees?
Mr. BAUM. The executive board approves all wages.
Senator WAGNER. Which represents the employees?
Mr. BAUM. Yes, sir.
Senator WAGNER. In the election which is held, do those receiving the majority of the votes become the representatives of the association?
Mr. BAUM. That is right.
Senator WAGNER. So that you have the majority rule in effect?
Mr. BAUM. That is right, we have the majority rule; I was going to come to that.

The CHAIRMAN. Could you give us a copy of your contract?

Mr. BAUM. We do not have it with us. I am sorry.

Mr. FEIBLEMAN. We will be glad to see that it is sent to you.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no reason why you should not give it to us?

Mr. FEIBLEMAN. None at all, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BAUM. About 13 years ago when the Real Silk Hosiery Mills at Indianapolis, Ind., was a very small concern, it considered the advisability of establishing a so-called "mutual-benefit association" for the purpose of giving the employees a certain insurance and other benefit, and also to bargain collectively with the company. At that time the company was engaged in the manufacture of seamless hosiery, and at that time there was no outside labor organization or any union in that particular industry. So the organization was voluntary, and was not considered as started against any outside organization.

Mr. Fiebleman has the bylaws with him, and they can be furnished.

The CHAIRMAN. Do the members pay dues?

Mr. BAUM. The employees pay dues and are then entitled to insurance.

The CHAIRMAN. What dues do they pay; does it vary with the amount of wages they receive?

Mr. BAUM. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. How much are the dues per week?

Mr. BAUM. It is 60 cents per month for each employee.

The CHAIRMAN. What are the benefits?

Mr. BAUM. They are death benefits.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there any sick benefits?

Mr. BAUM. We used to have that, but when the depression came we had to drop it.

The CHAIRMAN. What are the death benefits?

Mr. BAUM. We pay $1,000.

The CHAIRMAN. So that whenever a member dies his dependents are given $1,000.

Mr. BAUM. Yes, sir; but some employees are entitled to a higher benefit, up to $4,000, if they pay the corresponding higher premium.

The CHAIRMAN. What are the assets of your company now?

Mr. BAUM. Of the Real Silk Hosiery Mills, or the association?

The CHAIRMAN. I mean the association.

Mr. BAUM. It is approximately $14,000 to $15,000.

The CHAIRMAN. Available at the present time?

Mr. BAUM. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. How many deaths do you have a year, approximately?

Mr. BAUM. Not more than perhaps 10 to 12.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you sometimes have to make a special assessment?

Mr. BAUM. No, sir; not so far.

Mr. FEIBLEMAN. Mr. Chairman, I might explain this payment of $1,000 into the group insurance, and does not come out of the E. M. B. A. treasury. It is group insurance carried with the Prudential Life Insurance Co.

The CHAIRMAN. I understand. You pay so much a month to an outside insurance company?

Mr. FEIBLEMAN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. But the premium you pay comes from the employees?

Mr. BAUM. Yes, sir; it comes from the employees.

The CHAIRMAN. And about 2,500 members belong to this association?

Mr. BAUM. Yes, sir.

Senator WAGNER. If an employee leaves or is discharged, do you reimburse him for whatever he has paid into the fund?

Mr. BAUM. According to the agreement between the E. M. B. A. and the insurance company, such employee who leaves the company has the right to change the group insurance into an individual insurance without a medical examination; there is no consideration. That is under the group insurance, and the rate is very small.

Senator WAGNER. It would seem that your plan limits the mobility of the worker because when he leaves he forfeits the right to insurance.

Mr. BAUM. You must understand it is all voluntary, and a number of people do not avail themselves of the advantage, because they do not have to do it unless they so desire.

Senator WAGNER. How many employees do you have in this association?

Mr. BAUM. Two thousand five hundred.

Senator WAGNER. What percentage is that?

Mr. BAUM. It is 82 percent.

The CHAIRMAN. We are particularly interested in the relationship of your association to the employers with respect to collective bargaining.

Mr. BAUM. The constitution and bylaws of that organization provide all matters pertaining to wages, hours of labor, employment, discharges, transfers, and promotions must be approved by the executive board, and that all matters pertaining to wages are subject to the approval of that board. It is not collective bargaining in the sense that we read it in the literature, but it is a matter of getting together and considering the advisability of making the wage increase or a wage decrease.

Senator WAGNER. Then it does differ from the ordinary collective-bargaining agreement?

Mr. BAUM. We have, yes; in this sense, that no wage can be introduced without the consent of the labor organization.

Senator WAGNER. Does the agreement itself set forth the exact wage that is to be paid to the workers?

Mr. BAUM. I think it does, but I haven't read it for such a long time, I am not aware, and we are not prepared to answer such a question, but we will send that to the committee.

As I stated before, the executive board consists of 8, 4 of whom are elected from the employees and 4 are elected or appointed by the management. In many respects the operation of this organization anticipated the provisions of the N. R. A., and in some respects the Wagner bill, but I am here as a representative of the E. M. B. A., which in its meeting last Wednesday voted unanimously to send two representatives, myself and the other gentleman, and it is my intention to inform you that the relations between the company and the employees during all of these 13 years were unusually harmonious.

The employees during the emergency did not lose their jobs, they were employed 100 percent, though at somewhat reduced hours and reduced wages, but there were no lay-offs.

However, the situation became a little disturbed after the N. R. A. went into effect, and an outside labor organization claimed that the E. M. B. A. was interfered with or dominated by the company.

The CHAIRMAN. When was this claim made?

Mr. BAUM. That was about August or September of 1933.

The CHAIRMAN. That was since 7–A was enacted?

Mr. BAUM. Yes; since 7–A went into effect. The company, not caring whether it bargained collectively through a company union or with Federation of Labor union, requested the N. R. A. officials to have a secret vote taken under its jurisdiction, because the company was informed that there was certain agitation, and there were outside meetings, and as we wanted to attend to business and not spend our time on these questions, we wanted to have it decided once and for all where our people stood.

Such a vote took place in October 1933, under the direction of the N. R. A., and it was agreed to by the N. R. A., and the company union, and the company, all of the details of the vote being worked out by these parties. The result of this secret vote was that approximately 2,000 employees were in favor of continuing the collective bargaining through the company union, the one they organized; in other words, a majority of the employees voted for the company union, and the E. M. B. A. won that vote.

Senator WAGNER. Do you mind an interruption?

Mr. BAUM. No; not at all, Senator Wagner.

Senator WAGNER. What prohibition of an unfair labor practice is there in this proposed bill which interferes with your organization—by the way, are you a workman of somewhat the higher class?

Mr. BAUM. I am somewhat higher, if you want to call it that.

Senator WAGNER. What is your position?

Mr. BAUM. I'm the industrial engineer and personnel director, and I am a member of the board.

Mr. FEIBLEMAN. But you are not a stockholder in the company.

Mr. BAUM. That is correct; I am not a stockholder.

Senator WAGNER. What is there in this bill which will interfere with the continuation of your organization?

Mr. BAUM. I have read the bill and the days come back to me when we were——

Senator WAGNER. If you will pardon the interruption, I would like to know what particular provision interferes with your organization.

The CHAIRMAN. Just a moment; Senator Murray would like to ask a question.

Senator MURRAY. I would like to inquire whether you represent the management or the employees.

Mr. BAUM. I represent the executive board of the company union. On the board, I represent the management.

Senator MURRAY. Were you selected to your present position from the employees; were you engaged in working in the factory before you were elevated to your present position?

Mr. BAUM. Not at the Real Silk Hosiery Mills.

The CHAIRMAN. You came to this position from the outside; you were not an employee who was elevated to this position.

Mr. BAUM. That is correct.

Senator WAGNER. Now I understand the situation.

Mr. BAUM. The other gentlemen here represent the employees.

Now, the objection is this, if I may answer your question, Senator. Under this bill the outside labor organization will undoubtedly say this organization we have is dominated by the company, or is interfered with by the company. They have done so in the past, as to such an organization, and it has never been proved. In this case it would go to the board, and it would be left to the discretion of the Labor Board to say whether the company interferes or not, and it might eventually lead to the abolishment of this organization. That is what we fear.

Senator WAGNER. You have no faith in officials doing justice according to the evidence submitted?

Mr. BAUM. I have that very much so. As a matter of fact, I was brought up to look up to authority, and I, like yourself, Senator Wagner, was born in Germany. I lived there, was brought up to respect authority, and lived up to it; but I have seen enough of life in this country to know that if a labor board happens to be unfriendly to nonunion employees, it could easily find ways and means of saying there is interference.

Senator WAGNER. That is the basis of your argument?

Mr. BAUM. That is the basis.

The CHAIRMAN. You were about to tell what happened after this election, and we would like to have you proceed with that.

Mr. BAUM. This election, as I said, resulted in a majority vote for the company union, and in spite of the fact that all of the parties agreed to abide by this election, within 7 months after the election the representatives of the labor union presented a closed-shop agreement to the management with the request of signing it by midnight on that same day.

The CHAIRMAN. In other words, you claim the minority group were among the employees that presented this mandate?

Mr. BAUM. That is right; the members belonging to the union.

The CHAIRMAN. Did this minority group actually form a labor union of their own?

Mr. BAUM. They established a branch of the Federation of Full-Fashioned Hosiery Workers.

The CHAIRMAN. After the election, then, you had this employees' association that was endorsed by 2,000 votes, and another organization composed of a lesser number.

Mr. FEIBLEMAN. That branch he has referred to had been in existence for a number of years.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the membership of that?

Mr. BAUM. I don't know, and they don't tell, but my guess is between 200 and 300.

The CHAIRMAN. They presented this closed-shop contract?

Mr. BAUM. Yes; and the company said, in view of the agreement with the Government and the company, and it could not sign such an agreement, because it was bound by the result of the vote.

Thereupon, one unit, namely, the knitters, went on strike, a very disastrous strike, and a very violent strike, causing the employees untold losses, and causing the company untold losses.

The CHAIRMAN. How long did it last?

Mr. BAUM. It lasted 7 weeks.

The CHAIRMAN. How was it settled?

Mr. BAUM. It was settled here in Washington by the National Labor Board.

The CHAIRMAN. By what decree?

Mr. BAUM. By the decree that the strike is over, that the men go back to work as soon as work is available, and that those who were found guilty of violence would not be taken back, and that the E. M. B. A. represent the majority of the rule.

Senator WAGNER. That was satisfactory, was it not?

Mr. BAUM. It was satisfactory and fair, but it was not fair to the minority for them to still claim that the company union has any right of existence, and if the Wagner bill goes through, the company union will be thrown out in no time.

Senator WAGNER. Of course, one can say anything, but I wish you would devote yourselves to what is there in the proposed bill that will do it.

Mr. FEIBLEMAN. Would the American Federation of Labor say if under the terms of this bill the mill and the E. M. B. A. would sign an agreement that nobody except a member of the E. M. B. A. could be employed, making it a closed shop under this bill?

The CHAIRMAN. You can do that under this bill.

Senator WAGNER. That would be a legal agreement, under this bill.

Mr. FEIBLEMAN. It is contrary to the whole foundation of the E. M. B. A., which has made itself a voluntary organization throughout the many years.

The CHAIRMAN. There is nothing in this bill which would prevent the minority from continuing their agitation just as they did after the vote was taken and even after the decree was entered, because I assume, as you say, they have taken up agitation for a trade union.

Mr. FEIBLEMAN. Mr. Chairman, if you please, I think there is this in the bill that is germane to the discussion at this time, if you will permit me to state it.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; you may proceed.

Mr. FEIBLEMAN. It is this, that the Board is to determine whether there shall be a unit election or a vertical or interplant election. If the Board is given that determination instead of the employees, you are going to have a constant recurrence of this situation, like the one that took place last year, and this strike.

The CHAIRMAN. In other words, it would be possible for a trade-union organization to control a majority of employees in one unit who would be a small minority of the whole plant.

Mr. FEIBLEMAN. That is the situation.

The CHAIRMAN. And if they are permitted to engage in connection with that in collective bargaining independently, they could proceed to make exactly that situation that might tie up the whole plant, and which would not be approved by the majority.

Mr. FEIBLEMAN. That is correct. It is an important group like the knitters, where the whole thing was locked up.

Senator WAGNER. What would you say about that?

Mr. FEIBLEMAN. I would say each plant should be determined by the plant. If you want any majority rule, it should not be the majority of a small unit, but a majority of the entire plant, and if 2,000 men want to keep on working 500 men should not have the power to stop them.

Senator WAGNER. Of course, you have got to lodge somewhere the responsibility for deciding the question as to how an election shall be held. I believe the least partial body, the Government, is the proper agency to decide that, rather than the employer or the employees.

Mr. BAUM. For our part, for the last 15 years the employees wanted to be represented by the entire body.

Senator WAGNER. The election held by the National Labor Board was held in the entire plant.

Mr. BAUM. That is right.

Senator WAGNER. The Board held that would be the fair way.

Mr. BAUM. That is correct.

Mr. FEIBLEMAN. Yes; somebody might come along and say it is not fair, and that they want it by units.

Senator WAGNER. But if the question has been decided by the Government through this Board, you have the prestige of an official body having passed upon the question.

Mr. BAUM. I may say this: I have had several experiences with the old National Labor Board, and I have nothing but the highest regard and respect for their desire to be of service to the country, the employer, and the employees. I am speaking only from my past experience, and I don't know whether in the future that can be continued on account of certain pressure that is being brought upon that Board.

Senator WAGNER. I was a judge before coming here, and I never could satisfy both sides with my decisions; one side thought I was an eminent jurist, and the other side did not think quite so much of me. My experience was the same on the National Labor Board—when we decided one way, the other side criticized us. As a matter of fact, while the industrial members on that Board were among the leading employers of the country, with one or two exceptions, our decisions were unanimous. We had men like Mr. Teagle, employing 300,000 workers, and Mr. Swope, representing the General Electric, with I don't know how many employees, and Mr. Clay Williams. We all agreed upon these decisions, but even with the industrial members agreeing, we could not satisfy the employers, as a rule. Sometimes they said it was fair, as you did today, when the decision was against them, but the general human experience was that you could not satisfy both sides.

Mr. FEIBLEMAN. Will you permit a statement, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly, Mr. Feibleman.

Mr. FEIBLEMAN. As I understand the present bill provides for representatives both of industry and of labor, and I think the 1934 bill did, but this new bill does not.

Senator WAGNER. That is correct, it does not.

Mr. FEIBLEMAN. Is there any reason for that?

Senator WAGNER. I would say the reason for that is that the concensus of opinion is that only the public should be represented.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you favor representation of labor and the employer?

Mr. FEIBLEMAN. I think that probably would be better.

The CHAIRMAN. You have pointed out your views about it on this matter under discussion now, but suppose we had no legislation at all, and that the organization in the knitters' union, which I understand is a small minority of the employees, there decided that if then in the relationship they may have with the employer they can cause a strike and tie up the whole plant.

Mr. BAUM. That is correct, Mr. Chairman; they can do that.

The CHAIRMAN. It is my judgment, even if this bill existed, and even if you have a majority of the employees bargaining with the employers, and the knitters are dissatisfied, they could strike. Am I correct?

Senator WAGNER. Yes.

Mr. FEIBLEMAN. As I understand the agreement, there can be no action except by the direction and sanction of the new board for injunctive relief, and no proceeding in law or equity can be brought.

Senator WAGNER. The bill is limited to unfair labor practices, and it does not take in everything else.

Mr. FEIBLEMAN. I think the labor practices should be broadened to include unfair acts of labor organizations against the employer. I think this is one-sided, and it is a poor rule that does not work both ways.

Senator WAGNER. Yes.

Mr. BAUM. Employees do things against the management that they should not do.

Senator WAGNER. If there is any intimidation or violence or threats of violence, you can go into the courts today and get your injunction.

Mr. FEIBLEMAN. What is the situation in a case we have right now? There is a strike at Terre Haute, where, as I understand, the outside union came into the plant and there are now 468 people on strike. Giving this as hearsay, I am informed that those busy in organizing the union said to those who were employed at the plant, either you must join this union, or, if you do not, we will have a closed shop here and you will lose your job, and in that method they prevailed upon the people to join the union. When the matter comes up before the Regional Labor Board, they say the law doesn't say anything against us coercing or intimidating the employees, but it is only on the part of the employer, so the employer cannot complain.

Senator WAGNER. It depends on what you mean by coercion. Courts have said that the moment you have a picket anywhere near a plant, that is coercion. Courts have authority to deal with the question, and, of course, you know that as a lawyer.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course, this natural right on the part of the employer to hire and discharge whoever he sees fit is a fundamental right upon the part of the employer, just as much as it is a fundamental right upon the part of the employee to work or not to work. If that right exists in one employee, it exists in a hundred, or in a thousand, and they can walk out on a strike at any time, and nobody can prevent that, because a man can leave his work any time he sees fit.

Now what this bill says is that this right on the part of the employer is going to be stopped in certain respects, that he cannot exercise that natural right to discharge a man because the man chooses to join a labor organization, that he cannot discharge that man or a group of men because they do organize into a union, that he cannot discharge that man or the representative of that man because they do elect representatives and ask the employer to bargain with them.

That is about all it says, and it does not take away the fundamental natural right of the employer except in these few specific instances, the four named in the bill, and it says the right of the employee to organize is so inherently in the public interest that the employer cannot raise objection to it.

Mr. FEIBLEMAN. As I understand, if a collective-bargaining contract is made, the employer is expected to be bound by it and abide by it, and he would be guilty of an unfair practice if he did not.

Now any rule, if it is a good rule, should work both ways, and if that collective-bargaining contract is formulated and is made for the entire plant, shall one unit have the right to disregard it?

The CHAIRMAN. As I read this bill, if an agreement of collective bargaining is entered into, by the representatives of a majority group with the employer, and a minority group chooses to strike, they can do so.

Senator WAGNER. This bill does not go beyond that. As a matter of fact, it seems to me you would get a distinct benefit out of legislation of this kind, because of the judicial determination as to who represent the majority of the workers.

Mr. FEIBLEMAN. Do I make my point clear, that if you have that majority vote, that the vote should be determined, that the manner of the vote should be determined on the unit so as to protect it from being broken by the other smaller unit, or any of them, and in the agreement, if the agreement is made should not both sides be bound by it?

Senator WAGNER. That is quite correct; they should both be bound.

Mr. FEIBLEMAN. But there is no relief on the part of the employer, there is no right of injunction relief.

Senator WAGNER. You have that right already.

The CHAIRMAN. The theory of this bill is to take such steps and permit such steps to be taken to lead up to collective bargaining. It does not go to the point of this, that the employer must make a bargain, and does not go to the point of where he chooses to make a bargain the employees must live up to it. It assumes collective bargaining will remove a good many of the difficulties and preferably prevent strife.

But, if the employer refuses, his men can strike or not strike, and if the sense of the minority group was not to accept this, it is presumed they would have the right to act as they see fit, and there is nothing in this bill to prevent it.

Mr. FEIBLEMAN. One of the points I am trying to make, and I may not be stating it clearly, or effectively, is this, when a plant has voted in its entirety, and there has been a majority vote, I say it is wrong that a board should say no, we do not want that vote by the entirety, even though 2,000 employees voted that they wanted the company plan, and a unit of 500 could be permitted to control the entire factory.

The CHAIRMAN. You cannot take away from a man the natural right to refuse to work. You can say, here is an agreement entered into by a majority vote with the employer, and if anybody does not live up to that, and if anybody thinks that is slave wages, or thinks conditions are unfair, he has still got to stay at his work. You cannot do that. If I have four servants in my house, I cannot make an agreement with three of those servants and by that agreement bind the fourth one. If he says he will not stay on that agreement, I cannot bind him in that way. The right to quit must be there.

We agree with you on the moral aspects of it, that if a majority of the employees choose to have representatives and in good faith they do make a bargain, under moral laws and moral sense of propriety, they should live up to it and carry on the agreement as long as it lasts.

But we are confronted with the question of whether we shall take the legal steps to force the employees to subject themselves to employment wages and conditions which he is personally unwilling to take, and 50 or 100 more are unwilling to take.

Mr. FEIBLEMAN. The point I want to make, Mr. Chairman, is this, if the plant has entered into a vote, and the majority of those employees have voted for a certain collective bargaining, then I say the right to determine whether there should be a vertical plan, or a unit plan in that plant, should be determined by the employees and not by your board. That is the point I want to make.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the point I want to make.

I suspect the final determination of this Board of those circumstances; it will at least do nothing to the employer after he has done that, and that it would use its influence to make the minority accept the agreement of the majoriy as to the collective agreement, so far as they could, but if this minority group says they will not work under such an agreement, they can stop.

Senator WAGNER. It is very difficult for employers and employees to agree on how these elections shall be held. In most cases the Labor Board finally gets an agreement, but there is a controversy about it.

Mr. FEIBLEMAN. The Government determined that, and that is all right; but I think the employees should have the right to say whether the vertical plan shall apply to the plan, or whether the unit plan shall apply.

Senator WAGNER. As a matter of fact you know that the employees' desire will be followed in nearly every instance. This is not an employer's matter at all.

We never had any great difficulty in working out how these elections should be held, and the only controversy we have had was as to whether there should be an election or not.

Mr. FEIBLEMAN. If you have a board that is not representing both industry and labor, that may run one way or the other. You will have necessarily opinions that will go in accordance with the most people.

Senator WAGNER. The labor representatives here agree with you because they have urged this committee to change the proposed law so as to have both industry and labor represented.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Badders, you are one of the gentlemen appearing here representing this Employees Mutual Benefit Association.

Mr. BADDERS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What is your name?

Mr. BADDERS. Forrest Badders.

The CHAIRMAN. You are employed by the Real Silk Hosiery Mills?

Mr. BADDERS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You live in Indianapolis, I assume?

Mr. BADDERS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the nature of your employment?

Mr. BADDERS. Knitter.

The CHAIRMAN. Were you elected as the representative of the Employees Mutual Benefit Association?

Mr. BADDERS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What do you call the position you occupy?

Mr. BADDERS. The one I am on now is on the executive board.

The CHAIRMAN. Was there some other board you were on?

Mr. BADDERS. No; I was a department representative.

The CHAIRMAN. How did you get elected to that?

Mr. BADDERS. By secret ballot.

The CHAIRMAN. A ballot from the knitters alone?

Mr. BADDERS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. First you were elected from the knitters alone, on a departmental committee, and now you are elected as a director of the whole organization?

Mr. BADDERS. Yes, sir; that is right.

The CHAIRMAN. What are the functions of the departmental board you are on?

Mr. BADDERS. It is not a board, but in case any employee has a complaint, they will come to me.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there representatives of the management on that departmental board also?

Mr. BADDERS. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. It is just representatives of the knitters?

Mr. BADDERS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. To whom do you bring these grievances after you consider them?

Mr. BADDERS. The representative tries to straighten them out with the management, and in case it cannot be done, it goes to the executive board.

The CHAIRMAN. Of which you are now a member?

Mr. BADDERS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You were elected in a secret election?

Mr. BADDERS. Secret ballot; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What do you want to say to us about this bill? I suppose you are in favor of your present organization and want it retained, and do not want this legislation to interfere with it?

Mr. BADDERS. Well, we just want to stay where we are; we are satisfied.

The CHAIRMAN. You think the majority of the employees are satisfied, and you do not want us to pass legislation that will interfere with your rights to proceed as you are now proceeding?

Mr. BADDERS. That is correct.

Senator WAGNER. In what way does this proposed bill interfere with your organization?

Mr. BADDERS. I think it should be left up to the employees to decide whether they want the company union or the outside union.

Senator WAGNER. In what respects does this bill interfere with that right?

Mr. BADDERS. Since you have explained it, I do not think it does. The only thing is, I do not think there should be units, and I think the majority should rule, like it does right now.

The CHAIRMAN. You think some steps should be taken to prevent a unit being able, by not cooperating with the Employees Mutual Benefit Association, to cause a strike to tie up the whole plant?

Mr. BADDERS. Yes. sir; that is it.

The CHAIRMAN. You think everybody should be bound by the majority of all of the employees, who would be assumed to deal fairly with all of the employees.

Mr. BADDERS. Just like that is now; that is, the majority want it.

Senator WAGNER. Let me say, since it has been brought up, suppose the employer has three plants nearby one another, but the workers in one plant are not acquainted with the employees of another. If we adopt a theory that all of the employees of these three plants must have one election to select the representatives of the workers, then you are going to have men in this plant that may be required to vote for a man that they do not know anything about in the other plant. I am talking about the difficulty in setting up in a general law under what type of conditions an election will be held, because there are so many different conditions, and that is why there had to be lodged somewhere the responsibility, and the question now is whether an independent governmental board can do it much better than the employees or the employers.

Mr. FEIBLEMAN. I should think then where there are separate and distinct plants, not located together, there should be separated plant units.

Senator WAGNER. Who is going to decide that?

Mr. FEIBLEMAN. The law can provide for it.

Senator WAGNER. You mean have the law provide that elections shall be had in each plant?

Mr. FEIBLEMAN. Yes.

Senator WAGNER. Then it would present this difficulty, that there may be in one plant different types of workers that have no relation to the others; for instance, one type must have a different type than the other, where the wages paid to them, and the conditions of their employment, are entirely different from the conditions of the other workers.

Mr. FEIBLEMAN. There is, of course, that condition.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you think there would be objection to outside mediators coming in?

Senator WAGNER. Yes; when you do put outside mediators in from the union, or the labor organization, they do know their conditions.

Mr. BADDERS. In our case we have our departmental representatives and they all know the conditions in their one department.

Senator WAGNER. Does your constitution provide that you can have as the representative of the workers only someone actually working in the plant?

Mr. BADDERS. Yes, sir; it does.

Senator WAGNER. You cannot elect an outsider?

Mr. BADDERS. No, sir.

Mr. FEIBLEMAN. There is an arbitration clause, and that is the board representing the management, and the board representing the employees cannot agree, then two arbitrators are chosen, one from each side, and those two select a third, and that decision controls, so far as concerns the two arbitrations, since this organization was formed, 13 years ago.

The CHAIRMAN. I will ask Senator Wagner this question, because I think you are interested in the answer, affecting the objection you have in your mind. Would the fact that the board of directors of this mutual association sit in with—and I assume are obliged to negotiate with the directors from the management, make this a company organization, and dominated or controlled by the management.

Senator WAGNER. I suppose that at the actual contract stage some representative of the employer must be present to bargain for him.

The CHAIRMAN. I believe "interference" has not been stricken out, but "restrained" is.

Senator WAGNER. The second section of the unfair labor practices is that which prohibits the employer from dominating or interfering with the formation or administration of any labor organization or to contributing financial or other support to it.

Mr. FEIBLEMAN. In that connection, I will ask Mr. Badders, "What do you receive in pay as a knitter?"

Mr. BADDERS. Around an average of $50 per week.

Mr. FEIBLEMAN. What was it during the worst time of the depression—assuming we are out of it now?

Mr. BADDERS. We were working short hours, and I imagine we were running around $35.

Senator WAGNER. Are you paid anything for your representation on this board?

Mr. BADDERS. They pay 5 percent, but that is for the time lost in the organization.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you mean 5 percent of the week's wage?

Mr. BADDERS. Five percent of what I make in dozens that I run.

The CHAIRMAN. What do you mean, by the hour or piece?

Mr. BADDERS. By the piece.

The CHAIRMAN. Let us see how it would work out. If you earn $4 in 1 day, the company would pay you 5 percent of that?

Mr. BADDERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. FEIBLEMAN. That is compensation for the time taken away from his work?

Mr. BAUM. I can explain that for you. At the time this organization went into operation the representatives complained to the board that when they were taken away from their machine they would lose what is usually called the "ultimiticity", they get away from everything, and after they have attended to the representation business, they go back to the machine and they have to start again. Therefore, they say they lose money by it, and then the board decided they would give 5 percent allowance on their week's run.

The CHAIRMAN. So if this man ran $50 he would get $2.50 for being a member of the board?

Mr. BAUM. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. Would he get that whether they met every week or not?

Mr. BAUM. We do meet every week.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the day of the meeting?

Mr. BAUM. Wednesday.

The CHAIRMAN. How many hours are consumed in the hearings?

Mr. BAUM. It is according to what has to be done, but it is generally about 1 hour.

The CHAIRMAN. Then if it was only about 1 hour, he would get $2.50 for that 1 hour spent that week, or whatever time in addition may be taken away from his work.

Mr. BAUM. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. FEIBLEMAN. Let me just make this further statement. This Mutual Benefit Association is purely a voluntary association on the part of the employees, and at their own expense. They took it up with the company to pay the expenses, and the company declined to do so, so that they are entirely on their own initiative and at their own expense.

Now, without taking up the bill section by section, there are a few suggestions I would like to make.

I think in the definition of an employee I think it might be well to exclude employees who have been found guilty of acts of violence; in other words, a man who is out on strike is continued to be an employee, and I think if he is found guilty of violence his employment should cease.

Section 9 in the definition says that the term "labor dispute" includes any controversy regardless of whether the disputant stands in the proximate relation of employer and employees, and I ask whether any outside organization of any character can come in there and constitute a labor dispute?

Senator WAGNER. That is recognized by the Norris-LaGuardia Act, from which that was taken.

Mr. FEIBLEMAN. It also provides that the member who makes the investigation is not disqualified from sitting in a later hearing, and it would seem to me to put him in the position of being both prosecutor and court. And also in connection with section 10, as I understand it, they can take up matters on their own motions rather than waiting for some complaint, so that it makes them a grand jury, a prosecutor, and a court, all three, and it seems to me that this is entirely too broad.

We have already discussed the matter of financial aid, in connection with the fact that this company has been paying insurance.

The CHAIRMAN. How much is that?

Mr. FEIBLEMAN. Not a large amount, but I think it is something like 5 cents to each 60 cents.

Mr. BAUM. Mr. Chairman, I can explain that. The employees paid 60 cents per month, and then the rates of the insurance company were raised on account of the depression and the employees earning less money; since that time the company paid the difference, which is 9 cents, the rate being 69 cents as against 60, and the company paying the 9 cents difference.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course, assuming that the employees should sometimes decide to have a trade union, that would not prevent them from carrying on in your Mutual Benefit Association just as you are now. It would leave out your insurance in the collective bargaining, but it would not interfere with the insurance plan which you are now carrying on.

Mr. FEIBLEMAN. As long as this labor organization has the right to bargain under this law, it is not supposed to get any support from the mill.

The CHAIRMAN. So far as this insurance is concerned, it would not interfere with them whether they belong to the association or not. However, you want that safeguarded.

Mr. FEIBLEMAN. The words "interference, coercion, and financial contribution" are important to us. I mentioned the point about the closed shop where they could be forced to join the association, in the agreement E. M. B. A., but that is a voluntary association purely, and they want to keep it that way.

Mr. BAUM. Would this mean that we would have to have another election?

The CHAIRMAN. No; I think it would probably be better to have another election, but the day after the passage of the bill you could immediately enter into an agreement with the employer for a closed shop, and you can say in that closed-shop agreement nobody will be allowed to be employed unless he belongs to the association.

Mr. FEIBLEMAN. As far as the E. M. B. A. is concerned, it prefers the present voluntary situation that people do not have to belong unless they choose.

Now, as to the court matter here, our plant is located at Indianapolis, and if any matter in that plant came up, it would go to the United States Circuit Court, and that means we have to go to Chicago. Why should you have it in the circuit court rather than the district court? I do not understand that.

Senator WAGNER. That was done so as not to have the delay of going through the lower court, but you go from the circuit court to the Supreme Court.

The CHAIRMAN. The argument made in favor of that was to prevent appeals, and to have a decision directly and hastily made in cases of labor trouble.

Mr. FEIBLEMAN. We think that is a long distance to travel, at a loss to the employees.

In that same section it says that an appeal, unless so ordered, shall not operate as a stay of the Board's order. That is contrary to the rules in appeal and other circumstances.

Senator WAGNER. You have to make final an order preventing the unfair trade practice, and in order that no injury may be done, the court is authorized to grant a temporary injunction.

Mr. FEIBLEMAN. I was thinking of the analogy where you get a judgment and there is an appeal; a levy does not take place when the appeal is entered.

I have already mentioned the point about the exclusive right of action being in the Board, but it seems to me the employer or the employee should have the right of action, and not depend entirely on the initiative of the Board itself.

Finally, I do not see why you should have to put in a definite recognition of the right to strike. It seems to me in a bill of this kind that is intended to lead the harmoniousness and prevent strikes, it would be much wiser if you would insert in this bill that there shall be no strike until after the matter had been presented to the newly created Board and mediation attempted, instead of asserting what is the legal right known to everybody that any man can strike, and can quit if he wants to. However, here there is direct sanction given to it, so I say why should it not be expressed that there shall not be any strikes until you have presented the matter to the Board and we have tried to mediate and get you together. It seems to me that would be better, and would more tend to lead to harmony and prevent strikes.

The CHAIRMAN. We thank you for your suggestions, and we will give them consideration.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND., March 27, 1935.

DAVID I. WALSH,
Chairman Senate Committee on Education and Labor,
Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: As requested in connection with the hearing had before you on Friday, March 22, on Senator Wagner's bill for National Labor Relations Board, we are handing you herein a copy of the agreement made and entered into between the Employees' Mutual Benefit Association and Real Silk Hosiery Mills, Inc., after the election designating the association as a representative of all of the employees for collective bargaining.

We are also taking the liberty of handing you herewith the written memorandum, which we ask be annexed to and made part of the testimony and statements of the Employees' Mutual Benefit Association of the Real Silk Hosiery Mills in opposition to a number of the provisions of this bill.

The writer's statement of objection, summarizing the situation, was necessarily brief by reason of the fact that the time was divided among three representatives.

All of us appreciate greatly the time allotted to us for the hearing, the consideration shown, and the interest manifested by the committee, and particularly the chairman and secretary.

Trusting that a bill will be agreed upon that will be fair both to industry and labor, and not in the interest of any one organization, but with due consideration to a long-established and successfully functioning association like that of our client, we are,

Yours sincerely,

BAMBERGER & FEIBLEMAN,
Attorneys for Employees' Mutual Benefit Association of Real Silk Hosiery Mills of Indianapolis.

AGREEMENT

This agreement, executed in duplicate by and between Employes' Mutual Benefit Association of Real Silk Hosiery Mills, Inc., of Indianapolis (hereinafter called E. M. B. A.), and Real Silk Hosiery Mills, Inc., with its mills and executive offices at Indianapolis, Ind. (hereinafter called Real Silk), witnesseth:

That whereas Real Silk has been for a number of years, and now is, engaged in the manufacture of silk hosiery and lingerie, with its principal mills in the city of Indianapolis, Ind.; and

Whereas the E. M. B. A. has been in existence for the past 12 years, its principal duties being to pass upon all matters relating to employment, rates of pay, and working conditions in connection with said Real Silk, and, generally, to look after the welfare of the employes of Real Silk; and

Whereas said parties have cooperated harmoniously during all of the years of existence of said E. M. B. A. without a written contract; and

Whereas on or about the 4th day of October 1933, at an election lawfully held for the purpose by the employes of Real Silk, the E. M. B. A. was chosen to represent such employes in their collective bargaining with Real Silk, in accordance with the provisions of the National Industrial Recovery Act; and

Whereas, in view of the enactment of the National Industrial Recovery Act, provisions of which have been, and are, observed by both of the parties hereto, it is deemed advisable that a written contract be entered into:

Now, therefore, in consideration of the premises, and of the promises, covenants, and agreements, hereinafter contained, it is agreed by and between the parties as follows:

1. Real Silk recognizes, and agrees to continue to recognize, said E. M. B. A. and its duly authorized officers and directors as the organized representatives of its employes, and agrees to deal with said E. M. B. A. and its officers and directors as such organized representatives, who are entitled to represent Real Silk employes in collective bargaining between the parties hereto.

2. Real Silk agrees to name four directors to represent it upon the executive board of said E. M. B. A., and further agrees to abide by all of the rulings and acts of such board.

3. In the event of a tie vote by the executive board of the E. M. B. A., Real Silk agrees that its directors upon such board shall name one member of an arbitration committee as provided by the bylaws of said E. M. B. A., and that Real Silk shall be bound by the decision of the arbitration committee on all matters referred from time to time to such committee.

4. Real Silk agrees that the executive board of directors of said E. M. B. A. shall pass upon all matters relating to working conditions, wage compensations, hours of labor, and other similar matters, and that it will observe and be bound by the decisions of said executive board, and by all rules and orders of the executive board pertaining to employment, lay-offs, discharges, rates of payment, hours of labor, working conditions, and all other matters and grievances, whether or not herein specifically mentioned.

5. Real Silk further agrees to provide funds for the maintenance of the employment office of said E. M. B. A., its management and clerical help, a doctor and a nurse, and to furnish space, light, heat, and equipment and supplies for such activities, without charge to said E. M. B. A. Nothing in this section contained shall be construed as limiting the right of Real Silk to make contributions to group life insurance, and any other contributions, from time to time, as Real Silk as shall see fit to make.

6. The E. M. B. A., on its part, agrees that it will recognize the employee directors elected by its members in conformity with its bylaws; that it will observe the findings, orders, and rules of the executive board; that in the event of a tie in a vote of the executive board, the employee directors shall select one member of an arbitration committee, having no connection either with said E. M. B. A. or with said Real Silk Hosiery Mills, all as provided by the bylaws of the E. M. B. A., that it will fairly, faithfully, and impartially represent the employees of Real Silk in all collective bargaining, and in all other matters of national concern, in full accord with the terms and spirit of its bylaws and with the terms and spirit of the National Industrial Recovery Act, and all rules and orders laid down by the administrators of said act, or by any authorized board or official provided by said National Recovery Act having jurisdiction over matters pertaining to said Real Silk and said E. M. B. A.

7. Both parties hereto specifically and generally agree to observe and obey, both in letter and in spirit, all laws enacted by Congress, and all rules and orders laid down by any board or official appointed or established under such laws, having jurisdiction over the parties to this agreement.

8. This agreement may be modified by consent of both parties hereto, not, however, in any manner that will violate or set at naught the purposes and

MEMORANDUM ON BEHALF OF EMPLOYEES MUTUAL BENEFIT ASSOCIATION OF REAL SILK HOSIERY MILLS, OF INDIANAPOLIS, TO BE ATTACHED TO AND MADE PART OF STATEMENTS AND TESTIMONY GIVEN BY WILLIAM BAUM, FORREST BADDERS, AND ISIDORE FEIBLEMAN

Te Employees Mutual Benefit Association of Real Silk Hosiery Mills, Inc., was incorporated in June 1922, as shown by the facsimile of its charter printed in the original constitution and bylaws booklet, copy of which was left with the committee. It functioned as an agency for collective bargaining from its inception and long prior to the depression or any thought of the National Industrial Recovery Act.

Membership in it has always been voluntary, not compulsory, and it is so provided in the bylaws.

In the earlier days the association provided for sick benefits and relief of various kinds. It no longer does this, but the members pay dues of 15 cents per week, which goes toward payment of group insurance, each member receiving $1,000 of group insurance, now written in the Prudential Life Insurance Co., a small portion of the premium being contributed by the mills. The employment is entirely in the hands of the association, and there are various other benefits, such as dental and eye examinations, and also legal advice, but these benefits are granted to all employees alike, whether members of the association or not. Only members of the association, however, are entitled to participate in group insurance and may take out larger policies upon payment of the additional premium.

An election was had in October 1933 to determine as to representatives of the employees for collective bargaining. The ballot contained the names of the Employees Mutual Benefit Association and the American Federation of Full Fashioned Hosiery Workers Union. The vote resulted in 2,016 votes being cast for the Employees Mutual Benefit Association as against 1,054 in favor of the American Federation of Full Fashioned Hosiery Workers Union. Notwithstanding this election, the latter organization refused to deal through the Employees Mutual Benefit Association, insisted on dealing with the mills direct, and upon recognition of its union. Because of this the Hosiery Workers Union called a strike in April 1934; the strike lasted 7 weeks, cost the employees payroll losses of approximately $300,000, and cost the merchants of Indianapolis the benefit of the expenditure and reexpenditure of this money and was a large factor in the mills showing a loss of $350,000 for the year 1934.

The National Labor Board took the matter up after the strike was in progress for the period named, determined that the Employees Mutual Benefit Association was the duly elected representative of all the employees for collective bargaining, and arranged that the strike terminate, all employees to be restored to work excepting those who were guilty of violence.

Men employed in the mills averaged wages of from $30 to $50 a week, and women employed at the mills averaged from $20 to $30 per week. The entire force, although at somewhat shorter hours and at reduced pay, were kept employed during the entire period of the depression. The strike occurred at a time when literally hundreds of unemployed people of Indianapolis were walking the streets looking for work.

We are not taking the position that there should be no new law enacted. We are of the opinion, however, judging from our own experiences of equal representation of management and employees, with only one arbitration as provided for by our bylaws, in a period of 13 years, that neutrality is important. We believe that on any new board created there should be representation of industry and of labor in equal numbers, and with a neutral chairman.

We do regard the bill, as submitted, requiring amendment in a number of particulars. We have suggested the following points for your consideration:

1. The definition of "employee" in section 2 (3) should be so drawn as to exclude those guilty of acts of violence, as we are of the opinion by such acts they should lose their right to be considered employees.

2. We regard the definition of "labor dispute" in section 2 (9) as too broad in its inclusion of disputants, regardless of whether they stand in the relation of employer or employee. We have found in our experience that the most difficulty has come from nonemployees asserting the right to bring about a dispute between employer and employees.

3. Section 5 provides for prior inquires by members and agents of the board without disqualification from participation in subsequent hearings.

4. In section 10, clause (c) there is further provision that the board, when it has reason to believe that any person is engaged in unfair labor practice, shall itself file a complaint on its own motion. It is our opinion that these two clauses put the board in the position of being prosecutor, grand jury, and court, a situation that does not work for impartiality.

5. Section 8 defines "unfair labor practice" for an employer, but does not include any provision respecting unfair labor practice on the part of employees or others. It is proverbially a poor rule that does not work both ways, and we are of the opinion that there should be no coercion, interference, or restraint on the part of employees or representatives of organizations.

Clause 2 of this section forbids the employer to interfere with the administration of any labor organization, or contribute to financial or other support. For almost 13 years the employer has named employees as four of the members of our executive board, and there has been the harmonious relation hereinbefore mentioned, and yet we can readily see how a national board might determine that the naming of four members of the executive board of our employees by the mills was an interference which would do away with the whole plan and structure of our association, which has functioned so effectively for so long a period.

Furthermore, the mills contribute a small portion of the payment of premium due on group insurance on the lives of the members of our association, and this might be construed to be financial support. (See clause 5 of the contract.)

6. Section 8, clause 3, provides that there may be an agreement with a labor organization to require as condition of employment membership therein. Membership has always been voluntary in our association, and we have not sought to have agreement for a closed shop, which would prevent others than those belonging to the Employees Mutual Benefit Association to be employed at the mills. We favor freedom of contract, and the American right of individuals to belong or not to belong to an organization, and should prefer there be no such clause in the law. However, we realize if it is left in that it may be necessary for the good of our organization to request such a contract.

7. We are most strongly opposed to section 9 (b), which provides that the National Board shall decide whether the unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining shall be the employer unit, craft unit, plant unit, or other unit. We have in the mills some 20 to 25 possible units, and to permit each one to have its own representatives for collective bargaining would be most detrimental to the requisite harmony for the good of employer and employees. It seems to us in the interest of genuine democracy and recognition of majority rule, that the employees themselves shall determine whether the election should be by separate units or for the entire plant. One particular unit having the right to bargain separately might be a basic one, interfering with the entire operation of the plant, with the result that 300 employees, for example, might interfere with the welfare and continued employment of 3,000. The least interference of Government in industry in this particular is, from our viewpoint, most desirable, and we are considering it from the standpoint of the employees.

8. Section 10 has already been referred to with respect to the board, under paragraph (c), having the power to initiate complaints on its own motion Not only is this section objectionable from that standpoint, as heretofore set out, but it sanctions having outsiders appear as witnesses, and provides that the rules of evidence prevailing in courts of law or equity shall not control, which would permit the admission of hearsay evidence, gossip, and whatnot. There certainly can be no valid reason why such hearings, if held, should be upon complaint of interested parties, and should have applicable to them the usual rules of evidence.

9. Paragraph (f) of section 10 provides that in case orders are not obeyed, the board may petition the Circuit Court of the United States. Here in Indianapolis that would mean hearings would be held at Chicago, with consequent expense and inconvenience to employees who might find it necessary to be in attendance as complainants or witnesses at such a hearing. We can see no valid reason why the United States District Court, sitting here, could not have such jurisdiction conferred on it.

10. Section 11 of the bill provides that proceedings in equity which prevent and restrain unfair labor practice, shall be solely at the request of the national board. It would appear to us that the Employees Mutual Benefit Association, or any other representative of the employees for collective bargaining, should have the right to seek such relief direct, without the necessity of obtaining the sanction and the action of such board. Otherwise, a day in court might be denied aggrieved parties.

11. Finally, we take most serious exception to section 15, which provides "nothing in this act shall be construed so as to interfere with, or impede or diminish in any way, the right to strike."

It is generally conceded that such legal right exists. It does not need such recognition by the law and, for our part, we deplore seeing such implied sanction of strikes. Our own experience of last spring's strike is still fresh in our memories, and, instead of encouraging strikes, as might readily be the interpretation of this section, this law should distinctly discourage them in the interest of "the free flow of commerce" and "the general welfare" desired and expressed in the declaration of policy of the act in section 1.

In our opinion, a strike should be the last resort, not the first, with its consequent unemployment, losses to employees, employer, merchants, and community. A wiser provision, in our judgment, would be that there should be no right on the part of employees to strike, or on the part of employers to "lock out", in wholesale fashion, without justifiable cause, until after the proposed board had used its good office and exhausted every effort to bring about a mediation and reconciliation of the parties. As we view it—and again we are talking as employees—we realize that unless the employer can live and prosper he cannot hire and pay employees; that any National Recovery Act should not be for the aggrandizement either of labor or capital, industry or employees, but should be fair and impartial to both.

There has been a mutual working together of representatives of the Real Silk Hosiery Mills and of the employees through our association, as exemplified in almost 13 years of successful functioning. So-called "company unions" of the type like ours should not be restricted, restrained, or forbidden. They make for harmony between employer and employee. They create proper working conditions, satisfactory salaries, and harmonious and contented employer and employees. That, in our opinion, is what is needed generally to usher in the much-desired new era of prosperity.

Respectfully submitted.

Mr. Mowitz, if you will come forward, we will be glad to hear from you.

STATEMENT OF ARNO P. MOWITZ, OF PHILADELPHIA, PA., REPRESENTING THE FULL FASHIONED HOSIERY ASSOCIATION

The CHAIRMAN. Will you state your full name?
Mr. MOWITZ. My full name is Arno P. Mowitz.
The CHAIRMAN. And you reside at Philadelphia, Pa.?
Mr. MOWITZ. Yes, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. Will you state in whose behalf you appear?

Mr. MOWITZ. I appear in behalf of the Full Fashioned Hosiery Association, of the Eastern Full Fashioned Hosiery Mills, 100 in number, employing about 30,000 men and women.

The CHAIRMAN. What is your business?

Mr. MOWITZ. I am a lawyer.

The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed, Mr. Mowitz.

Mr. MOWITZ. I want to say, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, that this organization of these hosiery mills was formed for the sole purpose of standardizing wages and working conditions. This organization insists upon its members paying at least a minimum wage which we have established, and we have succeeded to the point where that standard is not only accepted universally by employers alike today, but is cited as the standard in the union contract.

Senator WAGNER. Are those companies unionized?

Mr. MOWITZ. We are open shop, but we leave it up to the employers to do what they want to.

Senator WAGNER. Have you a collective bargaining agreement?

Mr. MOWITZ. We leave that entirely to them. This association does not dictate that policy.

Senator WAGNER. The reason I asked was because one of your associations made a collective bargaining agreement with its workers, and did it in the presence of the National Labor Board; but, I believe, that was another association.

Mr. MOWITZ. That was another association, Senator Wagner. Mr. Haynes was leading that group and it has a closed shop union agreement.

Senator WAGNER. It comprises a great many workers.

Mr. MOWITZ. About 3,000 to 10,000 are employed, I think. We employ about 30,000, and we have about 70 percent of the production capacity of the United States.

You have heard, and you will hear arguments from the large dealer association, which I do not pretend to be, on the legal phases of this bill, but I want to carry my part of the standard, because I am a practical executive myself, and not merely a lawyer.

I look at it very largely from the standpoint of the employees, because I have handled a great many labor disputes, and the first requirement I have is to know what the man is paying, because if he is paying fair wages he has a case, and if he is not paying fair wages, he has not a fair case.

Therefore, I am going to confine myself to two things only from a practical standpoint, and that is, this bill as previously proposed and to a very large extent as now proposed has engendered a great deal of suspicion from the employers of labor, not alone from what the wording of the bill may protend but because of their experience in dealing with labor, particularly organized labor, in the effort to organize their mills on a union basis.

We hold no grief for an employer who forces representation on the part of his employees, and if that representation is obtained under fair means no fair employer should object to it.

We believe that the provisions of this bill undoubtedly favor the kind of activities which we think will not be fair. We find that while you have eliminated the word "influence" from last year's bill, you nevertheless have significant wording here which leads us to go back to the old principle, and that is this: You say we may not dominate and interfere and those are terms which need and require definition.

The personnel of your labor board or arbitration board, whichever it is will determine that, and we are sailing into the winds. We believe those terms could be qualified, and thereby gain the confidence and support of the people with whom you tried to make the few arrangements, where we are now strengthened in our apprehension by the present wording of section 2, which merely makes an exception to the effect that the employer can be prohibited from not permitting his employees to confer with him without loss of time or pay.

We do not know what that means except to limit against the employment of definitions of the words "dominate or interfere."

The CHAIRMAN. The purpose is to limit those words as you have stated.

Mr. MOWITZ. We come then to this, that our main objection to the practical phase of this bill is that you tie the employers' hands in an attempt to arrive at amicable relation and working terms with his employees.

The CHAIRMAN. I do not think there is anything in this bill to prevent an employer when his employees, the men and women are about to organize from posting a notice, or writing each an individual letter, or personally stating to each that he thinks their best interest is to form a company union, that is violently opposed to so-and-so who is attempting to organize a union. I do not understand there is anything in the bill to prevent an employer from doing that, and that is why we struck out the word "influence." That would be influence, and not interference.

Senator WAGNER. I think you are getting frightened with words.

Mr. MOWITZ. No; rather I am speaking out of a good many years of experience.

Senator WAGNER. Is there not a difference between conference and interference in the administration of a union?

Mr. MOWITZ. There might be, but I call your attention to this, and you come to subsection 3 of section 7, and you have this language that nothing in this act shall preclude an employer from making an agreement with a labor organization for a closed shop, union or nonunion, with a labor organization representing the majority of his employees, providing that organization was not formed as the result of a violation of any of the foregoing provisions.

There, you are putting the employer in a position he does not know whether a minority group among his employees happen to belong to another labor union, and may come in and claim that this is a violation of the company organization, contrary to these provisions. Do not forget, gentlemen, that your Labor Board may take testimony, and that your appeal is not to a Federal court of the first instance, but that your appeal is to the circuit court of appeals, and that the finding of facts of the Board, which may be based upon hearsay evidence, is conclusive.

Senator WAGNER. That is the rule of the Federal Trade Commission and of other boards that function quasi-judicially.

Mr. MOWITZ. But it could be.

Senator WAGNER. No; it could not.

Mr. MOWITZ. Then, why put it in, if it could not be?

Senator WAGNER. You would not want to have a board of this character, without power to investigate. If it was new, we would not put it in probably; but as I have said, all of these quasi-judicial boards have that power, and it is not new; and why should this board be dealt with differently?

Mr. MOWITZ. Because it belongs to a condition different from those others you mentioned, and different rules apply. You have provided for a condition that is entirely one-sided, if your bill should become a law; and it would not be satisfactory to the situation we have in our industry, and in many others that when our people do not want to join the union they find milk bottles with acid in them, and things like that, thrown in their homes. Would you say that is obtaining membership by coercion?

Senator WAGNER. You know there are policemen to stop that sort of thing?

Mr. MOWITZ. Yes; I know that; and we have spent almost a fortune to find out who did it, but we have not found out.

Now, I do not object to organized labor; I think organized labor has its proper place; and if it employs proper means, no one can object. They are in business just as the manufacturers are in business; their executives are paid as the executives of a factory are paid. They have a job to perform, and if they perform, and if they perform it under the same circumstances we have to perform ours, and show the goods they have to sell are the right goods, and they can convince the workers that is what they need, they are perfectly entitled to have the benefit of their labors.

I have no objection to that.

Senator WAGNER. You believe that the workers ought to be free to join or not join just as they see fit—free from any interference in any way by the employer?

Mr. MOWITZ. Yes; I agree to that.

Senator WAGNER. An employee does not interfere with the employer when he organizes a trade association; the employee does not attempt to interfere with that organization; and as I pointed out today, these trade associations may agree upon their code, and they adopt a rule that the minority is bound by the rule of the majority.

There is no interference by the employee, and that right is protected by law, and we say that the law should be also to allow the employee to organize by himself without interference from the employer.

If there is any violence or anything of that kind exercised, there is a remedy in law today, but we want to keep them free in that right from the economic pressure and influence which undoubtedly the employer has exercised to control his job.

That is why those two matters ought to be dealt with separately.

Mr. MOWITZ. Yes; but I don't follow you to this point that the employee should be free; there is no doubt about it; but when you have an outside organization who are in business, coming in, not only attempting to intimidate the employee that is concerned in this question but the employer as well—and there is no doubt they have succeeded, through those methods I have referred to, in coercing our employees into their organizations—and then for them to sit around a table and ask that we should treat with them in good faith, we do not think that method should have any protection at all.

Senator WAGNER. You have your remedy, or your employee has a remedy, if there is intimidation, and he is forced to join a union. However, if the employer forces upon the employee a company-dominated union, the employee has no remedy to go in court and complain, and there is not anything for him to do but lose his job.

Mr. MOWITZ. Yes; I can understand where some employer would do that.

Senator WAGNER. You know, in these cases the great majority of our employers want to be absolutely fair with their workers; and there are many company unions that are not dominated at all, and are very fine institutions; but this has to deal with the employer who attempts to interfere with his employees and not permit them to organize freely. You are the first one who has addresed yourself in this manner to these provisions of the bill, and I think you are apprehensive about it.

Mr. MOWITZ. No; I speak from actual experience.

Senator WAGNER. Of course, if there is a threat of violence, or actual violence is committed, you shall still have the right of injunction in the Federal court, notwithstanding the passage of this bill.

Mr. MOWITZ. Not in a great many States, because we haven't that in Pennsylvania, for instance.

Senator WAGNER. Yes; I think you have.

Mr. MOWITZ. I know, but try to get a commitment for contempt.

Senator WAGNER. The right exists, if you will go into court, so why put it in again, when this bill is dealing with the relationship of employer and employee?

Mr. MOWITZ. If you will place us on the same basis as the labor union—and when I speak about labor union, I am talking about organized labor; if you will place us on an equal basis and let us compete with it, then it would be quite a different matter; and if we cannot offer the workmen something better than they can get from the organized labor, then we cannot complain.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Mowitz, if you have anything further, we would be glad to have you submit written briefs.

Senator Donahey has presented to the committee a petition which he received from the president of the Buckeye Lodge of the Amalgamated Association of Iron, Steel, and Tin Workers of North America, which petition is signed by 20,000 steel workers, favoring this bill.

The letter submitting this petition to Senator Donahey is as follows:

MONDAY, MARCH 25, 1935

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION AND LABOR,
Washington, D. C.

The committee met at 10:30 a. m., in room 318, Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

Present: Senators Walsh (chairman), Murray, and Donahey.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will please come to order.

Mr. Merritt, will you take the witness stand?

STATEMENT OF WALTER GORDON MERRITT, REPRESENTING THE LEAGUE FOR INDUSTRIAL RIGHTS, NEW YORK, N. Y.

The CHAIRMAN. What is your full name?

Mr. MERRITT. Walter Gordon Merritt.

The CHAIRMAN. Where do you reside?

Mr. MERRITT. New York City.

The CHAIRMAN. And your profession?

Mr. MERRITT. Lawyer.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you appearing in your individual capacity or as a representative of some organization?

Mr. MERRITT. I will appear for the League for Industrial Rights, and in my individual capacity as a practicing lawyer interested in the matter for a great many years.

The CHAIRMAN. Tell us something about the League for Industrial Rights.

Mr. MERRITT. The League for Industrial Rights is an employers' association, representing employers.

The CHAIRMAN. National or local?

Mr. MERRITT. National.

The CHAIRMAN. National. How many members has it?

Mr. MERRITT. About 1,000.

The CHAIRMAN. About 1,000 members of any particular industry, or of all classes of employers?

Mr. MERRITT. All classes.

The CHAIRMAN. I understand, Mr. Merritt, that you have had particularly wide experience in what may be called industrial cases in your cases in the courts relating to differences between labor and industry. Am I correct in that information?

Mr. MERRITT. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. And how many years have you been making a special study of this class of legal practice?

Mr. MERRITT. Over 30 years.

The CHAIRMAN. And you have appeared as counsel in a great many of these cases?

Mr. MERRITT. In a great many, and a great many of the leading cases.

The CHAIRMAN. And usually representing the employers, I suppose?

Mr. MERRITT. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. We will be very pleased to have you proceed in your own way to present such views as you think would be helpful to the committee.

Mr. MERRITT. At the outset, because of the fact that I do represent employers, and have acted for them in many cases against organized labor, I would like to make it clear to the committee my general position in that concerning matters of this character.

I am not out of sympathy with the purpose of this bill to promote equality of bargaining power between employers and employees, and to diminish the causes of labor disputes; I am not out of sympathy with the parts of the declaration of policy which are along the same line, nor am I out of sympathy with section 7, which defines the rights of employees.

The CHAIRMAN. Employees?

Mr. MURRAY. Employees.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. MERRITT. It has always been my contention that organized labor is an institution of great usefulness to this country, and that it has accomplished a great deal for the good of the country. I will go so far as to state that were it not for organizations, actual and potential, both union and nonunion, employers would not treat their employees with the same consideration and would not be today concentrating so much upon the problems of the betterment of the conditions of the employees.

As to the whole conception of antiunion oppressive policies I would like to say that in spite of my position I have been publicly on record in editorials written—one I have in mind in 1920—as opposed to this repression of the natural right and natural freedom of employees to organize. As to the expediency of a measure of this kind to promote such a policy centralizing in a national board in Washington, with arms that can reach out to the remotest parts of the country, thus attempting to by legal compulsion promote this idea of collective bargaining and minimize labor disputes, I myself have grave doubts. It is not a practicable approach from my point of view, because I believe better methods were being worked out by more intimate contacts between employers and employees. The human relationship factor is the all-important factor, and not the factor of strategy, law, and boards.

The CHAIRMAN. Repeat that, please.

Mr. MERRITT. I believe that better results were being worked out by more intimate relations between smaller groups of employers and employees than can be worked out through any widespread national control. On the other hand, those are questions which are arguable. I feel that I may be wrong in my approach, but there are certain phases in this bill on which my convictions are very strong that the bill is absolutely unsound and unjustifiable by virtue of its partisanship and its lack of constructive policy. These are matters which, to my mind, are matters of right and wrong in the simplest terms of those words.

The bill, we will have to concede, must be described by its proponents as a drastic, radical reform. It is aimed to compel compulsory dealings between employers and labor unions where a majority of their employees so desire it. It seeks to force those compulsory dealings by drastic legal processes. The employer must bargain collectively with such an agency regardless of whether it is a good agency or bad agency, and cannot separate himself from the employees who select that agency, no matter how socially unsound that agency may be, or how devoted it may be to wrongdoing and unsound social qualities. An employer must not restrain, interfere, or coerce employees in such matters.

Moreover, the essence of this compulsion, which is found in section 8 of subdivision 3, forbids the employer by discrimination in regard to hire or tenure of employment, or any term or condition of employment, to encourage or discourage membership in any labor organization.

Moreover, the bill goes further and says that if a majority of the employees belong to a union and the employer being forced by economic conditions is required so to do, he may enter into a closed-shop agreement requiring as a condition of employment that the balance of the employees join the labor union.

And then in section 9 as adding to the further completion of this picture of compulsory bargaining with the bad agency we have the so-called "majority rule", whereby the employer on the vote of a majority of his employees must deal solely with the agency of the majority notwithstanding the fact that the minority, though it may be as much as 49 percent, have no voice whatsoever in the majority agency. So it is not unfair from my point of view to state that this is a measure which provides for compulsory dealings with a selected organization regardless of what that organization may be. And it is a compulsion which runs on one side only. The union may at any time refuse to deal with the employer. Unions have often refused. It is an option on the part of the unions to deal with the particular employer in any case where the majority of the employees so require it. It seems to me that if we are going to embark into any national attempt to reconstruct labor relations on any such broad basis as this that we should pursue a sound legislative policy regulating the organizations with which we have to deal which, by virtue of this act, we might say become impressed with the public interest. Perhaps there is no other point in this bill that is as important to me as that. It is the fact that these organizations have been largely relieved from legal restraint by various enactments of Congress and State legislatures so that there is not the same restraint on their wrongdoing that there once was.

Now, this bill comes forward and goes a step further and supplements the policy of relieving these organizations from legal restraint by saying that now you have relieved them from legal restraint you must deal with these unrestrained, unsupervised, unregulated private societies which have complete control over their own membership as much as any private society, and which are not subjected to any attempt to correct their well-known abuses.

I cannot believe, Mr. Chairman, that any bill of this character, which does not attempt to curb the wrongdoings and in the long run promote collective bargaining, I cannot believe that organizations unrestrained in their wrongdoings, and with no curb on their bad practices can do as well in promoting sound collective bargaining as organizations which are subject to reasonable restraint and supervision in return for the privileges which it is supposed to extend to them. Neither can I believe, taking the other statement or purpose of the act, that any such lopsided approach to the situation, which seeks to impose great privileges on organizations which like all other human institutions, engage in wrongdoings, all these great privileges, and does not in any way seek to regulate them, or supervise them for the benefit not only of the members but for the public and of the employers with whom they have to deal.

The CHAIRMAN. Would not that be a difficult thing to work out in a legislative bill?

Mr. MERRITT. I think it would be a very simple thing to work out. I think if this bill were amended in effect stating that a labor organization as defined in section 7 or 8 is a labor organization which shall conform to certain standards of decency and fairness and democracy in the administration of its affairs, that that would be one method of approach.

The CHAIRMAN. Would it not be difficult to define "decency" and "democracy"?

Mr. MERRITT. I do not think so. I can state my standards right here as illustrative of what could be worked out. I do not understand that the problem has even been approached.

The CHAIRMAN. May I suggest that you draft an amendment of that kind?

Mr. MERRITT. I would be glad to.

Another suggestion to accomplish the same end would be a statement to the effect that it would not be a violation of the act for any employer to refuse to deal with a union for just cause, and then define the just causes. And those just causes would go to the very inherent nature of the organization itself.

If something of that kind could be done, so that these tremendous institutions, which are so capable of good or ill in their societies could be brought up to the ordinary standards of morality in business and commercial life the bill would be in my opinion enormously improved.

It is an extraordinary fact in a development of this subject that down to a comparatively few years ago the employer was the one who was the primary relying on the law for the protection of his rights against the overt acts of labor organizations. He was the one who was coming into court and enjoining their combinations in restraint of trade, their violence, their intimidation, and their other wrongful conduct. He did that for a long period of time. And finally Congress by the Norris-LaGuardia Act discouraged any attempt at legal correction in that way, and discouraged it to such an extent that as to large and important classes of things designed to protect the public against oppression and privation the discouragement is almost equivalent to prohibition.

Now, we are approaching the problem in the opposite way. We are not only making it difficult for the employer to correct the labor union in its wrongdoing, by any appeal to the court, but we are inviting the unions to come into court for the protection of their rights, and thus the union is to become the legal aggressor under this act for the protection of its right as against the employer who used to take the initiative in the courts for the protection of his rights. We have completely reversed the policy, and in reversing it suddenly giving such a more powerful position to these organizations by virtue of the fact they are not legally restrained and by virtue of the fact that they have to be dealt with, no matter what they do, we have put them in a position which is quite different, and one which falls for radical changes in policy, and for some restraint and supervision of the unions themselves.

I feel that now the time has come to codify certain sound principles relative to industrial disputes and relative to the administration of the affairs of these private societies as against a condition of their having the privileges of this act.

I may make the mistake, Senator, of repeating myself, but you will, of course, remember that you are the only member of the committee present, and I would like to complete my statement on this point.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course all of your statement will be printed and be available to all of the members of the committee.

Mr. MERRITT. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. And to the members of the Senate also. But your presentation is perfectly proper.

Mr. MERRITT. If we are going to have a governmental overlord over these situations, why should not that overlordship extend as far as practicable to a correction of all of the major abuses which have been the abuses which habilitated against collective bargaining?

Mr. Emery was reminding me of the fact that I well knew, that two of the greatest employers' associations in this country, which have become two of the severest critics of the unions, were simply associations which were organized in the first instance to deal with labor unions. They tried it. And the history of that trial is not creditable to the labor organizations. And it resulted finally because of the unfortunate experience in their taking an absolutely opposite attitude.

If matters such as I have in mind had been written into law in some way as a restraint on the conduct of labor unions, those organizations today might be still and might have been uninterruptingly collective-bargaining organizations thoroughly believing in the good of labor unions.

I do not know that it is necessary to maintain my factual background that labor unions sometimes do wrong. Anyone experienced with human affairs knows that that must be so. We know that no organization, to use a mixed metaphor, will ever reach up its hand and take down and put on its own bridle. There had to be restraint. Hitherto I had thought that restraint would arise to a large extent from the competitive position of organization. We needed strong labor unions to keep the employers on their tiptoes, but we needed strong other kind of organizations to keep the labor unions on their tiptoes. And these should be struggling for a social sanction and trying to render a service which would be in the public interest.

If, however, we are trying to promote a more monopolistic state of one type of organization, we are setting up a situation where there is more likelihood of abuses because of the lack of one of those restraints as applied to labor organizations.

Lest I be looked upon as the severe critic of labor unions because of my long-standing affiliations with employers, I want to quote a paragraph from an article in the Atlantic Monthly for December 1934, written by Mr. Newton Baker. It reads:

> The cloak of respectability and partial immunity from police control soon extended over a much wider field of operations, and gunmen, educated to protect rum running, extended their rackets into labor controversies, so that the free bargaining between employer and employee, sought to be assured by recent Federal legislation, has with increasing frequency become a conflict between the employer, denied police protection, and the employee represented, whether he wants to be or not, by determined men who have taken force into their own hands, violently destroying property and intimidating employer and employee alike as they cruise around from one place to another calling themselves the shock troops in the labor war.

I also want to quote from Mr. Justice Brandeis, giving a unanimous opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Dorchy v. Kansas. It reads:

> The right to carry on business—be it called liberty or property—has value. To interfere with the right without just cause is unlawful. The fact that the injury was inflicted by a strike is sometimes a justification. But a strike may be illegal because of its purpose, however orderly the manner in which it is conducted.

My purpose in making these quotations is to bring this committee right back to a position comparable to that taken by President Roosevelt along about 1905, when he was engaged in his crusade against trusts. He drew the distinction, which the public understood, between good trusts and bad trusts, and insisted that the legislation must be against the bad trusts.

I want to see the distinction drawn between good strikes and bad strikes. And when I say that I do not mean the question of the degree of wages, which, of course, is a standard that is impossible to lay down, and between good unions and what I may say, to borrow the vernacular of the labor unions themselves, the yellow-dog unions, of which there are some, and of which there cannot be any question there are some, and which Mr. Baker's own statement convinces me that there are some.

If we can set up this codification which will show the difference between encouragement of bargaining and strikes for industrial justice, and the discouragement of wrongdoing, the use of strife for industrial injustice and social wrong, then we will have made a very constructive contribution to this whole subject. But to take under your supervision this question of the enforced dealings between employers and labor unions in the face of the known fact that there is such a large amount of wrongdoing internally and externally in labor organizations and their administration without in any way seeking to correct the evils or state the conditions under which unions shall get this privilege is, to my mind, unsound legislative policy, and it comes down, as I think I will show you by one or two illustrations, to two very elementary questions of right and wrong.

The employer should have the right of selection and discrimination in the public interest, in the interest of the workers, and in the interest of self-defense under certain circumstances, which I believe it is perfectly possible to define.

And let me say this to you, Senator, in considering the constitutionality of a measure of this kind. If you say to me: "I have had an agreement with a labor union. It flouted it today. It is in the hands of radicals, and they will flout every agreement when it comes down to flout it, and that it proposes to enter into agreements and then strike when the merchandise is on the machines." And the Board under the mandatory provisions of this act says, "I cannot discriminate against any labor union or any members of any labor union", then I say to you any attempt to impose such compulsion upon you is clearly unconstitutional. And I as a lawyer would advise my clients as a matter of law, whatever might be the wisdom of the policy, under the circumstances that I would refuse to deal with that labor union, and thus open myself by an act of self-destruction to its repeated wrongdoings. And I would let the matter go into the courts and let a question of constitutional law be raised, and it would be raised under circumstances which would have every possible human appeal in it.

We have had some very interesting situations in New York this winter which bear upon this point.

I had been counsel for the realty advisory board on labor relations, which for a period of months had been handling the actual and threatened elevator strikes. You will not recall the details, but on November 21, 1934, as the result of threatened strikes a contract was entered into with the Building Service Union. It was entered into at the behest of the mayor of the city, and the borough president of Brooklyn, Raymond V. Ingersoll, the Regional Labor Board, and others.

It contained various provisions, and among those provisions was one providing for arbitration of the standards of wages and hours. That arbitration proceeded deliberately to consider the questions and gave full time to everybody concerned. The union appointed as its arbitrator the president of the union, and we of the realty board appointed a man whom we thought capable of representing our interests, and Maj. Henry H. Curran was appointed the chairman.

After about 2 months of deliberations an award was rendered.

Just prior to that award the union president stated there were one or two things upon which he disagreed, but with most he said he was then in entire accord. But he said, "Whether I sign it or not the union will abide by it."

The award was rendered. And he went to his union meeting and the union declared it would not stand by the award and was going to declare a strike. And strikes began to take place. The union president himself, who had sat on that board, did not sign the award, stating that he was prepared to lead the forces into a fight for a new and better and different agreement, in utter disregard of this award.

We were down in the mayor's office until 4 o'clock one morning trying to adjust that matter with the help of some very able, and the successful help, representatives of the American Federation of Labor, and with various city officials all sitting in on this situation.

And an adjustment was reached after strikes had taken place which did settle the strike. We had in the course of 2 weeks there three sets of organized strikes in violation of agreements by that particular union.

Now, suppose we had elected not to bargain collectively with that union again. Suppose we had elected not to enter into further arbitration with it. You and I know that that would have been a very natural, human, and just thing to do under all circumstances if my statement of the facts is correct. You and I know in the ordinary affairs as between man and man there are incentives for good conduct and penalties for bad conduct and of the laws and reward and punishment for their application.

I say this law applies in the teeth of all of that and gives the same right to an organization which violates its agreement to insist upon a state of compulsory wedlock with the employers as it does to the legitimate and lawful organization, and in that respect this law is wrong. And it is that respect more than any that I get back home in my town the opposition and criticism of this law.

Let me take another situation which again grows out of the experience of one single man like myself in the course of this last winter. We had a situation on the water front in New York where the teamsters' unions and the longshoremen's union entered into a combination that no freight should be handled by steamship common carriers if it were so-called " nonunion freight."

The program as laid out was ultimately to control the conditions of production in every factory by not allowing common-carrier service to be extended to nonunion freight. It was stated to the leading civic organizations in the city, when they were trying to adjust this matter, that for the moment this extended only to these particular deep-sea steamship lines on the water front, but that they were already progressing in the matter so it would extend to all railroad terminals and to other points on the Atlantic seaboard. So we have the situation developing that the common-carrier obligation of serving the public without discrimination was to be completely broken down and the union by the exercise of its board, because it was in a strong strategic position, to determine what products should be transported by commerce and what products should not. And that determination was to depend upon whether or not the products had at some time become commercial leopards by reason of the fact that they had touched the hand of a nonunion man, a sore spectacle as to those who believe in the right of the employees to determine their own self-organization.

We sought an injunction in that case naming as defendants some 50 labor unions and some 50 steamship companies, because they were acquiescing in this process rather than undergo the strikes. Some strikes were called against steamship companies who had tried to exist, and those strikes were in violation of collective agreements which had arbitration clauses for all disputes in them. So you had this union policy, not an adventitious situation, but a fundamental union policy in violation of collective-bargaining agreement to prevent these shippers from enjoying the public rights, from having their products serviced by public carriers. In principle it was exactly the same situation as if the employees of the Pennsylvania Railroad

Co. had refused to move the midnight train last night because I was coming down here.

The court held that these steamship companies, because they did not discharge the men who refused to perform the duties of handling and checking this freight, were themselves coconspirators and liable criminally and civilly as members of a combination to deprive us of our rights.

This act would compel those employers to continue to be criminals. It would compel them to go on and deal with this organization, which was pledged to this antisocial, illegal, and criminal policy. If they went out on strike it would compel them to take them back, because you could not separate the discrimination against them for this policy from their discrimination against them as union men. It was a settled union policy.

By that illustration I want to bear home to you the necessity of writing in this bill a standard of what is a proper labor organization and what is not a proper labor organization, or a standard, if you will, of what should be a just cause for an employer to refuse to have dealings with a particular labor union.

We have had situations in New York, with which probably you are familiar, whereby we have built Chinese walls around New York to prevent products from coming in there from outside States.

In the particular instances that I have in mind, which I am perfectly prepared to specify if it is desirable, the products excluded were not simply nonunion products, but products union or nonunion, which came from outside the State, because the purpose was to secure an exclusive market for the local manufacturers, and those who employed members of the local union as distinguished from members of some other affiliated local in another State.

In order to carry out that policy the union in New Haven, for instance, calls a strike of employees in a particular factory who are producing for the New York market. They say, "We are going to stop the spring which supplies the stream of interstate commerce from New Haven to New York, cutting it off at source. We won't allow stuff to be produced for the New York market. If you produce it for another market, very well, but we are trying to aid those fellows in maintaining that Chinese wall around New York."

Then on top of that where one or two products get through strikes of all trades are called on buildings, because these products are being used in connection with that particular building. Those are not combinations solely between employers and employees of the conflicts, but employers and employees who are to some extent conflicts between harmonious organization of employer and employee in one section and a harmonious organization of employers and employees in another section, each desiring competitively, as is their right, to enjoy the New York market.

So there you had strikes against the production for the New York market and you had strikes to prevent the sale or installation of those products in the New York market at the point of distribution. What are you going to do with a situation like that under this bill?

Have I, as the Dextone Co. of New Haven, which is a producer organization, seeking to have its market used in New York City, got to resume relations with these same union men the day after they have refused to produce products for the New York market? Maybe you will say to me—I do not know what Senator Wagner would say—that discrimination against the union on that ground is not discrimination against the union. But I do not think he would say so. I do not think any of the proponents of this bill would say so, because the bill itself says "any labor union."

I take it, so far as the wording of the bill goes, that I have to carry on relations, and the majority of my employees want it, with a communistic organization pledged to my destruction. Absurd, you may say, by virtue of the extremity of the illustration which I give, but extreme illustrations are useful in developing an idea, and it is my purpose here in this branch of my argument to develop the idea that it is absolutely an unsound legislative policy and an unsound social policy to say that you will have to do business with these organizations, regardless of their wrongdoings, regardless of the fact that they are absconding with the moneys of members, not accounting for them, regardless of the fact that they are devoted to illegal practices, and that the time has come, if you are offering these privileges to these organizations, to impose some hostages for good behavior, and to set up some reasonable standards—I do not ask for restrictive ones—as to what is a legitimate organization that can enjoy the benefits of this act, or what is the basis of a just cause on which an employer can refuse to deal with these organizations?

Let me now pass on to the question of majority rule. I am entirely out of sympathy with it. I would suppose every liberal was out of sympathy with it. I have talked with men in New York who have held other social philosophies from what I have held, who I regarded as almost radical in their liberalism, and they look upon this majority rule as a rule of repression. I am referring, of course, to the rule set forth in section 9 that a majority of the employees may determine what shall be the collective bargaining agency for all of the employees.

You have undoubtedly had this called to your attention by other people, so I will not go into it at great length. You know it is absolutely at variance with the President's policy set up in March 1934, in the automobile industry, and you know with what glow of elation, if one may judge my words, the President described that policy of proportional representation as a great forward step in social pioneering. This majority-rule situation is absolutely opposed to that. I do not for a moment mean that 6 out of 100 should have a separate representative. There, of course, must be reasonable limitations. But in these days when we have been struggling for a minority representation and trying to devise means whereby the majority may be heard, because we realize that often it is true that the minority today may be the real ideas of tomorrow, that is the liberals' viewpoint.

The CHAIRMAN. Do I understand from this bill that the minority can be that?

Mr. MERRITT. They cannot be an agency for collective bargaining.

The CHAIRMAN. That is true.

Mr. MERRITT. If they are not members of that agency.

The CHAIRMAN. But before any agreement for collective bargaining can be entered into they may be heard by the employer.

Mr. MERRITT. Yes. And I dare say they can be heard after it is entered into.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. MERRITT. So far as they have any ideas that will not interfere with the collective bargaining or do not relate to the vital questions covered by collective bargaining. I think you are throwing them a deflated balloon when you say they may talk with the employer, but on all important matters what they have to say will be of no consequence.

The CHAIRMAN. So far as making a joint agreement?

Mr. MERRITT. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Between the employers and the employees.

Mr. MERRITT. And what would you say as to the administration of the agreement; for all practical purposes the parties to the agreement are the ones that are going to determine its administration?

Of course, any man, even though he is not a member of the bargaining agency, can present a grievance or can present a complaint. But for all practical purposes he is going to be dependent on the tolerance of the agency.

No, you have labor unions which are private societies. Some of them with closed books which won't take any new members. They can readily take the position, and they do take the position, as I could give you by illustrations, that they won't take in new members under certain circumstances, or they won't take in members who have offended in the past by working in open shops. They are barred by this situation even though they constitute 49 percent. I think the majority rule is wrong in that respect. I think some percentage rule might be necessary from a practical viewpoint, if you are going to have a collective bargaining agency. But why, if you have a committee of ten, you could not apply the principles you apply to corporations of collective voting and let 10 percent elect a man to sit on the board, I do not see. We did it in corporate societies because we thought it was in the interest of good administration to give the 10 percent an opportunity to be present on the board and be heard in connection with all important matters. Why should we not apply it to labor unions? The whole idea of proportional representation is designed to accomplish the same result. I think this majority rule comes pretty nearly to the idea with which Mr. Mussolini originally started, in effect if you got a bare plurality the other party is rooted out. It would be almost like saying our Senate must be made up exclusively of Democrats.

We do not even lay down any rule here which would permit a given department or locality in a factory to be represented. We do say the board can establish units of plant employee, or craft, or rather unit, which I think is rather discouraging language to the thoughts I had in mind. I think there should be something written in the law here which permits of representation by substantial minorities.

I think the program which the President laid down did represent a real step forward in the working out of really cooperative arrangements whereby all substantial interests could be represented and be heard, and I cannot believe that because of collective bargaining will be forwarded by disfranchising various groups so far as the determination of important matters are concerned. And this board has the power, as I understand it, so far as machinery for the prevention of unfair labor practices is concerned, to override code law or agreements in its discretion.

The CHAIRMAN. Suppose you had a company union that represented a majority of the employees, and you had a minority of the employees in a trade union, would it not be difficult to arrive at a bargain, a collective bargain, between the employees as a whole and the employer if the employer had to deal and get the signatures of both groups to his final agreement with his employees?

Mr. MERRITT. He does not necessarily have to get signatures to an agreement. The situation you speak of is going on, and has been going on in a great many plants.

The CHAIRMAN. The intent of this proposed law is that there will come a time after the negotiations when the employer will sign up and determine his relationships with his employees by a contract, signed by a majority of the employees, and signed by himself; is that not true?

Mr. MERRITT. Yes. If your law just went that limit I would be in a much more——

The CHAIRMAN (interposing). How much beyond that does it go?

Mr. MERRITT. It does not permit the others to sit on the collective bargaining end of it.

The CHAIRMAN. It permits them to be consulted with and to be heard.

Mr. MERRITT. In regard to the collective bargaining?

The CHAIRMAN. As I understand it, it does not permit them to sign separate agreements, and it does not permit them to be parties to the signature of a contract, but I do not think there is anything to prevent them from being fully heard in every other step, save that of final execution of the contract.

Mr. MERRITT. All it gives them is a minority interest. I think, Senator, I can look into your views very quickly, because I see what is running through your mind, and from your point of view I think I would be inclined to agree with you, but I want to explain here that I think the law is different.

The CHAIRMAN. I wish you would point that out.

Mr. MERRITT. Yes. Now, for instance, section 9:

Representatives designated or selected for the purposes of collective bargaining by the majority of the employees in a unit appropriate for such purposes, shall be the exclusive representatives of all the employees in such unit for the purposes of collective bargaining—

The CHAIRMAN (interposing). Is that not for the purpose of signing the contract?

Mr. MERRITT. May I just finish? If it is, why my criticism is mistaken in the form which I have presented it.

in such unit for the purposes of collective bargaining in respect of rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, or other conditions of employment: Provided, That any individual employee or group of employees shall have the right at any time to present grievances —

And that is all.

Now if your collective bargaining permitted all the substantial minorities to be represented in the negotiations and to bargain, I would concede that for the purpose of collective bargaining, the agreement or terms that were acceptable to the representatives of a majority would have to be an agreement and terms for the entire factory. I would not question that at all. But what I object to is that substantial minorities here are barred from the very negotiations of bargaining.

The CHAIRMAN. I did not think it was the intent of the proponents of this legislation and I do not think it was the intent of the proponents of this language not to permit groups to present grievances, nor was it intended to debar the minority groups from sitting in if the employer and the majority were willing, but in any event of their not sitting in any negotiations that they be separately heard by the employers and their grievances or their suggestions received, and in turn presented by him to the majority group. I did not think there was anything in this bill that prevented any or all groups from getting in to the employer their views and opinions prior to the signing of the contract between the employer and the majority group of employees.

Mr. MERRITT. I would not——

The CHAIRMAN (interposing). I certainly do not think there should be.

Mr. MERRITT. Yes. I think this section could be clearly improved to make that idea clear, and I think a great deal of the opposition to this question would be mollified if that could be made clear.

The CHAIRMAN (aside). Mr. Magruder is there any intention on the part of your board to recommend any different view than that I have expressed?

Mr. CALVERT MAGRUDER. Senator, it is Senator Wagner's bill. I do not believe I can tell you that as to the board.

The CHAIRMAN. I had an impression the board looked over this bill and made some comments to Senator Wagner, and that it was in fact the board's bill as well as his. It is named the Wagner bill, but I had an impression the board was not only supporting it, but had been consulted, and was a party to its phraseology.

Mr. MAGRUDER. I do not think there was any intention to prevent an employer from hearing any representatives from minority groups, but this negotiation of an agreement on basic conditions must be solely with the spokesmen or agency selected by the majority in the given unit.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Am I wrong about attaching the board to some authorship in connection with this bill?

Mr. MAGRUDER. The board has been consulted, as Mr. Biddle testified, by the Senator; yes.

The CHAIRMAN. I think the original bill certainly was largely made up after consultation with and the approval of the whole board, of which Senator Wagner was a member, and of course you inherited that preliminary preparation.

Do you mind, Mr. Merritt, if I make another digression?

Mr. MERRITT. Not at all.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Magruder is the chief counsel for the present board, as perhaps you know.

Mr. Magruder, you are of the opinion that the board would not have any opposition to such language being incorporated in this bill as would not prevent all groups from presenting and being heard by the employer up to the point of finally executing the contract between the employees and employers?

Mr. MAGRUDER. Senator, I understand the negotiation of the contract is to be had between the employer and the representatives chosen by the majority. The employer in deciding whether to accede to any demands proposed by the majority would, I assume, be at liberty to hear representations from minority groups who claim there is some unfairness in the proposal.

The CHAIRMAN. Assume I am going to make a contract to purchase a partnership property that is owned by partners; it may be a retail store; it may be real estate, and there are five partners in the partnership. Three of them are a majority. It may be possible that getting the approval of three of them is all I need to get for the purpose of making a contract. Should not I listen to the other two? Should not I hear them? Should not I receive and entertain all their objections? Should not I up to the point of signing with a majority of the partners, should not I be allowed to hear any of them? Any one of them would be as acceptable to me as the others for the purpose of getting full information about the agreement or contract I was going to make.

Mr. MAGRUDER. I think the partnership analogy is not quite applicable.

The CHAIRMAN. No; because all five would have to finally sign the final agreement.

Mr. MAGRUDER. Yes. I do not understand any minority group constitutes a partner in the collective bargaining agency negotiating for the employees. That would approximate the proportional representation idea.

The CHAIRMAN. Perhaps that was not a good example. I will give another one. Take a piece of real estate and there are lessees on the property and they want me to listen to complaints or objections on what you call maintenance and perhaps other things, before I make the contract of purchase as to their rights in the property under their leases, would it not be the wise thing for me to do to hear them and to let them become acceptable to me in every way possible, so I may have the full information which they know about the property and find out what their questions are as lessees before I actually make the contract with the employer?

Mr. MAGRUDER. I should think so.

The CHAIRMAN. That is a little better illustration, is it not, than the other?

Mr MAGRUDER. And I assume that the employer would not under this bill have to close his door to a committee representing the minority group who came to protest some proposed action of the collective-bargaining agency.

The CHAIRMAN. I do not see why the employer would have to refuse to hear and receive any suggestions of any minority group at any time in a plant prior to the time when he may be going to sign up a collective-bargaining contract with the majority. I do not see how there could be any reasonable objections to that. Of course, I can understand if the minority and majority were sent in together, they would be constantly quarreling, and would not get anywhere, but I do not see why the employer could not receive them apart from time to time, and when the time came to sign the contract he might very well say, "I have heard you fully: I know what the majority views are and I know what the minority views are, and now I must end these negotiations by dealing with the majority."

Mr. MERRITT. I feel, Senator, that the bill is really intended to prohibit that very thing, and I want to point out to you why I feel so, because in section 9 it says:

For the purposes of collective bargaining—not of signing a bargain, but of bargaining, the representatives of the majority shall be the exclusive representatives, and then it very guardedly states in the proviso at the end that any individual may present grievances. That is a pretty narrow word.

The CHAIRMAN. I would agree with you except for those last words. I had assumed that was a condition, that text, which really meant that the minority could be heard too, perhaps not at the time the majority was being heard, but that they could present grievances before or after the contract was made.

Mr. MERRITT. Why use the work "grievances"? Present their "views" would be a far better word, if that is their intention.

The CHAIRMAN. It is assumed, of course, the thing in collective bargaining is that the employers and employees are dealing with grievances, are they not?

Mr. MERRITT. I would not say so primarily. I think "grievances" is a much too narrow word. I do not think when men sit down to determine whether they are going to get $20, $22, or $32 a week they speak of it so much in the terms of a grievance when they are dealing collectively for the purpose of a bargain. It is not a grievance. Of course, it is something you want. But I think the word there is too narrow to safely rely on for any views such as you have expressed as compared to other views which represent quite a different picture or viewpoint.

The CHAIRMAN. I personally feel very strongly that the employer should have the right perhaps to make any contract with his employees, consult with any of his employees he wants to hear from, as many different groups as he wants, to get all their viewpoints, present them in turn to his majority group, and I think the majority group of the employees ought to hear the minority also, so as to get a collective-bargaining agreement that would come pretty near preventing a strike by meeting the requirements of both a majority and the minority.

Mr. MERRITT. And to be sure every possible idea of any merit has been properly heard and considered.

You know the Labor Relations Board has definitely ordered some employers to cease bargaining with minority groups.

The CHAIRMAN. What do you mean by that? Of course, bargaining I suppose means trying to get a contract, trying to arrange a contractual relation. Is that true?

Mr. MERRITT. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN (continuing). I can understand their refusing to recognize minority groups, but I cannot understand how any minority group should be denied the right to present grievances, if it is the word there, or present their views.

Suppose a contract is entered into by a majority of the employees and an employer, and it omitted to properly protect or properly settle some great injuries that the workmen outside the plant, who have charge of the property of the company, who were the gardeners and the repairmen on the outside of the building, let us say, and they are employees, of course, of the company, why should not they be permitted before the agreement is made, or after the agreement is made, whether they are of a minority union or an independent union, or only just ordinary employees, to press upon the employer the rights as they see them, and urge that in any contract that is made that proper stipulation should be made for their working hours, and the definition of the conditions under which they work, either before or after?

Mr. MERRITT. I think they should.

The CHAIRMAN. Why should you stop them——

Mr. MERRITT (interrupting). I do not think they should.

The CHAIRMAN. Why should you stop them just because they are not members of the packers' union, the spinners' union, the loom fixers' union, why should they be barred from going to their employer and presenting their views or grievances?

Mr. MERRITT. I think the wording of this bill is unhappy.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you think this bill prevents that?

Mr. MERRITT. I think probably what would happen from a practical point of view, in that particular instance, is that the board would rule that such a separate craft unit could be heard separately in connection with their own particular problems. That would be a matter of discretion of the board, as to whether it should so treat them or not. But I should think in the clear case you state that would be a practical solution.

The CHAIRMAN. And make a separate contract?

Mr. MERRITT. Make a separate contract.

The CHAIRMAN. I know in some of the larger industries in my own State in former days there would be a large number of people employed on what you call outside work, outside the factory entirely.

Mr. MERRITT. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Repairing tenement property and painting the houses.

Mr. MERRITT. And maintenance work; installation work.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; installation work.

Mr. MERRITT. And telephone repair linemen and various kinds.

The CHAIRMAN. I think I am delaying you, perhaps. Proceed.

Mr. MERRITT. Sometimes teamsters and truckmen are employed on separate contracts.

The CHAIRMAN. This very subject is a matter which should give us attention, and I know it has been the source of a great deal of consideration by members of the committee.

Mr. MERRITT. The next point to which I specifically want to call your attention has probably been called to your attention by other people who have presented their views.

I have no quarrel with the statement of section 7, which says the employees shall have the right to self-organization, and so forth and so on.

The CHAIRMAN. Before you leave that other subject, I can conceive of the drafters of this bill recognizing a situation where a minute minority might make themselves offensive, and by insisting upon seeing the employer by insisting upon presenting their views again and again, and may ultimately become an obstructionist to the working out of the workable contract between the majority of the workers and the employer.

Mr. MERRITT. Such a thing is conceivable, but that is only the travails of childbirth. This thing would be under the supervision of the board. The board can pass upon the question as to whether reasonable negotiations have been carried on, and when they should be stopped, and when it is obstruction, and various questions of that kind which might come up. I can conceive of a far worse state of discord arising from the alternative.

The CHAIRMAN. By dealing with the majority alone?

Mr. MERRITT. Exactly.

The CHAIRMAN. And absolutely pushing aside the minority group?

Mr. MERRITT. Exactly.

The CHAIRMAN. Excuse me again.

Mr. MERRITT. Coming down to section 7, you declare what shall be the rights of the employees. We accept that as a proper declaration, but we do object most emphatically to section 8, which says that "it shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer" to interfere with those rights. If they are rights worthy of legislative declaration, they are worthy of protection.

The CHAIRMAN. You are dealing now with what the proponents consider the very heart of the bill. You realize that?

Mr. MERRITT. Yes. And I am not attacking the declaration as to the rights of employees, but I am attacking the idea that a right set up by a declaration of Congress shall be protected only from coercion on the part of an employer. I think it should be protected from coercion on any side. We all object to coercion or tyranny. We all recognize that it may rise from more than one source. That is one of the points which you find most criticized in many discussions of this bill with various employers and personnel men, who have a very deep interest in the proper solution of this whole subject of labor relation. They feel that it is absolutely unfair and partisan to declare a right to protect it from coercions from one source and not in any way to protect it from coercion from another source. One could give a great deal of discussion to that, but the idea is simple and has probably been repeated to you so many times I do not feel like taking your time to amplify it at this moment.

The next point to which I wish to call attention is the reference to so-called "company unions" as distinguished from what I might call class unions.

The CHAIRMAN. Where is that? I think we refer to the others as trade unions.

Mr. MERRITT. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. But you call them class unions?

Mr. MERRITT. Yes. I think I did that because I have always thought the name "company unions" was rather invidious, so I was choosing a retort courteous.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. MERRITT. Let us call them trade unions.

In subdivision (2) of section 8 there is a provision "to dominate or interfere with the formation or administration of any labor organization, or contribute financial, or other support to it." Let me start by conceding that no employer should dominate a labor organization. It is a sham if the employer dominates it. It is not functioning as an instrument of collective bargaining should function. You might better have no organization than one that is dominated by the company. I concede that. I am not criticizing that wording of the bill which uses that word. On the other hand, I have heard a great deal of criticism, which I share most sincerely, with those provisions there which have reference to the employer contributing financial or other support to the company union. I think if we start with the word "dominate" we have gone far enough without going into the other details. If financial support should be so overwhelming that it resulted in domination, that is one thing. One would have to reach a conclusion by virtue of money equal with that word "dominate" so that the financial support to that extent should not exist. But you gentlemen undoubtedly——

The CHAIRMAN (interposing). I must leave the committee for a while, and I will ask Senator Murray to preside, and I will try to get back in about 15 minutes. We will keep in session until 1 o'clock. There is no session of the Senate today.

Mr. MERRITT. I realize these are busy days.

The CHAIRMAN. I am sorry I have to go out. I received a call, and I will return shortly.

Mr. MERRITT. I realize these are busy days.

preme Court in the Texas and New Orleans care are not improper words to use for a bill that has these objectives, but to definitely state that there shall be no financial contributions for the support, is to my mind a very unfortunate thing, because that financial or other support often takes the form of minute, enthusiastic, sensible, wise arrangements between employers and employees in connection with these company unions, which should be given the widest possible latitude and flexibility, provided they do not reach the standard of domination. Your company unions may have the facilities of an office. They may have the facilities of a bookkeeper. They may use the company printing plant for their literature. I am not familiar enough with all these details, being a lawyer, to give you all of the possible illustrations which under a captious agent of this board might be construed as a financial or other contribution. I do not see that the words are necessary to the attainment of the promoters of this bill insofar as aims in this bill are and should be assumed to be reasonable. If you use your general language of dominate and interfere and leave all arrangements, of which there are a multitude of varieties between a company and a company union to be tested by those words, then you have gone to the heart of the whole matter without hampering what has proven to be in many respects the best forms of industrial relationships which have existed in any land.

There has been so much reiteration about the company union that it has come to have a bad name in the merits of many people. The wise employer, like the wise social worker, does not go around and publicize what he is doing with his employees, and what arrangement he has for cooperation, with the result that all that he has accomplished in that way has not had the same hearing as has been given the outside organizer, who has promoted his interests more by public propaganda than by intensive workings and intimate workings inside the industry.

It is true that following the war the system of industrial relationships set up through this so-called "company union" in the United States commanded the admiration of the world. The committees came from Europe, or commissions, to study how it was there was such a wonderful spirit of cooperation existing between such large bodies of people as prevailed in some of our large corporations where these so-called "company unions" existed. I think if one goes back and looks at the picture or to the depression they reach the conclusion we had attained a higher basis of cooperation and good will through importations of that character than had ever been reached in any country in any time previously in connection with any large groups engaged in industry.

It is for this reason that, feeling as I do, that these intimate contacts have inspired such a feeling of good will and cooperation on the part of employees that I just like intensely to see them hampered or interfered with by any law which might be construed to prohibit any legitimate means to promote that cooperation.

The sham company union, of course, should go. No one is trying to defend it. The company union that is set up merely to be a counterirritant, or as a camouflage, not to work out in good faith the best interests of the employees has no justification that legislatures need recognize or should recognize, and also the union which is dominated or interfered with and is not given some prior scope; but why we should follow those words "dominating" and "interfering" with a provision that any financial or other support pertaining to the company union, however insignificant, specifically and expressly declared to be unfair labor practice, I do not see.

For that reason, leaving that subject with you, I feel very strongly that there should be an amendment to the bill in that respect.

Senator MURRAY. However, would the employer be entitled to go without being regarded as dominating this union?

Mr. MERRITT. We cannot sit here and define adjectives or words of such broad connotation, because that will ultimately have to light with your administrative board, which will be well able to deal with that problem. If I were trying to define it I should say that any attempt to interfere with the normal function of that board as a collective bargaining agency, acting independently, would constitute domination of that organization, and an interference with its legitimate function and a complete destruction of its justification for existence.

Again, I am afraid I am not helping you, because I am simply using more words, but I think it is one of those situations where you cannot codify every detail as to what shall constitute domination and interference, and it is a mistake to pick out some little detail like contribute financially or other support and say that shall be an additional test over and above the test of domination or interference. I do not think it should be the test. I think minor cooperation with these company unions in facilities and things of that kind should not be interfered with because they are accomplishing such a tremendous amount of good. And I hesitate to see the Congress of the United States step in and obstruct these relationships which have been of such far-reaching social benefit to the country. We come, then, to section 12 in regard to arbitration.

In that section the drafters of this bill have undertaken to adopt the language which is used in so many arbitration statutes, whether for commercial arbitration or for all kinds of arbitration. It is attempting to place behind the procedure of arbitration the dignity of a court judgment. It must be set up there on the belief that arbitration has an important function to perform in connection with industrial disputes, and may be a very useful instrument in promoting industrial peace.

I, personally, am in accord with any program which seeks to promote voluntary arbitration.

In this attempt to dignify arbitration it is provided that a written agreement relative to arbitration shall be valid and irrevocable except on certain grounds in law and in equity. It is further provided if a party entering into such an agreement shall fail to go ahead with the arbitration, the Board in its discretion may proceed ex parte to hear a case and render an award. That, too, is not without precedent.

In many arbitration laws we have provisions to the effect that the arbitrators shall be appointed in a certain specified way. And if either party fails to perform the other may appoint the arbitrator. If the parties fail to appear the arbitration board, as already instituted, shall proceed with the arbitration. The point is to make an arbitration agreement irrevocable, to make its consummation automatic so that nothing can stop it, to make double sure there will be an award which is binding on both of the parties.

In that connection, also following precedent in arbitration laws, it is provided that the Board shall file the award in the United States district court designated by the agreement, or if no particular court is designated by the agreement, shall file it in the office of the clerk of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia. And then unless the award is impeached, and there are provisions of a proper nature for its impeachment, the court shall enter judgment in accordance with the terms of the award.

The court shall enter judgment in accordance with the terms of the award, that is the finality, the dignity of a judicial decree binding on both parties. But there comes this amazing proviso:

> Provided, That no employee individually, and no group of employees collectively, shall be compelled to render labor or services without their consent.

Now, I do not know just what that means, but if it means what I think these people intend to have it mean, it should not be there. No court ever would undertake to compel an individual to render services collectively or individually. That would be contrary to the thirteenth amendment. Even in the case of extraordinary services, like prima donnas and actresses, you cannot order them to perform their contract. You simply prohibit them from utilizing their services elsewhere. You cannot order people to quit work or to go on and perform work except after they have been duly incarcerated. But that section has to be read, or that proviso, in connection section 15, which says:

> Nothing in this act shall be construed so as to interfere with or impede or diminish in any way the right to strike.

If arbitration is to be a useful instrument of industrial peace it must be respected and binding on the party, and organized strikes maintained to overthrow an arbitration of war they should not and must not receive any implied sanction from any legislative enactment.

As I quoted from Mr. Justice Brandeis, strikes may be legal or illegal, depending upon their purposes, without regard to whether they are carried on in an orderly way, and strikes in violation of agreements, strikes in violation of arbitration or arbitration agreements, those agreements too having an award, are unwarranted socially and are contrary to all the instincts of our sense of fair play. And yet we are writing a law here which says we must deal with these labor unions and function through them, but that they can strike if they do not like an arbitration award after they have agreed to be bound by it.

That, gentlemen, is one of the things to which I referred at the mere opening; it is a mere question of right and wrong, decency or indecency. It is not any complicated question of economic social policy. It is a sort of question any man on the street thoroughly understands.

If labor unions secure agreements, if they agree to arbitrate, as they did in the Building Service Union in New York, and then struck in violation of it, why they are simply overthrowing the arbitration award, they are overthrowing the agreement.

I do not contend that men shall be individually required to work. Every man individually has got the right to quit work at any time. Collective agreement never require men to stay at work. They simply provide terms and conditions upon which men will work as long as the employers hire and the employees work. That is all they provide for. But a group of men working by prearrangement and concert of action, enforcing their acts by picketing, strike benefits, and directions of officers to bring about the overthrow of an arbitration award is one of the most dastardly attacks on the promise of individual peace in this country. And by saying, I do not know what that means, "that no employees shall collectively be compelled to render labor", I do not know as you could collectively compel employees to render labor, still I am opposed to that, because I feel that it is designed, as is the clause in 15, to give these people freedom of action to torpedo the processes of arbitration, which is the most obvious thing, one of the most obvious things we have in this bill for industrial peace.

I think Senator Wagner has referred at times to the Railway Labor Act as an act after which this is patterned, but the pattern did not suit in this particular.

The act in substance provides that no employee individually shall be compelled to render labor or services. But here we have put into the bill "No employee individually and no group of employees collectively", which means nothing if you come to common sense, "shall be required to perform services."

For instance, it is rather amusing, and if you would pick out of that sentence the words "No group of employees collectively", it means something. It is a perfectly sensible statement that no employee individually shall be compelled to render labor or services without their consent, but by inserting this other clause, which is going further than had ever been gone by any legislature in this country, "and no group of employees collectively", you make a perfectly ridiculous statement; and in addition to that you tend to put the gloss of legislative and moral sanction on something which is reprehensible.

I was saying before you gentlemen [indicating Senators Donahey and Murray] came in, drawing out of my experience just in this last winter, that in connection with the elevator strike in Manhattan, New York City, where I represented the realty interests, an agreement had been signed to the auspices of Mayor LaGuardia and the Borough President of Brooklyn, Raymond I. Ingersoll, and the Regional Labor Board, which provided for the arbitration of certain wages and hours and certain other conditions. And the arbitration took place with the union president as one of the arbitrators, and with Maj. Henry H. Curran as the chairman. And when the award did not suit them they called their strike. And within a period of about 10 days or 2 weeks we had a series of strikes of a general nature in violation of agreement, in violation of arbitration agreement.

Let us not put the impression of approval upon any such actions even by any ambiguous provision of this character. But we have got to reach the viewpoint sooner or later, and we have got to have the courage to face it, that Justice Brandeis reported in his Supreme Court decision, which I read before you came in, that there are lawful and unlawful strikes, and that industrial warfare, while an indispensable unit when employed for the purposes of justice, can become tyrannous and oppressive and should be discouraged when it is employed for antisocial and unlawful purposes.

Now, I know how jealously the labor organizations fear the slightest encroachment upon the power of collective action, but we have got to recognize that the power of collective action is the power for great good or ill. We want to have it unleashed for its good purposes, but we want to see that it is adequately restricted in the public interest when it is used for improper and antisocial purposes. And it is in the interest of that general moral idea that I suggest that there should be some consideration given to an amendment of that function of the bill.

May I speak to Mr. Emery just a minute?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. MERRITT. I just spoke to Mr. Emery to see how quickly he thought I could bring my presentation to a close.

On this question of procedure here, however, would you like to have me say a word about that to you, Senator?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; you might. Senator Murray has called attention to your criticism to the language on page 19 (c) of section 12.

Mr. MERRITT. I feel his way about that: Arbitration is here set up as a solemn pact, and the design is to promote arbitration as a peaceable adjustment. I do not think it is proper to provide for arbitration and then provide in effect that men may go out and strike in violation of the award, or to overthrow the award.

There is a great distinction, as you undoubtedly know, between the right of men to quit work individually and the right of men through the machinery of organization to quit work in combination or in concert. No one questions their right to quit work individually.

That would be a fair state of affairs if that could be done. But the organized use of the force and coercion of a strike to overthrow an arbitration award, which is entered into as the result of a voluntary mutual agreement of arbitration, should never be encouraged or receive any sanction whatsoever.

You will remember, Senator, I spoke about that situation in New York where that had happened just this last few minutes ago.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. MERRITT. And I pointed out here that while this bill was patterned after the Railway Labor Act this clause here about no group of employees collectively was not in the Railway Labor Act.

The CHAIRMAN. Was not in the Railway Labor Act?

Mr. MERRITT. Was not. And there is a provision in the Railway Labor Board Act, "No employee shall be compelled individually to render services", that I am entirely in accord with. I see no objection to that. And so they added to that by stating in this bill "that no employee individually, and no group of employees collectively, shall be compelled to render labor or services without their consent." I do not know how anyone could compel a group of employees collectively to render labor or services, but if it means you have got the right in an organization to strike and overthrow arbitration agreements I am very much opposed to it as being unsound from all viewpoints.

I have not attempted to go into the questions of procedure. I think there are a number of very dangerous provisions there, but I prefer to pass them over.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you discussed the interstate commerce provisions of this bill?

Mr. MERRITT. I have not; no.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you made a study of the cases of Interstate Commerce such as——

Mr. MERRITT. Not for the purpose of this act, but I feel myself very familiar with some because of my connections with some of them.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Emery has presented a very excellent analysis from his viewpoint of the interstate commerce connection.

Mr. MERRITT. I have not seen Mr. Emery's brief in this connection, but I have seen his briefs in cases on that viewpoint, and I am absolutely in accord with those viewpoints.

The CHAIRMAN. Your analysis would be a repetition of what he has said on that point?

Mr. MERRITT. Yes; but possibly I could discuss briefly with some effect one case, which I understand has been brought here into the discussion. That is the case of Bedford Stone Co. v. Stonecutters in 274 U. S. I understand that Senator Wagner has placed some reliance on that case as justifying the power of Congress to enact this bill.

I was in that case from the beginning, and am entirely familiar with its holdings. There is nothing new or original in the Bedford Stone case that did not already exist as far back as the Danbury Hatters' case. There is no doubt whatsoever that local means may be employed to restrict interstate commerce in violation of the Sherman Antitrust Law. That has been settled in a great many cases. That is all that was decided in the Bedford Stone case.

The producers of Bedford Stone were in Indiana. They distributed their stone to various parts of the country. We will say that some stone goes to Denver, Colo. The union had a strike in the factories in Indiana, and wanted to unionize not the factories, but the quarries and mills. They could make no headway at the point of production, because the employees did not follow the leadership of the union. Therefore, the stone companies went on producing stone.

The CHAIRMAN. Went on doing what?

Mr. MERRITT. Went on producing stone. The production of the organization was fine and satisfactory from the employers' viewpoints. The stone was then shipped to various parts of the country, and part of it goes to Denver, Colo.

There a local branch of the international union, which had tried to unionize these stone companies in Indiana, decided to cooperate, and the officers of the local branch ordered their men not to handle the stone. It was purely a local interference. Nothing was done so far as that incident was concerned, except it was done in the State of Colorado, in the vicinity of that particular city.

The Supreme Court held, there being many instances in different States, that that constituted a combination to restrain interstate trade. And why? Because that lawless interference was entered into solely for the purpose of restraining interstate trade. The object which they sought to attain was to change the industrial relations existing back in Indiana. The only way they could attain that in Colorado was by affecting the flow of that stream of the trade from Indiana to Colorado. The only way they could do that in Colorado was by erecting a dam in Colorado so there would be no set-back of that stream and it would not keep on flowing.

The Supreme Court very properly held since the purpose was not a local one, although the activity was a local one, since the purpose was not to change in any way Colorado, but to change something back in Indiana, and the only connection between Indiana and Colorado was this stream of interstate commerce, that therefore the local means of restraining interstate commerce constituted a violation of the Sherman Antitrust Law, and was something when done for that purpose which Congress had the power to prohibit.

The same situation has arisen in many other cases. In the Danbury Hatters' case you had a strike to stop production, you had a boycott in San Francisco to prevent goods from being distributed when they reached San Francisco. The Supreme Court held, in language that I do not recall at the moment, that it did not make any difference that the means of accomplishing this end the goods were in a particular State before the goods started, or in a particular State after the goods arrived, if the direct purpose was to restrain interstate trade.

The Coronado Coal Co. case, which Mr. Emery discussed, is a very excellent one, and also the Herkert & Meisel case (281 U. S.), I think it was. The Court held in the Coronado case in the first decision, although these mines produced coal almost exclusively for interstate consumption, nevertheless, inasmuch as the interference by labor unions to destroy the products in that particular State, which resulted in stopping the flow of commerce into other States, was not a violation of the Sherman Antitrust Law, not within the jurisdiction of Congress, by implication if the fight were a local one, and the purposes were a local one, and the battle was around a local issue the Supreme Court set aside the verdict and judgment of a very large sum of money, as I recall, on that ground.

The case then came back for a new trial, and on the new trial testimony was given to some extent, as I recall it, out of the mouths of some of the labor leaders themselves, or ex-labor leaders, to the effect that the purpose was to restrain interstate commerce. And it was held as the result of that trial that there was a proper issue to go to the jury as to whether it was a combination to restrain interstate commerce. So that all there is to this Bedford Stone case and these other cases is the principle that has been laid down in a large number of cases.

I could state right here that where your local activity is designed and intended to accomplish an interstate commerce result, there you have a right to prohibit that because of its direct effects upon interstate commerce.

May I state one other example? This was an action as I remember it regarding some oppressions of the American Sugar Refining Co. If that is the wrong company I apologize to it in advance. A competitor was starting up in Philadelphia by the name of the Pennsylvania Sugar Refining Co., and the American Sugar Refining Co., through a broker, got control of the stock on a loan of the Pennsylvania Sugar Refining Co. Then, having control of that stock, they voted not to let it start in business. It was nothing but a proposition of controlling the stock by buying the stock of that corporation. It was held after long journeys through the courts that that was an effort to restrain interstate trade.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you subscribe to the doctrine that the outlet of interstate commerce is part of interstate commerce and therefore is subject to regulation?

Mr. MERRITT. I absolutely do not. The cases are absolutely opposed to that in a good many of them.

The CHAIRMAN. It would be necessary to set up that principle in order to have this bill, for illustration, apply to department-store employees, would it not?

Mr. MERRITT. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Or retail stores of any kind?

Mr. MERRITT. Yes. The attempt to regulate internal operations in a producing unit because that producing unit shipped into interstate commerce runs amuck against a great many decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. There will have to be a complete change of front to sanction an attempt of this kind.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you think that the Supreme Court is still adhering to the doctrine that production in and of itself is a matter of intrastate legislation?

Mr. MERRITT. Senator, of course we know if you go back to United States v. Knight, I think it was One hundred and Fifty-sixth United States Reports, where they said it was not a violation of the Sherman Antitrust Law for various producing units to combine together, as I recall it, and we know we departed from that ground, but we departed from it a great many years ago. The Knight case has been largely exploded. But we recognize if all the units in a particular State produce, we will say, a product which comes only from that State should combine together to fix prices of goods going in interstate commerce there might be some question. But the Supreme Court, since it adjusted itself to that Knight decision, has not, in my opinion, deviated at all from a careful definition of this limitation on sovereigns' power, and has laid them down recently in a very large number of cases.

I should say it was not receding a bit at this time from the general proposition that products from oil wells, products from mines, and manufacturing products, and so forth, were not commerce and were susceptible to regulation by the Federal Government.

The CHAIRMAN. Would you care to name what industries in your opinion under the decisions of the United States Supreme Court would be subject to this bill as engaged in interstate commerce, other than railroads, telephone, and telegraph companies? [A pause.]

Perhaps you would rather not answer that.

Mr. MERRITT. I would like to think a minute. They are all, of course, subject to regulation of Congress in their interstate activities in the distribution activities, but offhand I do not think of any of the industries that would be subject to the regulations of this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you think the steel industry and the automobile industry would in all probability raise constitutional objections to this bill if it is enacted in the law?

Mr. MERRITT. I think they would have every reason to resist it; apparent reasons in the law.

The CHAIRMAN. Would one of the reasons be they were not subjected to the interstate-commerce provisions of the bill?

Mr. MERRITT. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. If they are producing in a State and were subject to the laws of that particular State where they are producing?

Mr. MERRITT. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Emery, are you in accord with that view? I thought you had a little more liberal view.

Mr. EMERY. Pardon me?

The CHAIRMAN. I thought, using Mr. Wagner's expression, you had a more liberal view, having been under his tutelage so long.

Mr. EMERY. I think Mr. Merritt has laid down the principles involved.

The CHAIRMAN. He is an unwise man who dare say what the Supreme Court will do today, is he not?

Mr. MERRITT. I am sure you won't find me unwise enough to attempt to do that.

The CHAIRMAN. Perhaps "dare" would be a better word than "unwise".

Mr. MERRITT. I want to thank the committee very much. I hope it will give very serious consideration to this whole thing of trying to determine what is a fair or unfair labor union that will have the benefits of this act.

The CHAIRMAN. We appreciate the giving to us so much of your time and giving us the benefits of your extensive study of this question.

STATEMENT OF W. N. WATSON, SECRETARY OF THE MANUFACTURING CHEMISTS' ASSOCIATION

Mr. WATSON. Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask to have the privilege of filing a brief.

The CHAIRMAN. What is your full name?

Mr. WATSON. Warren N. Watson.

The CHAIRMAN. And where do you reside?

Mr. WATSON. Washington, D. C.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you an attorney?

Mr. WATSON. No.

The CHAIRMAN. You are the secretary of the Manufacturing Chemists' Association?

Mr. WATSON. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. You have offices in the Woodward Building in Washington?

Mr. WATSON. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. And in your capacity of representing that association you want to file a brief?

Mr. WATSON. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. That may be done. (See brief p. 790.) Thank you.

There are five young men here from the Sobol Bros., which is a subsidiary of the Standard Oil Co. Will you all come forward, please? Which one would like to be the spokesman?

Mr. COLLINS. I will be the spokesman for all of us.

STATEMENT OF JOHN COLLINS, APPEARING IN HIS OWN BEHALF, A REPRESENTATIVE OF SOBOL BORS., INC., ALONG WITH FOUR COEMPLOYEES, CLARENCE M. J. CRYSLER, JR., A. L. SHAW, GEORGE E. TAYLOR, AND OSCAR RANEY

The CHAIRMAN. What is your full name?

Mr. COLLINS. John J. Collins.

The CHAIRMAN. And your residence?

Mr. COLLINS. 840 Grand Concourse, New York. I am employed at One Hundred and Forty-ninth Street and Southern Boulevard, Bronx, New York.

The CHAIRMAN. In what capacity?

Mr. COLLINS. In the capacity of being in charge of the service station of Sobol Bros., which is a division of Socony-Vacuum.

The CHAIRMAN. How many service stations has your company in Greater New York?

Mr. COLLINS. About 160.

The CHAIRMAN. You and the others associated with you are connected with the company in service work?

Mr. COLLINS. We are all on the service stations, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You are not all at the same station, however?

Mr. COLLINS. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Each has a separate station?

Mr. COLLINS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. How many are employed under you at your station?

Mr. COLLINS. I have about 10 men under me.

The CHAIRMAN. And you are in charge of those 10 men?

Mr. COLLINS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, what would you like to say about this bill?

Mr. COLLINS. We say we have a company union in Sobol Bros. You will recall I was down here last year to talk about that company union. Last year I thought it was a very good thing.

The CHAIRMAN. Let me ask you about your company union first before you give us your views. Does the company union include all of the employees of the Sobol Co.?

Mr. COLLINS. The company union includes all of the employees of the Sobol Co. who care to participate in this employee representation plan. And in our recent election——

The CHAIRMAN (interposing). Are they merely service workers of Sobol Co., or office workers also?

Mr. COLLINS. No, sir; just men on the station themselves.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you one union or more than one union?

Mr. COLLINS. We have one employee-representation plan.

The CHAIRMAN. How many members in that?

Mr. COLLINS. There are about 1,000 employees; 11 delegates, 1 for each branch.

The CHAIRMAN. About how many?

Mr. COLLINS. About 1,000 employees.

The CHAIRMAN. Do all the employees vote under the representation plan?

Mr. COLLINS. All may vote, and about 98 percent did vote in the last election.

The CHAIRMAN. When was the last election?

Mr. COLLINS. In November.

The CHAIRMAN. Last November?

Mr. COLLINS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And you have them every year in November?

Mr. COLLINS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You say about 98 percent voted in the last election?

Mr. COLLINS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And how many representatives did they choose?

Mr. COLLINS. There were 11. There was one for each division.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you one?

Mr. COLLINS. Yes, sir. And 3 of these other men are, and 1 is not.

The CHAIRMAN. How ofter do these 11 meet?

Mr. COLLINS. We meet every 3 months automatically, or more often if we care to call a special meeting for a particular purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. What do you discuss at these meetings every 3 months?

Mr. COLLINS. Most anything which occurs in the stations; things which an outside union would not touch, consisting of anything we are confronted with on the stations, things an outside labor union would touch, such as labor, hours, wages, and also anything under the sun which occurs in those stations we discuss and we settle.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you discuss them among yourselves first?

Mr. COLLINS. Yes; we discuss them among ourselves first, and also the other way.

The CHAIRMAN. And then you go to the representatives of the company, or do you discuss them in the presence of the representatives of the company every 3 months?

Mr. COLLINS. We have tried both methods. Sometimes we have met before to discuss certain problems as to some former procedure, and sometimes we discuss them in the presence of the other 11 members of the company.

The CHAIRMAN. How many members has the company representing them?

Mr. COLLINS. Eleven.

The CHAIRMAN. They have 11 and you have 11?

Mr. COLLINS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there such a thing as members in this organization where each one has a card or pays dues, or anything of that kind?

Mr. COLLINS. No dues, no cards, and no memberships. If you care to participate, all right; if you do not, all right.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no constitution?

Mr. COLLINS. There is a constitution and there are bylaws.

The CHAIRMAN. There are bylaws. These provide for any person who wants to become a member that he does so by voting?

Mr. COLLINS. Automatically he is a member; inasmuch as he is an employee of the company he is a member.

The CHAIRMAN. But the principal activity of the ordinary employee is to vote and to present his grievances to the 11 representatives?

Mr. COLLINS. That is it.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that right?

Mr. COLLINS. Before a meeting the 11 representatives take a day off and go around and contact the stations in our particular division. We want to find out what the problems are in the minds of the men. And we will discuss those problems at this particular meeting which we have. And then we take a day off following the meeting and go around and discuss what took place at the meeting. Besides this we have typewritten minutes of the meeting sent around to the individual stations.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you any written contract with the so-called "company" with reference to your working conditions?

Mr. COLLINS. No, sir; no written contract.

The CHAIRMAN. Your terms are agreed upon orally from time to time at these meetings and then put in operation?

Mr. COLLINS. Exactly.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you paid for attendance at these meetings?

Mr. COLLINS. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you paid for the day you have off afterward going around seeing the men?

Mr. COLLINS. Yes, sir. We are given that day off in order to contact our individual division.

The CHAIRMAN. Given 1 day before or 1 day after?

Mr. COLLINS. One day before and 1 day after.

The CHAIRMAN. And how about this other day you mentioned?

Mr. COLLINS. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. You have 3 days off?

Mr. COLLINS. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. How much are you paid for these 3 days?

Mr. COLLINS. The same amount we get working at the station.

The CHAIRMAN. Just the same amount you get working at the station?

Mr. COLLINS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And no more?

Mr. COLLINS. Yes; no more.

The CHAIRMAN. Are any other favors extended to the 11 representatives?

Mr. COLLINS. No, sir; not one favor.

The first meeting we had at the Hotel Commodore was to be preceded by a dinner. We thought, inasmuch as we were actuated, if that can be called that in these days, by the real purpose of helping the men, we thought that we would be freer if we met without any dinner, and not in a hotel but rather down in the school, where they have a school of instruction for the men when they first come into the company; and we met down there, which is naturally a building of the company, and we discussed our problems and other information down there, and nothing in the way of a dinner or anything else connected with it.

The CHAIRMAN. That was the first thought—that the 11 representatives of the employees meet with the 11 representatives of the company and you would have a dinner, and you decided that was unwise, and you now meet in a call of the company and discuss your problems there together?

Mr. COLLINS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, will you proceed and make any statement you desire in reference to this legislation?

Mr. COLLINS. So far as I can see, as I said before when I was down here a year ago, at that time our plant was only in operation about 8 months; since then obviously it has been in operation a year and 8 months, and instead of having become skeptical and feeling it is not working we have become convinced more than ever it is the proper representation for men in a company such as ours. It is a natural organization.

For an outside labor organization to try to come in and organize us and be analogous it would have no place because it would be an extrinsic organization coming in to tell us employees, who are part and parcel of this enterprise, just as to how that particular enterprise should deal with its employees is entirely wrong.

We formed an institution composed of company employees and employers' representatives, and we have within that institution the means whereby we can settle anything that comes up within that company.

The Government has been only too willing to foster the American Federation of Labor, and that is all right, that is their own idea, but maybe they were not so right in doing that; maybe they should have considered the company union and built it up and tried to strengthen it, help it along; instead of denouncing the little people and denouncing it, they should have built it up, as the gentleman said awhile ago.

Sometime ago, after I graduated from the Wood-Clinton High School in New York City, I went to see a teacher who used to teach me, and to speak before her class. When introducing me, she said, "We have one of our alumni here. He is interested in a company union. He will tell you something about company unions." Before she said anything to me to say anything about them, she said, "How many boys in this room are in favor of a company union?" And nobody raised their hands. And she said, "How many are against a company union?" And everybody raised their hands. And she said, "How many know anything about company unions?" And two people raised their hands. Which just goes to show you how the modern minds are molded by the propaganda put out against company unions today.

As I said, the company union is a natural thing. Our company or any company is an institution. It is an enterprise in which we are all interested, and our relations with each other arise from the set-up in that particular institution. My relations with my employer are natural relations arising within that company. For somebody to come out who is extrinsic and tell me what to do is analogous to being radical.

Instead of the Government trying to help us build up our plan, help us with our bylaws in that company, they have not even considered it at all, and they have rather considered legislation to cut out company unions.

I am just as much against the sham company union, a subterfuge company union—and I know plenty of them—as any other American Federation of Labor member is. They are just straw men, and I can knock them down just as anybody else can. And I will. But where a company union is a proper type, it is a different thing. And we have an outside board of arbitration outside the company. If we have a problem which the company and the employees cannot get together on we go outside and solve it with this board.

The CHAIRMAN. What is that board of arbitration?

Mr. COLLINS. If we have a problem we cannot solve——

The CHAIRMAN (interposing). You name a representative, and they name a representative, and then they name a third?

Mr. COLLINS. Yes, exactly. It might be you, Senator Walsh, it might be Senator Wagner, or the National Labor Relations Board, or it might be anybody.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you had any experience with that?

Mr. COLLINS. No.

The CHAIRMAN. You have been able to adjust them?

Mr. COLLINS. Yes. Of course, we have difficulties. Everyone does. And you do in your own family, too. And we fight. But you would not say "Do away with the family just because of some difficulties."

The CHAIRMAN. We have a lot of difficulties in the Senate.

Mr. COLLINS. Yes; you have a lot of difficulties in the Senate, but you would not want to do away with the Senate; I mean that is an important concommitant to the body. You are bound to have arguments in a democracy body.

The CHAIRMAN. Not only a democracy body, but in the Democratic Party.

Mr. COLLINS. But as a body.

The CHAIRMAN. I think it applies to both.

Mr. COLLINS. That is probably true, even though I am a Democrat.

Don't you see, when you are fostering the American Federation of Labor you are fostering a body automatically—I am not saying this in order to raise a scare, just to talk—that is going to lead to a communistic form of government, because the American Federation of Labor and other organizations of that type are predicated on contention.

They won't stop so far. That is their very existence. That is their life. They do not want unity and harmony. They do not want to settle problems. If they wanted to settle problems, they would not have jobs. They have to live on strife. Once they do a thing for an organization, what happens? I want more.

I am not a part and parcel of the American Federation of Labor when I join it. I am only a member as long it gets something for me. What will happen when I get 48, 30, 20, and 10 dollars more? The result will be that there will be no profits for industry, and the Government will take over the operation and the ownership. What is that? Communism. Of course it is. If we want communism, we ought to step up and take it now instead of going at it by easy stages.

Here we have an organization which is naturally and philosophically sound.

I was in church yesterday, and there was something said about "Cast out the devils from this dumb man." He was accused of being so from the power of Beelzebub, and yet he was supposed to be the same man. It was asked as to how to do that. And the answer was, "A house divided against itself must fall." That is the same as you people here. You are really trying to help labor. What you are doing is leading to a communism form of government. You say you do not want it, I believe. Yet you are most inconsistent by putting out this form of organization on collective bargaining and sponsoring the other type.

There is not anything much left I can say, except I would like to see some provision—or I would like to see some sort of legislation or some sort of help given—to company unions right now. I say, take the wrong kind out. I could give you plenty of them. Throw them out. They are a sham. People know about the wrong kind. They do not know about the right kind. Knowing about the wrong kind, they include us in the wrong kind.

We have difficulties on our stations. The men never have been and never will be completely satisfied. Labor is a service, and it has a responsibility. I am interested in my company. I have a certain loyalty to it, regardless of what people may say about it, whether right or wrong, whether people say Sobol Bros. are a bunch of crooks; and they may say that, and I do not know whether they are or not. I would not say they were or not. Probably they are not. However, I would feel a certain pang of resentment against a statement like that, because I am a member of that company.

Our lives are made up of loyalties. That is one part of our lives—loyalty for the people for which we are working.

What are we working for? If we are members of the American Federation of Labor, we are working for the success of the American Federation of Labor and their higher officials. I won't go into discussing the particular points of the American Federation of Labor. I do not need to do that. It has been done by those better qualified and better informed and with more information than I can give here.

One of the men that is now one of our company representatives was formerly in a labor union; and another, who is not here, was also a member of a labor union. And they will tell you what they are.

The CHAIRMAN. Has the American Federation of Labor attempted to organize your company's employees?

Mr. COLLINS. They came around to many of the stations in the beginning and had a circular. They wanted to know what they were paid, the wages, the hour conditions, and so forth; and they were told they were good at the station, that they were all right and a good outfit, and the men liked to work for them, as a rule. But this man came around with this pamphlet. He said, "You ought to organize." Of course, the fellows are practical at the station. They said, "How much?" He said, "Two dollars a month."

They said, "What things are they going to give us that we don't already have?" The fellows laughed them off the station. Some of the fellows would not allow them on the stations at all—chased them off—because they felt these men had something for the men which was wrong.

I gathered them in. I said: "Come on in. What have you got to discuss? What is your proposition?" And the men could not see they would get anything that they did not already have.

The advantage of the company unit is that it goes to the merits of the question. The American Federation of Labor depends upon what? It depends upon the force, not upon the rightfulness or wrongfulness of the particular problem at hand. That is what the employers did years ago. We denounced him. I will denounce him now for adopting force.

Now, we say it is all right for the American Federation of Labor to adopt force? It is not all right for the employers who are members of the American Federation of Labor to adopt force. It is not all right for either one of those parties, nor is it all right for anybody to resort to force.

We have certain rights. We look to the merits of that situation in order to solve the problems. And it is right or wrong, and not that I can pull a strike, or I can pull a lockout. That is not the solution. But people today do not want to look at those things. They would rather say, "Poor labor is getting a dirty deal." That is not the question. I feel sure none of us want to try to help the sham type of union, but I think we should try to help the company union that is the good type.

I know you have been tolerant with other speakers, Senator Walsh, and I do not want you to have to be tolerant with me.

Thank you very much.

The CHAIRMAN. You have not deteriorated from last year at all, and can still give effective ideas and effective argument.

Mr. COLLINS. Thank you.

The CHAIRMAN. I think I can say to you that the committee and yourself are not far apart as to the preservation of company unions that are free from the domination you have reference to and which are not as objectionable as you have mentioned.

I do not think there is any disposition here to destroy or prevent a legitimate, independent company union from operating and carrying on its collective bargaining relationships with its own employees.

Mr. COLLINS. But, Senator Walsh, who is to decide what that combination will be? Who is going to be the board? There are a number who run around and go from one group to the other. They are talked into our company union today and tomorrow they are talked into the American Federation of Labor, and the next day they are back into our company union, and what they say is taken as an example that the company union is no good. And that is the class of people who say it is company dominated, and it is believed because they say it is.

The CHAIRMAN. We will have to rely in decisions of all these matters upon public officials, and we hope that the public officials who may be named under this bill will administer the law properly and justly. Of course, it is our duty to see the provisions inserted in this bill will prevent any board, as far as we can foresee, from destroying any representative company union.

Mr. COLLINS. Yes; but I wish you would give some thought to that institutional idea of a company, that it is an institution, and that the members who are in that institution, namely, stockholders and employees, and the employees are really part of that institution, and their relations arise from the set-up that the institution occupies, and that therefore it is a natural set-up and its philosophy sound.

The CHAIRMAN. We all agree with that. You agree, because you have already said so, it is possible for some employers not to recognize that institutional difference should be made, and it is also possible for some company unions to exist who are dominated and controlled by the employers.

Mr. COLLINS. That is why I say Government has not given us enough help in trying to form the right type of company union, to let us draw an entire set of bylaws and recognize them, just as we have a constitution which should be recognized by Congress and not declared unconstitutional.

The CHAIRMAN. Would you be willing to accept a constitution drawn up by the Government giving the members of your employees the right to organize a company union that could not be said to be dominated?

Mr. COLLINS. That is all right, but the thing should arise from within and the Government should be without. That would relieve the Government of all responsibility. The Government is trying to get into this and get into that, and it cannot be done. I mean there should be self-organization in industry to a certain extent.

The CHAIRMAN. Supposing this committee of 11 members desired to ask for her wages or shorter hours and the company proceeded to control 6 of those 11 members; would you not think it proper for the Government officials to step in and punish the employers for acting in that manner?

Mr. COLLINS. If it could be proved.

The CHAIRMAN. And also to hold that a company of that kind was dominated by the employer?

Mr. COLLINS. If it could be proved, yes. And I think that the ordinary delegate should be more disciplined and instructed as to the duties of a delegate. Then when these problems do arrive he will accept them on the merits of the situation, and not on the fact that he is going to get some benefit or something out of it.

The CHAIRMAN. But you would want also the same principle to be applied to a trade union. You would want the so-called "trade union" in distinction to the company union, would you not——

Mr. COLLINS (interposing). I am not prepared to say, Senator, to tell you the truth. I am only prepared to say——

The CHAIRMAN (interposing). No; I mean if the representatives of a trade-union organization were subject to the control of the employer, you would want the same justice to be served by the officials of the Federal Government as would be applied in the case of a company union?

Mr. COLLINS. Yes, of course.

The CHAIRMAN. That is all.

Mr. COLLINS. I thank you very much, Senator, and I appreciate very much your giving me the time that you have.

The CHAIRMAN. This gentleman has spoken for all of you?

Mr. COLLINS. Yes, sir, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. Please give your names to the clerk.

Mr. Emery, what time will be most convenient for you this afternoon?

Mr. EMERY. Whatever is convenient for you, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. I think we had better make it at 2 o'clock, because there are some other witnesses, too, Mr. Emery.

(Whereupon, at 1 p. m., a recess was taken until 2 p. m. of the same day.)

AFTER RECESS

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order. Is there a representative of the Ohio Chamber of Commerce present? If so, please come forward.

STATEMENT OF GEORGE B. CHANDLER, OF COLUMBUS, OHIO, SECRETARY OF THE OHIO CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

The CHAIRMAN. Will you please give your full name?

Mr. CHANDLER. George B. Chandler.

The CHAIRMAN. Where do you reside, Mr. Chandler?

Mr. CHANDLER. Columbus, Ohio.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you appearing before this committee in your personal capacity or in a representative capacity?

Mr. CHANDLER. I am appearing in a representative capacity for the Ohio Chamber of Commerce, of which I am the manager.

The CHAIRMAN. How large a membership has the Ohio Chamber of Commerce?

Mr. CHANDLER. We have 78 local chambers that belong to the chamber, and 4,269 individual corporate and representative members.

The CHAIRMAN. Who instructed you to appear representing your organization?

The CHANDLER. The board of directors of the chamber.

The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed.

Mr. CHANDLER. We are not an employers' organization. In other words we are not an employers' union. We leave the technical questions in the labor departments of manufacturers associations and trade groups which are somewhat analogous to unions. We deal with the fundamental economic and fiscal problems, and I am down here this week interested in four measures.

The 30-hour-week bill, the economic-security program, in which we are intensely interested, and up which we entertain strong views; and the holding company bill, which we deem of exceeding importance and upon which we likewise entertain strong views, and also this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. All four measures are very important.

Mr. CHANDLER. The labor-disputes bill only appeals to us, and I hope you will excuse us if I do not possess that technical knowledge of details which some of the laborers' and employers' attorneys would be interested in.

The CHAIRMAN. We appreciate that.

Mr. CHANDLER. We are only interested in certain fundamentals which we believe are repugnant to certain principles which you and I inherited. Our conclusions were arrived at by a careful study of our committee on Federal affairs, followed by unanimous action by our board of directors.

Our first objection to this bill, which I have stated is a matter of principle rather than of detail, is it is a violation of what we deem to be equality before the law.

Section 7 of the bill reads as follows:

> Employees shall have the right to self-organization, to form, join, or assist labor organizations, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and to engage in concerted activities, for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection.

This is a matter to which we give our assent, and is basic in our American system. Then we come to section 8, the language of which is as follows:

> It shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer * * * (1) to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed under section 7.

That is fundamental also and no employer should do it.

However, we are primarily interested in the omission to the effect that it shall not be an unfair labor practice for a union to interfere with, coerce, or restrain employees with respect to the joining of labor unions. We believe that this should go on four-foot, and that there should be equality before the law. It presents the same manifest injustice that the Clayton bill did when it was passed, exempting farmers and labor unions from the antitrust act, and imposing them upon your Massachusetts industries and other groups. That is our first fundamental objection.

The second objection goes just as deep into our American equality. It denies minority rights. Of course, we talk about its being a principle of American government that we shall have the majority rule. That is true in the election of officers, about our Constitution, and our court decisions, and all of our practices are very jealous of the protection of minorities.

Under this bill 51 percent of the employees voting on a question could bargain away the rights of a minority of 49 percent; they could compel 49 percent of them, although there seems to be a provision in the law which would prevent it, but in practice it would compel the other 49 percent to join the union or quit.

Those are our objections to certain principles of this bill.

Another objection is administrative, in the centralizing and vesting in the politically appointed board of three men summary power over billions of capital and millions of employees, and it is a plan to unionize America from Washington. It legalizes the closed shop, which is a very much mooted question, has been and always will be. It is an attempt at the regimentation of industry and labor.

It seems to me that this country has had one very striking and unfortunate experience in the field of regimentation, that was when we tried to regiment human conduct by passing the prohibition law, which did not work, because people refused to be regimented.

We had another experiment—I believe when you were not a Member of the Senate at the time when that debate was so acute, but I think Senator Lodge represented Massachusetts at the time—and that was the League of Nations. That was an honest idealistic attempt to regiment the nations of the world. What has been the picture? Japan is now at war practically with China, taking large slices of territory; there is war in South America of several months' duration; they are mobilizing now along the historic western front of Europe. In other words, right or wrong, the nations of the world refuse to be regimented.

This principle will not work, because industry and labor will refuse to be regimented. I think it will produce more conflict than it will heal.

Finally, it is the honest conviction of the Ohio Chamber of Commerce that the passage of this piece of legislation will continue to retard recovery rather than hasten it. Our organization at its last annual meeting passed a series of resolutions under the rather ambitious caption of "An appraisal of the 'new deal.'" We tried to be judicial, and we found nine measures which you have passed here in Washington, administrative or legislative, which we have felt were good, as emergency measures. It may be a mere accident they happen to balance in point of number, but we found nine others which we deemed to be calculated to retard recovery, and one of those is no. 3, tampering with the relaionship between capital and labor, through section 7 (a) of the National Industrial Recovery Act.

Now, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, really, the proof of the pudding is in the eating. I have some figures here with which you are doubtless familiar, because it is on a bulletin mailed to me Friday afternoon by the American Rolling Mill Co., of Littleton, Ohio, one of our great iron and steel units. This is a bulletin of the National Manufacturers Association, and I hope you will be generous and patient if you have heard these figures before, but comparing the 18 months before the attempted regimentation of industry and labor was made under the N. I. R. A. with the 18 months after the N. I. R. A., labor disputes increased 155 percent.

The CHAIRMAN. Will you state that again?

Mr. CHANDLER. During the 18 months before the inception of the N. I. R. A, which was a mild attempt at regimentation, with the 18 months after the N. I. R. A., there was an increase in the number of labor disputes of 155 percent; in the working days, a loss of 278 percent, and a cost to employees of 305 percent, and a cost to employers of 305 percent, and a cost to the public of 304 percent, or a total cost of 304 percent.

That is how that honest effort toward regimentation worked out.

I am very fearful, gentlemen, and we are fearful, that if you pass this proposed legislation you will not be passing a healing measure, but you will be passing a measure that will have exactly the same result its predecessor had.

I thank you very much for giving us a hearing before your committee when you are so crowded.

The CHAIRMAN. We appreciate your coming so far for the purpose of giving us the views of your very fine organization.

Is there a representative of the National Association of Furniture Manufactruers present? If so, you will please come forward.

STATEMENT OF A. P. HAAKE, MANAGING DIRECTOR OF THE NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF FURNITURE MANUFACTURERS

The CHAIRMAN. What is your full name?

Mr. HAAKE. A. P. Haake.

The CHAIRMAN. Where do you live?

Mr. HAAKE. Chicago, Ill.

The CHAIRMAN. In what capacity are you appearing before this committee; in your individual capacity, or representing some organization?

Mr. HAAKE. I am appearing as managing director of the National Association of Furniture Manufacturers.

The CHAIRMAN. Are they under a code?

Mr. HAAKE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you any relationship to the code authority?

Mr. HAAKE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What is that?

Mr. HAAKE. I am a member of the code authority and a member of the executive committee.

The CHAIRMAN. How large is this association?

Mr. HAAKE. We have approximately 700 members out of probably 1,800 to 2,000 in the industry, and represent approximately 75 percent to 80 percent of the production in that group. That extends from the Atlantic Ocean to the Pacific Ocean, and takes in the entire country except the southeast, which has its own association known as the Southern Furniture Manufacturers Association, of which the executive officer is Mr. J. T. Ryan.

The CHAIRMAN. Are the employees in the manufacturing establishments of the country organized?

Mr. HAAKE. Very little. They are organized to some extent, if you care to have that information, and I could give you the specific localities in which they are organized.

The CHAIRMAN. Are some of the furniture establishments in my State, particularly the chair manufacturers in this organization?

Mr. HAAKE. Yes; most of your people are, and almost none of them are organized. The organization in our industry is mostly on the Pacific coast.

The CHAIRMAN. How about in Michigan, in Grand Rapids?

Mr. HAAKE. In Grand Rapids there is some organization, but it has not gone very far as yet. The upholstering industry in most of the cities is organized, but not under the A. F. of L. That has been an outgrowth of the industrial union idea, some of which are designated with the rather loose term of communistic.

The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed with your statement.

Mr. HAAKE. If it can be shown that this bill will bring about desirable results from the standpoint of our economic system as a whole and if it would prove practicable in operation, we wish to support it. On the other hand, we should be doubtful about any measure which might impede progress toward its own objective by setting up ill-will and fostering antagonism or by substituting one kind of economic unbalance for another kind. It is our feeling that the weighing of these various factors and considerations should be left with the members of Congress whom we have duly elected for that purpose, and that Congress should be free from pressure or intimidation by any parties concerned. The furniture manufacturing industry would therefore like to ask some questions about the meaning of the bill and call to attention some dangerous possibilities which we feel are included in its structure, rather than to make any definite recommendations to you.

I think I can fairly state that the furniture industry is in agreement with the first sentence in the declaration of policy which opens this bill, and would like to assist in restoring and maintaining a proper balance of bargaining power. Although admitting that maladjustment has existed in many places, we wish to call attention to the fact that the furniture industry is primarily one of small units and that it is located mainly in the smaller cities and towns.

In many of these communities, particularly where the industry is of long standing, the workers have for years possessed a sort of informal solidarity and the common welfare of employers and workers has been sufficiently obvious so that the workers have maintained in most instances a fair and equitable position as to wages and other conditions. For this reason the workers themselves have, in many instances, declined to accept the distant control of national labor organizations and have felt that funds sent out of their own communities in the form of union dues yielded no comparable return. Consequently, a large part of the body of workers in the furniture industry, as well as the management of the industry, would look with misgiving on any measure which might foster monopoly conditions in labor organizations.

Specifically, we should like to question the principal enunciated in paragraph (a) of section 9, and express doubt whether it would benefit the workers or the country in general. Secondly, we feel that the significance of paragraph (3) in section 8 should be called to attention since it provides the instrument by which the majority representation previously mentioned can be immediately expanded into absolute monopoly or labor dictatorship within any bargaining unit. Thirdly, we believe it would appear if this bill should be further considered that sections 7 and 8, dealing with the rights of employees, should guarantee freedom from intimidation by labor organizers as well as freedom from unfair practice by employers. I will take up these three points in order.

When a majority is allowed to fix the price for labor and make it binding upon the minority, the principle is the same as the one which has raised such widespread objection to the N. R. A. Even the most staunch advocates of price stabilization among business men are beginning to see that it is impractical as well as undesirable to permit the majority of manufacturers in any industry to dictate the price at which all of the members of the industry shall sell their product. In fact, I have sometimes wondered whether the support, which some labor leaders have given to these price-stabilization schemes in the codes, has not resulted from a realization that they would seem inconsistent if they did not extend such support.

The real answer as to stabilization of the prices of commodities or labor without a train of ill will and the likelihood of eventual collapse, lies in effective leadership rather than force. If a union which operates as a bargaining agency for its group of workers, succeeds in attaining better conditions for those workers, it will attract membership. This always has been and always will be so. In the same manner, if an outstanding concern in any industry publishes reasonable prices and abides by those prices, it is likely to attain a position of leadership. Inasmuch as such leadership depends upon rightness rather than force, it will be a leadership in lowering prices when they need to be lowered and raising them when they need to be raised, rather than an effort to hold the prices firm against all opposition and against an unwarrantable sacrifice in the volume of business. There is no more reason to believe that a labor union, placed in a position to set a monopoly price, will show any more wisdom than any industry during those periods when it has been in a position to establish monopoly price. Gentlemen, the investigations of the Federal Trade Commission and many economists serve to show that monopoly price for either labor or goods is not likely to be administered with sufficient wisdom to benefit the parties directly interested, to say nothing of the country at large.

The result of labor monopoly is evident in the construction industry; almost a national monopoly has been built up town by town, because construction needed in a given locality could not move to another place where the labor supply was better, as the textile industry has tended to do. The strangulation of the construction industry by high wages would be repeated on a national scale, if the courts were to permit the potential results of this bill. Of course, it is not likely that the full potential will be realized, but in such industries or territories as it does occur, just by that degree will the strangling effect of monopoly endanger our national progress.

Collective bargaining is commonly advocated in order to restore the balance of bargaining power between employer and employee. The objective is a worthy one, and we believe deserves further study from this committee and the Congress in general, in order that efforts to establish the balance of bargaining power shall not result in a more dangerous unbalance in another direction. Under this bill, the way is open for a union to establish a closed-shop labor monopoly in any industry or factory merely by gathering a majority vote of the workers. In contrast to the original extreme of a single worker bargaining with a large employer, you would soon have one labor monopoly bargaining with a group of small individual manufacturers. Therefore, the provisions of this bill seem to us inconsistent with the desirable objective announced in its preamble.

The CHAIRMAN. A small union represented by a majority of the employees could demand as an element of collective bargaining of the employer the closed shop?

Mr. HAAKE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And if the closed shop were refused, they could strike and attempt to force the employer into making an agreement for a closed shop?

Mr. HAAKE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Can they not do that just as well now, without this bill?

Mr. HAAKE. I frankly do not know. I would like to say they could not, of course, but I frankly do not know. I believe that they could not do it quite so well.

The CHAIRMAN. No; they would probably be in a better position because more highly unionized, I think, and they would also have a tribunal to go to.

Mr. HAAKE. Exactly.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course, no tribunal of the Government may force an employer of this law to consent to such a request from a majority of the employees. This bill leaves the discretion to the employer to sign or not to sign an agreement for a closed shop. You know that.

Mr. HAAKE. I know that.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you think the pressure of the matters referred to in the bill would have a tendency to make that demand more general today, and to insist upon it to the extent of using force if necessary?

Mr. HAAKE. That is exactly the point I was making. It seems to me where the employer has the right to sign or not to sign, or the right to choose between a closed shop or an open shop, then the moment he is compelled to bargain with that organization which represents the majority of his employees, we have taken a very effective step toward establishing the closed shop, because in effect that can easily become a closed shop.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course, this bill permits an employer to make an agreement for a closed shop with his company-union employees, if those unions are not dominated; but I observe most of the employers are against the closed shop, whether it is a company union or a labor union.

Mr. HAAKE. That is certainly true in our industry. We cannot prove it one way or the other, but our factories very strongly believe that is what would happen, and we believe we have enough of the labor organizers—and I am speaking now of the less official groups, such as those that operate along the Pacific coast—to be satisfied that the prestige that would lie back of this bill would give them a coercive power over their employers, and that power would be so immensely increased that the manufacturers would be up against a losing game.

The CHAIRMAN. I assume there is only a small percentage of the furniture manufacturers on the Pacific coast. Is that correct?

Mr. HAAKE. Practically between 10 and 15 percent.

Senator MURRAY. I have heard it claimed that along Portland, and along there, is now manufactured most of the furniture in the United States.

Mr. HAAKE. Yes; they have stopped talking about the weather and talk about furniture now, and they are making more furniture there; it is increasing right along.

A labor monopoly would be far more destructive to small-town industry than any code ever proposed, since the small town always has and probably should pay a smaller differential above the minimum wage than is paid for the same skill of labor in the bigger cities. Unions would try to impose the same rate everywhere and would be pleased rather than disappointed if the result forced industry into the bigger cities, where it could more easily be unionized.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you observed a tendency on the part of industry to move out of the large cities?

Mr. HAAKE. The tendency on the part of the upholstering industry is to move into the smaller cities, and that has been more in evidence in the last few years.

The CHAIRMAN. I have observed it in other industries, aside from merger, with which I am not familiar.

Mr. HAAKE. It has been very much so in our industry, in the last few years.

The CHAIRMAN. I imagine furniture manufacturing is highly competitive?

Mr. HAAKE. Exceedingly so.

The CHAIRMAN. I know in my State at one time when I was practicing law there were at least 20 or 25 chair manufacturers in one community, all small factories competing with each other.

Mr. HAAKE. We are having prepared now the annual experience report, and that report shows that 81 percent of our people lost money in 1934, which will show that it is a very competitive condition.

Now, going further with my statement, the principle of majority representation, which is the standard and relatively satisfactory basis of all our legislatures, is frequently urged as a precedent for a similar basis in labor representation.

We have had that thrown at us a number of times.

However, it must be remembered that the rights of minorities are safeguarded in the Constitution of the United States and every civilized State, and that our legislative representation is, in general, limited to matters dealing with public safety and welfare. It does not extend to dictation of the incomes of individuals employed by private industries; and the courts have frequently invalidated efforts to restrict an individual's right to invest his funds in any legitimate enterprise or to labor at any legitimate occupation. Yet, in many instances, the union organizations have attempted by extra-legal means to restrict the rights of workers to labor where they wish.

The proviso attached to paragraph (a) of section 9 is particularly interesting in connection with the problem of minority rights. Does it say, in effect, that any minority group of employees shall have the right to disagree with the employer but they shall not have the right to agree with him. That seems a rather one-sided statement of the rights of minorities.

There is a good deal of emphasis in the bill to the effect that there shall be no intimidation or coercion by employers, and we are fully aware the employer has it in his power, if he wishes, to exercise power of intimidation or coercion of the employee.

We are also aware thare are many perfectly natural acts which he performs in his relations with the employees which are not of this coercive or intimidating character, but which can be very easily interpreted or twisted so as to be construed as such.

However, if we are going to have a rule against intimidation or coercion by the employers, it seems to us quite as important and quite as fair also that there should be a denial of intimidation and coercion on the other side. That intimidation and coercion, we have observed in our industry, has sometimes found its way into the factory during work hours.

I have in mind an employer who got himself into difficulties for discharging an employee under the N. R. A., and was accused of doing so because the man was engaged in union activities. The man was engaged in union activities, but he was also taking his time when he should have been at the bench during the day to engage in that activity.

It seems to us, however it may be done, that some way might well be found to at least discourage intimidation and coercion by the employees. Possibly, if under the act recognition were refused to any union whose members employed intimidation or coercion, that might have the desired effect.

The CHAIRMAN. That section which you and others have quoted, subsection 1 of section 8, says:

> It shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights granted in section 7.

Briefly, section 7 guarantees the right to engage in collective bargaining.

Now, how can employees interfere or restrain or coerce their employers in the exercise of the rights granted in section 7?

Mr. HAAKE. Because the employee under section 7 theoretically has the right to bargain through representatives of his own choosing. I think it is fairly well established that in many cases employees have gone on strikes, and in other ways acted collectively with the other employees, not because of their own choosing, but because of fear of their lives or property.

In other words, let us assume for the moment I am a labor organizer and I used strong-arm methods on the workers in this plant in one way and another.

The CHAIRMAN. It would be used by a labor union for the purpose of bringing about the exercise of the rights under section 7, while this prohibition is to prevent the employees from enjoying that right of collective bargaining.

I cannot conceive of a labor union trying to interfere with or coerce its fellow employees for the purpose of preventing collective bargaining.

Mr. HAAKE. No; certainly not, but for the purpose of making collective bargaining not representative.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; that is a possibility.

Mr. HAAKE. That is the point I have in mind. I know positively, Mr. Chairman, there have been numerous cases in our industry where the men did not dare do anything else for fear of their lives.

The CHAIRMAN. I suppose a majority of the employees, through their representatives, might say, let us have a strike, and do nothing about collective bargaining, but because we do not like this man and do not want to have anything to do with him.

Mr. HAAKE. That is quite conceivable.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you finished?

Mr. HAAKE. Yes, Mr. Chairman; and may I emphasize, it may be a simple or naive thought, but possibly if recognition was denied to any group that used coercion, whether employee or employer, it might have the effect of discouraging it.

I thank you for the privilege of appearing before you, gentlemen.

The CHAIRMAN. Is Mr. Furmer present, representing the Independent Workers League of America?

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I am here to represent Mr. Furmer in behalf of the Independent Workers League of America.

STATEMENT OF CHRISTOPHER HAYNES WRIGHT, REPRESENTING INDEPENDENT WORKERS' LEAGUE OF AMERICA, UNION CITY, N. J.

The CHAIRMAN. What is your full name, Mr. Wright?

Mr. WRIGHT. Christopher H. Wright.

The CHAIRMAN. Where do you reside?

Mr. WRIGHT. Union City, N. J.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you appearing in your personal capacity or representing an independent organization?

Mr. WRIGHT. I am appearing as president of the Independent Workers League of America.

The CHAIRMAN. Tell us something about the Independent Workers League of America; how many members have they in that organization?

Mr. WRIGHT. The last count that was given me during the latter part of the week was above 150,000.

The CHAIRMAN. Are they employed in a variety of industries, or in one industry?

Mr. WRIGHT. Employed in a variety of industries.

The CHAIRMAN. Have they separate chapters or local organizations?

Mr. WRIGHT. In some instances they have local organizations, and in many instances only independent members.

The CHAIRMAN. How many of these members you mentioned are affiliated with local units or organizations?

Mr. WRIGHT. In company unions?

The CHAIRMAN. No; how many of these workers you spoke of that are connected with your organization have their membership in local units or organizations?

Mr. WRIGHT. Those figures I could not give, because we have only begun to organize since the 18th day of February.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the object of your organization?

Mr. WRIGHT. The object of our organization is to protect the independent workers.

The CHAIRMAN. You have solicited members all over the country?

Mr. WRIGHT. We are now negotiating for branches in Atlanta, Ga., and in Dallas, Tex., and in Chicago. At present our head office is in Jersey City, N. J.

The CHAIRMAN. How do you get them, through correspondence?

Mr. WRIGHT. Yes; through correspondence.

The CHAIRMAN. What would you do, would you tell them about the organization, set forth its purpose, and ask them to sign an application?

Mr. WRIGHT. That is the idea, exactly.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there any dues?

Mr. WRIGHT. No dues.

The CHAIRMAN. Would you set forth the objective of your organization in your communications to independent workers?

Mr. WRIGHT. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What would you set forth as the objective?

Mr. WRIGHT. To protect and advance, first of all, the interests of the independent workers, and to bring the scattered units and the scattered individuals into an organization in protection from what we feel a great many laws that are favoring certain classes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is one of your objectives to counteract the activities of national labor organizations to force individual workers into their unions?

Mr. WRIGHT. Unfortunately, our objects are antagonistic to some of the methods and practices of unionism, but primarily our purpose is, first of all, to see what we can do to overcome this preaching of dictatorial relations between employee and employer and to build up, instead, a spirit of cooperative relationship.

The CHAIRMAN. How is your organization financed?

Mr. WRIGHT. It is financed by philanthropic subscriptions from people who are interested in our gospel.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you a constitution and bylaws?

Mr. WRIGHT. We have a statement of our principles, just what we stand for, and what we hold to be our rights. On the question of bylaws we have not laid down any bylaws under which to govern any man's individual relations with his employer. That we leave open for it to be determined by a competent group or association, and we allow them the privilege of forming their own bylaws as they see fit, to govern their individual circumstances.

The CHAIRMAN. Will you submit for the record a copy of your statement or your principle?

Mr. WRIGHT. Surely; with pleasure.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you any trade-union members in your organization?

Mr. WRIGHT. We have a great many members who have come to us and declared their dissatisfaction with their relations to the union and have agreed most emphatically that they endorse our principles and purposes as we set forth in that statement, which I hand you.

The CHAIRMAN. I judge from the title of this pamphlet, "Open or Closed, Stand Up and Be Counted", that one of your objections is against the closed shop.

Mr. WRIGHT. Most assuredly.

The CHAIRMAN. This statement of principles may be incorporated in the record.

(The same is incorporated in the record at the close of the statement of Mr. Wright.)

The CHAIRMAN. Now you may proceed.

Mr. WRIGHT. For the sake of brevity, I think I can cover my ideas right here in this prepared statement very briefly and without rambling.

Representing the Independent Workers League of America, incorporated under the laws of the State of New Jersey, I bring before you a summary of the views held by American workers. This summary is the result of a wide survey conducted by my six associates and myself over a period of many months and in many sections of the country.

At that point I may digress to say that I was again heartily encouraged by hearing the testimony of the representative of the Sobel people, of which I knew nothing, but which I can say to you is the sentiment I have been getting for the last year, during which time I have devoted my entire time to making a survey of opinions as it is held by the workers.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Collins is a very exceptionally bright young man, of almost legalistic mind, a well-informed man. Do you think the workers are possessed of that knowledge of the subject which he displayed?

Mr. WRIGHT. He is only one of several groups of whom I personally know who have expressed themselves to us in the same identical language, and who are this minute worried lest they are going to suffer outside interference with their relations they hold at the present time with their employers.

I may also say we are convinced this entire bill is drawn on the premise that there are a lot of labor disputes, and it is designed to settle disputes, and we say most emphatically that the disputes between the employer and the employee are rare in comparison to the number of workmen and the number of employers for whom they work.

I would say, further, I believe the great majority of disputes are the result of agitation.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you not think another objective of the bill is that the absence of organizations among the large groups of employees is resulting in giving the employers an economic advantage over their employees?

Mr. WRIGHT. It is my observation that the major employers are coming to the conclusion they would rather have their men with the company associations or groups, that they may be brought close together, that they may more reasonably discuss their condition because you take a body of men, each individual acquainted with the subject, each man will believe he is not satisfied with something, which if they sit down around the council table and begin to exchange views and ideas, and discuss it from a reasonable and sensible standpoint they find that by so doing they will come nearer arriving at a fa decision; and I think those company associations tend to bring to the worker the fact that his relation to his employer are more serious than just the fact that he is on the pay roll.

The CHAIRMAN. I think that state of mind on the part of the employer has grown and exists more today than ever.

But, I think unfortunately it has been necessary to get into that state of mind through force. I do not mean necessarily strikes, but by legislative agitation and a long period of effort to lead him to realize the human race is advancing. I think, perhaps, that has had more influence in arousing the employers to an understanding of the rights of the employees, and I think a good many other things I have mentioned has tended to enlighten to bring about a more advanced state of mind on the part of the employers.

Mr. WRIGHT. I have that as one of our principle objectives, that we must bring the attention of the employer to the fact that if he does not interest himself in the welfare of his workers, somebody else will, and we are working along that line.

This organization is founded on the fundamental principles of the kind of Americanism that raised this country of ours from a few scattered settlements along the Atlantic coast, impoverished, inconspicuous, and unimportant, to its present proud position of the most prosperous and perhaps the most powerful nation on the earth. It is founded on the kind of Americanism that you, Mr. Chairman, and these gentlemen gathered here, were taught in the schools and colleges in the days of your youth. In those days we proudly boasted of the independence of the sovereign American. When we thought of the American worker, in those days, we thought of an independent worker.

Mr. Chairman, we hold it to be the constitutional right of the American citizen to join a union, if he so desires, and thereby surrender his individual independence for a mess of pottage, provided, of course, that he does not interpret his union membership as giving him the right to resort to intimidation, force, violence, or injury to property to gain his ends. We are unalterably opposed to certain methods and practices of unionism, but, if a worker wishes to identify himself with the kind of Americanism that unionism teaches, that is his privilege. We have no quarrel with the union worker. We believe in his every right to work side by side with the independent worker, so long as he is satisfactory to his employer, but we are opposed to the intolerance of the union worker toward the independent worker. If the union worker had shown the same tolerance toward the independent worker that the latter extends to the former, we would not be here today.

But, we also hold it to be the constitutional right of the independent worker to refuse to join a union if he so desires, and remain at his job if his employer is willing that he should, regardless of the demands of his union fellow workers. Every American worker has this constitutional right to not join a union, and to obtain legitimate employment wherever he may find it, under terms and conditions satisfactory to him and his employer. This right to individual freedom in law-abiding thought and action is alienable, and is the most fundamental right in our economic life. Unionism denies this right. If this statement is contradicted, then I say, let an independent worker try to obtain employment in a union, or closed shop. Or, let him try to hold a job he already has and remain independent, if his fellow workers on the same job have become unionized.

Mr. Chairman, the Independent Workers League of America, Inc., are opposed to the passage of the Wagner bill. We are advised by able legal authorities that this bill is unconstitutional because of more than one questionable feature. Those points are best pointed out to you by capable advisers appearing before you. We wish to emphasize only one vital point, namely, majority rule. Now the majority rule is an accepted principle in the every-day affairs of our country. But it is an accepted principle because of the fact that the right to rule by the majority is given only after the will of the majority has been determined by the free expression of the choice and wishes of the individual. Behind the will of the majority is presumed to be the rule of reason.

This bill proposes to make it a law of the land for the majority rule to be imposed upon all of the employees of any industry, and that includes every industry.

Up to this point this bill appears safe and to mean no harm. You may also be safe when a gun is shoved into your ribs on a dark street and told to politely hand over the bank roll. Perhaps nothing may happen to you if you will just do as you are told. You may even be handed back some loose change for car fare.

If this bill becomes the law of the land, a club will be placed in the hands of unionism that will enable it, by means of intimidation, force, and violence, to compel independent workers to go into its ranks or starve. This bill proposes that 51 percent of any group of employees may force their will upon the entire group. Every man and woman of intelligence knows that. If all the injuries to property, if all the injuries to independent workers, regarded and referred to by union men as "scabs" and "rats", if all the murders committed to further the cause that this bill seeks to bolster could be tabulated and shown, those revelations would stagger this country. In short, gentlemen, this bill aims to make it possible for unionism to make the closed shop the rule and the ruling power of American industry. It will establish a minority group as a preferred class, with special privileges before the law.

Mr. Chairman, it is estimated that membership in the unions total from four to five million. By what right under God, and in this land, do you propose to put such power in the hands of this small organized minority?

The crux of our protest is, that this bill proposes and was designed entirely for the purpose of putting into the hands of what is now by far the minority of our wage earners the legal right to go out, force the individual into their ranks that they may enroll a sufficient number to show a majority. The rule of reason is forgotten and brushed aside. Not one word of restraint placed upon the present set-up of unionism. We are fully warranted in judging future activities by the long record of strikes, riots, threats, and sabotage written into the industrial life of this country under the cloak of organized labor. The rights and wishes of the vast majority as represented by the ranks of the independent workers are to be destroyed for the selfish interest or what is an unquestioned minority.

What protection do you offer the vast unorganized majority of some 45 million independent workers? The Independent Workers' League of America speaks for this vast majority. Not officially as yet, but in the name of justice. We expect the time to come when we will be their official representative, for we are rapidly progressing with their organization. But you can rest assured, gentlemen, that these 45 million independent workers are unalterably opposed to the closed-shop principle which, in effect, will be established by the passage of this bill.

This is the organized minority's second attempt to force the closed-shop principle upon industry and the workers through means of special legislation. Section 7a of the N. R. A. was instigated by this organized minority to gain control of industry and to dictate from the closed-shop standpoint the wages and conditions, and who should and who should not be allowed to work. Organized labor's construction of section 7a has been declared to be incorrect by the courts, and this bill appears to be simply another device to make organized labor's interpretation of section 7a the law of the land.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, we consider that this bill will breed class hatred, will be fruitful of labor disturbances and strikes, and will prepare a fertile field for communistic and anarchistic agitators. It will certainly make the closed shop the rule and the ruling power. The organized minority is now asking you to make it possible for it to dominate industry. If you grant this request, the day is not far away when you will be asked to actually confiscate industry and place it under organized labor's control. I thank yoo.

Mr. Chairman, I appreciate very much your courtesy in allowing me this chance to be heard before your committee.

The CHAIRMAN. I have the following telegram from E. C. Alexander, secretary of Tri-City Manufacturers' Association of Moline, Ill., which I desire to have inserted in the record.

Governing board of Tri-City Manufacturers' Association composing 259 manufacturing plants with annual output of $147,000,000, aggregate pay roll of 20,000 employees reaching $30,000,000 annually located in Moline, Rock Island, East Moline, and Silvis, Ill., and Davenport and Bettendorf, Iowa, respectfully urge your active opposition to Wagner labor relations bill since it proposes to impede permanent economics recovery through imposition of drastic, unfair, un-American, and unconstitutional labor policies which, if made effective by Congress, would be inimical to best interests of employees, employers, and forgotten general public of this area.

The CHAIRMAN. I have the following telegram from a number of business concerns in the city of Chicago Heights, Ill., which I desire to have copied into the record.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH, Senator,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

We, the undersigned executives of industries in Chicago Heights, Ill., believe that the Wagner labor relations bill is intended and will result in forcing all employers to operate under the "closed shop" and employees to join labor unions and tie up the industries in this district in serious labor disputes and strikes. The United States census of manufacturers shows that there were 2,380 less industries in Illinois in 1933 than in 1931, and 4,593 less than in 1929. The vast majority of these industries today are struggling to meet their pay rolls and keep people at work; however, if Members of Congress force upon industry such unfair and unwarranted legislation as is here proposed it will be the last straw that puts many of these remaining industries over the line into bankruptcy.

NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD

TUESDAY, MARCH 26, 1935

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION AND LABOR,
Washington, D. C.

The committee met, at 10:30 a. m., in room 318, Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

Present: Senators Walsh (chairman), Murphy, Thomas, and Murray.

Also present: Senators Wagner, Tydings, and McCarran.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will please come to order.

The United States Steel Corporation, I understand, desires to put in its written brief in opposition to the proposed Wagner bill. Will the representative of that company please come forward?

STATEMENT OF RAOUL E. DESVERNINE, NEW YORK CITY, REPRESENTING THE UNITED STATES STEEL CORPORATION AND SUBSIDIARIES

The CHAIRMAN. What is your full name for the record?

Mr. DESVERNINE. Raoul E. Desvernine.

The CHAIRMAN. Where is your residence?

Mr. DESVERNINE. 15 Broad Street, New York City.

The CHAIRMAN. In what capacity are you appearing before this committee?

Mr. DESVERNINE. As counsel for the United States Steel Corporation and its subsidiaries, submitting its statement.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you submitting a brief?

Mr. DESVERNINE. Yes, sir.

(The brief of the United States Steel Corporation is hereto attached, as follows:)

STATEMENT OF UNITED STATES STEEL CORPORATION AND SUBSIDIARIES IN OPPOSITION TO PROPOSED NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS ACT

To the Committee on Education and Labor of the United States Senate:

The United States Steel Corporation and its subsidiaries appear in opposition to S. 1958 cited as the National Labor Relations Act introduced by Senator Robert Wagner, of New York, February 15 (calendar day, Feb. 21), 1935, and respectfully submit the following facts and arguments in opposition to said bill as the same affects them.

The express purposes of the bill as set forth in the title are primarily "to promote equality of bargaining power between employers and employees", and "to diminish the causes of labor disputes." Before analyzing in detail the provisions of the bill and the problems of their practical application, we wish to explain the relations that exist at present between us and our employees and the means that are already available for bargaining between us and our employees.

Our policy toward our employees and their right to meet and bargain with us is probably best expressed by the statement which several of our subsidiaries have made as a matter of record to the National Steel Labor Relations Board.[1] That statement is that:

"The company has not refused to meet and collectively bargain with any of its employees or any group of its employees or their representatives, but has at all times done so. The company will receive and negotiate with members of any organization, as such, as representatives of those employees whom they represent, irrespective of their number, and will undertake to adjust their complaints as to wages, discharges, and similar items, but the company does not engage to make any term contracts.

That statement is not merely a statement of what we propose to do but it is a statement of what actually has been our policy. No additional legislation is necessary in the interest of our employees to insure freedom of collective bargaining.

Employee representation plans are operating as a means of facilitating and carrying out collective bargaining in practically all of our plants or districts. We have annexed hereto as "schedule A" a statement showing the number and percentage of employees who have voluntarily voted at elections for the adoption of employee representation plans. We also have attached hereto as "schedule B" a statement showing the number and percentage of employees who have voluntarily voted at the last elections for employee representatives under such plans.

In plants or districts employing normally approximately 129,798 eligible employees, over 83 percent of our employees have voted at elections specifically and affirmatively adopting an employee representation plan as their desired plan and means of exercising their rights of collective bargaining, and at a later period, in these same plants or districts, but then employing 136,761 eligible employees, over 89 percent of the employees have voted for the election of employee representatives under employee representation plans.

All of said elections have been fairly held, so as to indicate the actual desires of the employees participating in such elections. In elections for candidates the practice has uniformly been to have a primary election where the employees could by secret ballot[2] nominate candidates for employee representatives, and after such primary election to hold a final election by secret ballot.[3] This ballot would contain the names of the two or more persons having received the greatest number of votes at the primary elections. The employees are free to choose as their candidates for representative any person except a supervisory or executive official of the company, and their choice is in nowise limited to fellow employees in their plant or industry. The ballots have been prepared by the employees themselves and the elections have been held under their supervision. All elections have been by secret ballot, and at no time have we or our subsidiaries in any way influenced or suggested how or for whom our employees should vote.[4]

Under the circumstances it is submitted that the results of such elections clearly and fairly establish the desires of the employees participating in such elections as to the representatives they wish to represent them and the form of plan or organization to be the basis for such representation.

The employee representation plans established at the plants or districts of our subsidiaries are not mere formalities. The employee representatives under such plans have been actively dealing with the respective managements on behalf of the employees. For an illustration of how such plans have been working, attention is called to the record before the National Steel Labor Relations Board in the Matter of Carnegie Steel Co.—Duquesne plant, at page 66, in which there appears the following record as to the effectiveness of that employee representation plan from the end of June 1933 through September 1934: Number of meetings held, 81; number of cases referred to representatives or committees for decision, 127; number of cases affecting wages, 21; number of cases affecting safety, 21; number of cases affecting working conditions, 50; number of other cases, 35; number of cases settled, 121, or 95.2 percent. At the end of that period 93 cases, or 76.8 percent, had been settled in favor of the employees; 20, or 16.5 percent, had been decided against the employees; and 5, or 4.1 percent, had been compromised. Three, or 2.5 percent, had been withdrawn, and 6, or 4.7 percent, were undisposed of. That record is typical of the activity on behalf of employees of the employee representation plans in effect at our various plants or districts.

The statement appears at p. 151 of the record: "Now, as to whether the company actually seeks to influence the selection of particular candidates is not necessarily a pertinent inquiry from my point of view. In fact, I haven't maintained that the company does do that."

There has been comment that these plans are objectionable because we, in the first instance, had something to do with suggesting their form. As long as the plans are voluntarily chosen by the employees and the plans are working effectively and satisfactorily to the employees, it is submitted that how the plans originated is immaterial. However, in order that you may have a complete understanding of the facts we wish to explain the origin of these plans.

Most of the employee representation plans of our employees had been put into effect prior to July 1933. We had realized that if our employees were to be able properly to exercise the rights of collective bargaining specifically guaranteed them by the National Industrial Recovery Act, it would be advisble for them to have some workable plan presented to them which they could use or not, as they saw fit. There are approximately 200,000 employees normally employed by us and our subsidiaries. Employees in the various plants and districts cannot readily get together in mass meetings because of the necessity for the continued operation of plants and the consequent working of employees in shifts. These and other problems seemed to us to make it advisable, in the interests of the employees, to prepare some fair workable form for collective action which they might use. Otherwise, they would probably have been subjected to much unnecessary agitation which would not have been in their own interests and which would have been distinctly harmful to the conduct of the operations of our various plants.

With those thoughts in mind, we drafted what seemed to us a practical means through which our employees could act. We submitted such draft plans to the National Labor Board and to the Compliance Board of the National Recovery Administration so as to receive the benefit of their suggestions; and as a result suggestions for changes were received and many of them were adopted. The net result was an expression from the head of the Compliance Board that there was no criticism of the plans as then amended, and that it was a legal and effective means of collective bargaining. The same opinions were expressed by members and officials of the National Labor Board.[5]

The plans were then printed and circulated among the employees of our various plants and districts so that the employees could have an opportunity for examining the plans and making up their own minds as to whether or not they were satisfactory to them. Amendments have from time to time been made at the suggestion of the employees or the employee representatives themselves. The great majority of plans have shown considerable development in their terms and provisions since the day when they were originally submitted to the employees. This is entirely consistent with our original policy of merely furnishing to our employees a means of facilitating their collective action with the hope that they, if said plans were reasonably satisfactory to a substantial majority of the employees, could, through such plans, work out and develop more in detail effective employees' organizations in practical units which would insure the rights of collective bargaining and would be practically workable from the point of view of our operating structure.

Any proposed legislation purporting to be for the benefit of the employees of the country must necessarily be considered as to its effect on the existing relations already established between employees and their employers. We and our subsidiaries, as previously stated, normally employ approximately 200,000 employees, and any legislation which would adversely affect their employee representation plans should be subject to the most careful scrutiny. It would undoubtedly, through confusion and disorganization of the established means which are working satisfactorily to the employees, not be in the interests of the employees. Furthermore, it could not help but adversely affect our business operations.

We will therefore proceed to an analysis of the bill and attempt to summarize briefly the effects of such bill on us and our subsidiaries and on our relations with our employees.

I. THE COLLECTIVE-BARGAINING PROVISIONS OF THE BILL

Sections 7, 8, and 9 of the bill embody the provisions purporting to insure to employees the right of collective bargaining. As a matter of fact, they also embody many provisions which appear to be against the interest of the employees as such and also against the interest of many businesses honestly and sincerely bargaining with their employees.

The right of collective bargaining as embodied in section 7 (a) of the National Industrial Recovery Act is set forth in the following terms:

"Employees shall have the right to organize and bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and shall be free from the interference, restraint, or coercion of employers of labor, or their agents, in the designation of such representatives or in self-organization or in other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection."

It is to be noted that that section guarantees to the employees the right of organization for the purpose of insuring their rights of collective bargaining. The present bill (sec. 7) is, however, subject to a construction which would make it mean that employees have, apart from any collective-bargaining rights for their own interests, a basic and fundamental right to form, join, or assist labor organizations as such irrespective of whether such assistance given labor organizations has any effect on the relations between such employee and his employer. The right to assist labor organizations under this possible interpretation of the bill might, irrespective of any grievances which the employee might have as to his employment, be considered a guaranty or at least legislative approval of the right of the general sympathetic strike to further the interests of labor organizations as such entirely apart from the relationship between the employees and their employers. There is no justification for enacting any legislation which is capable of such possible construction. The rights of an employee to bargain with his employer and to be free to join with other employees in concerted action to improve his conditions are fully recognized by us and our subsidiaries; but legislation directed to strengthening labor organizations as such is class legislation, which has the interest of the employees only remotely, if at all, as an aim.

Section 8 sets forth what purports to be unfair labor practices, but it is too one-sided to be actually in the interests of the employees. In the first place, there is no definition of unfair labor practices generally. It is merely a definition of unfair labor practices for an employer. Section 2, subdivision (2), defines the term "employer" and excludes from such definition any labor organization or anyone acting in the capacity of an officer or agent of such labor organization. The bill, therefore, expressly exempts all labor organizations from any statutory restriction of interfering, coercing, or intimidating employees as to how they shall organize. If the bill had the interests of the employee at heart, it should outlaw intimidation, coercion, and interference of employees in their organizing, regardless of who caused such interference, intimidation, or coercion. If the labor organizations are intending fairly and honestly to further the desires and interests of the employees, they can have no objection to a statutory provision which prevents them from intimidating or coercing employees. Certainly any legislation which purports to be a guaranty of the right of employees to organize in whatever fashion they choose should be directed fundamentally to guaranteeing that right rather than restricting certain persons from interfering with that right. The guaranty should require that all persons or organizations respect the right of the employees which the bill purports to secure.

The limited rights of collective bargaining purported to be guaranteed by the bill, however, are further confused by the definition of the term "employee", contained in section 2, subdivision (3). An employee, by that definition, if he ceases working in consequence of a labor dispute, continues to be classed as an employee until he obtains other regular employment. There is no time limit, and if employees cease working through any dispute, they continue to be classed as employees until they find regular employment, even though the dispute may have been settled for a considerable length of time. Any such definition will prevent an employer from knowing who his employees are and will prevent the employees actually working in the plant from knowing who their fellow employees are and possibly from carrying out the wishes of a majority of those who are actually the employees.

Subdivision (2) of section 8 makes it an unfair labor practice for an employer to "dominate" the formation of any labor organization. Employee representation plans are undoubtedly labor organizations. Such plans as are now in force at our plants and districts are the outgrowth of our efforts, in cooperation with the National Labor Board and the Compliance Board. to put before our employees plans which might be satisfactory to them. It is possible that such efforts of an employer to assist his employees might be held to be outlawed by this provision even though the employees not only did not object but had actually and affirmatively approved the plan originally worked out by the employer. The trouble with the whole bill is that it is designed to prevent any cooperation between an employer and his employees. It is designed to throw them into controversy and dealings at arms' length instead of setting forth certain basic rights of employees and imposing penalties for violation of those rights of employees.

Subdivision (2) of section 8 also makes it an unfair labor practice for an employer to "contribute financial or other support" to a labor organization. This would prevent us and our subsidiaries from paying any bills or expenses of the operation of any employees' plan, regardless of whether such payments were for the benefit of employees, and even if such payments were made without any restrictions which would hamper the free and fair collective action of the employees.

As a matter of fact, we have paid certain expenses incurred by the employee representation plans at our plants or districts; but there never has been any effort or intention through such payments to influence, control, and restrict or in any way dominate the employee representation plans. Our interest has been solely to avoid controversy and confusion at our plants and to permit our employees to get together with as little difficulty as possible. Incidental expenses, such as printing ballots, printing plans, and printing notices all take some money, and if an employer is subject to a blanket restriction which will prevent him from paying any such amounts it means that employees cannot organize and get together on any substantial scale unless they look to some outside labor organizations for financial support. This provision is a definite legislative attempt to force employees to organize only through outside organizations, to which they must pay dues. It ties in with the clear inference from the provisions heretofore referred to, which show that the interest of the employees are only the secondary element of this bill and the interests of the professional labor organizations first. Such labor organizations are left free from any restrictions under the bill, and any efforts of an employer to cooperate and work with his employees in peace and harmony are so restricted and penalized that an employee will, if he desires to have any collective action with his fellow employees, be forced by this legislative action to join a professional outside labor organization.

Section 9 effectively establishes the "majority rule." This section delegates to the Labor Board created by the bill the power to define the units in which employees should be grouped for collective action and then requires that all employees in such group must abide by the decision of the majority in their collective bargaining with their employer. Section 7 (a) of the National Industrial Recovery Act by its terms guaranteed the right of collective bargaining to all employees and thus to each employee. Each employee was free to join with such employees as he chose and equally free to refrain from joining with any employees that he did not choose to join. There was no attempt to require that any employee, as a condition of his employment, must surrender to some organization or group of employees control over his dealings with his employer. Apart from any constitutional question as to whether such provisions can be valid, it is submitted that it is not in the interests of any employee to take away from him the right to determine with what group or organization of employees he will associate himself. The provisions of the bill are quite different from requiring that all members of an organization abide by the majority vote of the other members of the organization, for when a person joins an organization or voluntarily groups himself with others, there may be inferred some authorization on his part by joining such organization or group to authorize the majority to act for him. Under the bill, however, the employee has no option as to whether or not he will join in such group or organization. The Labor Board sets up the limits of the district, area, or plant, and when the area has been so specified by the board all employees, whether they like the district or not, must abide by the majority vote in that district.

The section does give to minorities the right of presenting their grievances, but there is no need of any statutory provision to insure that right. Even if there were, there is no reason why the minority forced into an artificial group should not equally with the majority have the power to deal and bargain with their employer. Certainly, there is no reason if the fundamental purpose is to protect the interest of the employees.

II. THE PROPOSED NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD AND ITS POWERS UNDER THE BILL

Section 3 provides for the creation of a new Labor Board to be designated as the "National Labor Relations Board."

Section 10 of the bill is entitled "Prevention of unfair labor practices" and empowers the Board to prevent any person from engaging in unfair labor practices affecting commerce. This power granted to the Board is declared by the bill to be exclusive. It is not to be affected by any other means of adjustment or prevention that has been or may be established. The present bill thus attempts to supersede all of the machinery heretofore established under the National Industrial Recovery Act, the codes, etc., for the settlement of labor disputes. It is at variance with the fundamental principle of the N. R. A. of Government-supervised self-regulation of industry and labor. The machinery which has been established for such self-regulation is now to be subordinated to the exclusive control of this new Labor Board.

The exclusive agency of the Board for settling labor disputes is strengthened through the delegation of unreasonable powers. It can file its complaints alleging unfair labor practices. It can hold the hearings on the complaints which it has issued and can amend its complaints even after the taking of testimony and can issue orders requiring anyone to cease or desist from such unfair labor practice found by the Board. The Board is therefore plaintiff, judge, and jury, with power to change the basis of the complaints at any time before final order. Such powers are absolutely unprecedented and are not consistent with fair judicial practice. Furthermore, the Board, in determining what testimony to admit and what to exclude, is not bound by any of the customary rules of evidence. Moreover, its findings of fact are stated to be conclusive if supported by evidence.

Section 12, furthermore, gives the Board broad powers of investigation, so that not only can the Board start proceedings before itself as judge, but it can conduct broad investigations to collect evidence in actions which it, as complainant, is bringing before itself. This further adds to the unreasonable and arbitrary powers granted to this Board.

The bill does, however, provide for the right to have the orders of the Labor Board reviewed by the circuit courts of appeal. Furthermore, in spite of the so-called "exclusive" jurisdiction of the new Labor Board, section 11 invests the districts courts of the United States with jurisdiction to prevent and restrain any unfair labor practice affecting commerce, and authorizes the bringing of proceedings at the request of the Labor Board to restrain unfair labor practices. The effect of sections 10 and 11 is that the bill, in spite of giving exclusive power to one body to settle labor disputes, actually authorizes two bodies to do so. There is nothing to explain this inconsistency.

The arbitrary powers of the Board are protected by the imposition of penalties under section 14. These penalties are imposed not only for wilfully assaulting, resisting, or preventing the performance of duties of the Board, its members, etc., but also for interfering with or impeding the Board or its members, etc. When all of the powers granted to the Board are fully considered—making complaints, holding hearings on such complaints, conducting investigations, etc.—it is difficult to determine what may constitute impeding or interfering with such powers. The exercise of many legal rights in properly protecting the interests of a person brought before the Board might be construed as preventing the most expeditious handling of the complaint brought by the Board and might thus be held to be impeding the action of the Board. The present language of the bill might, therefore, be construed as imposing penalties for the exercise of legal rights. The provisions are entirely too vague for a penal statute.

Dated, New York, March 25, 1935.

Respectfully submitted.

The CHAIRMAN. Your full name is J. M. Larkin?
Mr. LARKIN. Yes, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. What is your connection with the Bethlehem Steel Co.?
Mr. LARKIN. Vice President of the Bethlehem Steel Co.
The CHAIRMAN. You desire to submit a written statement in their behalf?
Mr. LARKIN. Yes; on behalf of the Bethlehem Steel Co.
The CHAIRMAN. That may appear in the record.
(The statement of Bethlehem Steel Co. is as follows:)

BETHLEHEM STEEL CO., INC.,
Bethlehem, Pa., March 26, 1935.

DEAR SENATOR WALSH: On behalf of Bethlehem Steel Co., I wish to register opposition to the proposed National Labor Relations Act, Senate bill S. 1958, Seventy-fourth Congress, first session.

I appeared before your committee on April 5, 1934, in opposition to the then proposed Labor Disputes Act, Senate bill S. 2926, Seventy-third Congress, second session, hearings on which were then being held by your committee.

I have considered my prior statement in the light of such proposed National Labor Relations Act, now before your committee, and I wish to reaffirm that statement as applicable to the new bill. I would therefore thank you to record this letter, together with my earlier statement (copy enclosed) as an expression of our opposition to the whole philosophy of such bill.

In order to bring my previous statement up to date, I bring to your attention the facts after satisfactory relationships have continued for another year under the employees' representation plans, which have been in effect in the plants of our company for over 16 years.

During the last year some 800 new major questions having to do with hours, wages, and working conditions have been adjusted under those plans with mutual satisfaction to employees and employer.

The annual elections have just been completed wherein 45,950 employees have chosen 429 spokesmen to represent them in dealing with the management for the coming year. In such elections, which have been conducted by the employees themselves, 92.2 percent of the 45,950 workers operating under the employees' representation plans cast their ballots. This virtually unanimous endorsement of the plans is even more significant, when it is considered that 92.2 percent registered their approval of the plans in the face of organized agitation against them from the outside.

In view of the foregoing facts, I am sure your committee will appreciate that it would be a calamity to allow anything to be done through legislation or otherwise that would in any way undermine these plans I commend these considerations to your attention with the added thought that the contemplated legislation is not only unnecessary, but would indeed be most harmful and upsetting to the public welfare.

Sincerely yours,

J. M. LARKIN, Vice President.

APRIL 5, 1934.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
Chairman Senate Committee on Education and Labor,
United States Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am J. M. Larkin, vice president of Bethlehem Steel Co. I am appearing before your committee in opposition to the Wagner bill because I fear that it would legislate out of existence plans of employee representation which are in effect among the employees of many industries in this country, including employees of the company that I represent, and which I know to be good from the point of view of the employees.

Such employee-representation plans have been in operation among the employees of our company for more than 15 years. They have provided a happy and successful working arrangement which our men and our management have found mutually advantageous and satisfactory during that period, and we are wholly opposed to any legislation which would destroy or adversely affect them.

In order to make clear our specific objection to the bill I shall try to present briefly the facts and the principles which lead us to the conviction that employee-representation plans such as the employees of our company have are the most practical method by which labor relationships may be carried on, not only from the standpoint of employees and employers but also from that of the public welfare, and to the conviction that Congress should be most careful not to pass any laws that might adversely affect such plans.

Our plans were adopted because it was believed that they provide the most effective form of handling labor relationships. They were not adopted, as some critics have charged, as a device to forestall unionism, and this was made clear at their inception.

The purpose of the employee-representation plans is to establish a continuous day-to-day channel of communication between management and men. They aim to set up a method whereby all complaints can be quickly heard and adjusted and all suggestions can be considered on their merits, and whereby the men can elect their representatives without any influence from the management, so that the dealings will be clean-cut and on a sound basis.

The underlying philosophy of the employee-representation plans is that the best interests of labor can be served by having the employee and employer sit down together in a friendly and constructive atmosphere and, with a first-hand practical knowledge of their problems, work out a fair and equitable solution. Therein lies the strength of employee representation as contrasted with other forms of collective bargaining which seek to organize employees and employers into separate camps with drawn battle lines.. This was the condition which existed in industry 30 years ago. It is a condition to which we must not revert.

EARLY STAGES OF REPRESENTATION

This employee-representation idea, of course, is not new. Scores of plans have been in effect for many years, and the criticism of them that has recently developed is due to a large extent to the resistance that the employees themselves have shown to the efforts to organize them which the union leaders have made.

Back in the early post-war years, with their unsettled labor conditions, these plans were already in effect in a number of companies. In that period President Wilson created his Second Industrial Conference which was called upon to study the cause of industrial unrest and to suggest measures for preventing

it. It is significant that such conference made a report in which it recommended employees' representation plans as a practical method of fair and effective collective bargaining.

It is also significant that in the recent settlement of the threatened automobile strike President Roosevelt expressed the hope that employees and employers might develop an effective form of direct joint participation through some sort of works council. In both cases it was made clear that the Government did not favor any particular union or form of employee representation. As President Roosevelt expressed it—

"The Government's only duty is to secure absolutely an uninfluenced freedom of choice without coercion, restraint, or intimidation from any source."

I believe that that is exactly the atmosphere in which real employee representation plans should operate. My general criticism of the Wagner bill is not so much that it supports unionization as that it will in operation result in enforced unionization for every kind and condition of collective bargaining.

COMPANY DOMINATION

Now, there are several principles with respect to employee representation which are fundamental to its success from any point of view. The first of these is the independence of the representatives. There has been a great deal of dust raised about company domination, and it is assumed by some people that every such plan is dominated by the employer company. That is very far from the truth. On the contrary, it is generally recognized by employers that, if these plans are to be of any value to anyone, they must provide a forum for free and open discussion of all problems affecting labor, and no company which has had the long and satisfactory relationship with its employees that our company has had would think of denying them the fullest freedom of action in this regard.

Business men have some common sense. They know that they cannot deceive their employees and at the same time preserve their loyalty and good will. No experienced management would attempt to establish a thoroughly dominated company union, with representatives picked out by them for the purpose of scenery. Nothing would be accomplished by such a set-up, and business men know it. They know that the representatives with whom they are to deal must truly represent the men. They know that if the plans are to operate effectively they must have the support and confidence of the employees.

In dealing with labor as well as in other relationships, sincerity and honesty of purpose are the only principles that pay in the long run. That may sound rather obvious and old-fashioned, but it is a good rule of successful business operation, which is not going to change.

From their inception 15 years ago, our employee-representation plans have operated on a fair and above-board basis. They have provided to our employees an opportunity for collective bargaining absolutely free from domination or intimidation and a ready means by which their employment problems have been and are solved.

GUARANTEES AGAINST DISCRIMINATION

Our plans expressly provide that no employee representative shall be discriminated against for his activities in representing his constituents. They give the representatives the right to appeal any case to the department of labor of the State in which the particular plant is located, or to the United States Department of labor. I do not see how there can be any guaranty better than that. In fact, I think that there is a danger of our forgetting that in the United States Department of Labor we already have a fair tribunal which should command the respect of the American public.

Our plans further guarantee protection of the men from any discrimination because of creed, race, or union membership. All nominations and elections are conducted entirely by the employees themselves by secret ballot with proper safeguards, including ample notification of the time and place of nominations and elections.

MUTUAL PARTICIPATION IN DISCUSSIONS

Another major principle in our employee-representation plans is that of mutual participation in discussions of all problems affecting the employees and the management. This is vital to the success of the plans. It is the very feature which distinguishes them as a method of joint and effective cooperation, as compared with the battle-front method, of settling disputes.

Mutual participation is a two-way street, as much a benefit to the men as it is to the employer. It is an advantage to the men to be able to sit down with an equal number of representatives from the management to discuss face to face on a friendly basis the various problems which arise. If management refuses such participation, it should certainly be criticized for so doing. But management also desires it, because it believes that an employee who is informed of his employer's policies and problems and is treated fairly will be a satisfied and therefore a better worker.

In our plans the employee committees are entirely free to meet by themselves, but as a matter of general practice the quick and effective route of working out the current problems is found to be in the meeting of joint committees consisting of representatives of the employees and the management.

ACTUAL EXPERIENCE IN SETTLEMENT OF CASES

That a wide range of matters come up for consideration from day to day and week to week in indicated by the fact that 7,078 major cases have been decided in the past 15 years under the employees-representation plans in effect at the plants of our company. Of these, 1,265 cases dealt with wages and 1,497 with working conditions. Then we find such other important matters as relief, pensions, sanitation, operating practices, accident prevention, and employee transportation.

That these plans provide for the employees a practical method of bargaining and that the decisions are not dominated by the employer is seen in the record which shows that 4,813 of the 7,078 cases to which I have referred were decided as the employees recommended, and that an additional 817 cases were compromised. Thus almost 80 percent of the cases brought up by the employees were decided in accordance with their recommendations or in a manner satisfactory to them.

COMPENSATION FOR TIME CONSUMED IN PERFORMING DUTIES

The next point on which I wish to comment is the provision in our plans whereby the employee representatives are compensated at their regular rate of pay for the time devoted to performing their duties under the plans. Some critics have stated that if men are paid their wages while they are actually serving on a committee, their views will be necessarily biased. Such a statement is based on the misconception of the whole idea. We have always regarded our plans as an integral part of our organization.

I cannot see any sound reason for discriminating against the employees by requiring that their meetings be held at their expense. As I see it, those who think that the representative should serve at his own or the employees' expense cannot have any particular friendship for labor. Indeed, some formal labor agreements which have governmental sanction definitely stipulate that the employees' representatives shall be permitted to attend to their duties at the employer's expense. Our experience over 15 years has been that elected representatives have performed their duties in a fearless, intelligent manner. Anyone who says that an employee is going to compromise his conscience just because his wages continue while he is attending to committee business has an unjustifiably low opinion of the American worker. I believe that employees generally will subscribe to this view and will resent any legislation that will cause them needless loss of wages.

THE SUCCESS OF SUCH PLANS DEMANDS THEIR PROTECTION

"The proof of the pudding is in the eating." Plans such as ours that have provided 15 years of industrial peace prove themselves—they stand on their own merits. Millions of employees are organized under such plans for collective bargaining agreed upon by the employees and the employers, and I am confident that there cannot be the slightest justification for upsetting them.

In industries where employee representation plans have operated successfully the best of working conditions will be found to exist. In commenting upon the spirit with which all parties entered into the negotiations leading to the settlement of the threatened automobile strike, President Roosevelt said:

"It (that is, the settlement) is a complete answer to those critics who have asserted that managers and employees cannot cooperate for the public good without domination by selfish interest."

This, I believe, expresses the philosophy underlying the success of employee representation plans.

It would be a calamity to do anything by legislation or otherwise to undermine these plans in any way. On the contrary, I cannot think of any better contribution to the general welfare of labor and the public than a careful safeguarding and further extension of them.

The employees at our various plants have recently conducted elections under their employee-representation plans. All told, 42,000 employees were eligible to vote. I think that it is very significant that in some of our largest plants more than 90 percent of the employees participated in such elections, and that more than 86 percent of the employees in all our plants participated in them.

I know that as a practical business matter the management of our company has always desired to know the sincere and frank opinions of the men on all subjects related to their employment. Our plans have been amended from time to time when local conditions seemed to make it desirable, and we are concerned with these changes only to the extent that they make the plans more workable and effective. Such amendments and suggestions are brought forward by our men from time to time; legislation is not necessary to accomplish any really desirable changes. We favor everything that will foster the free expression by our employees of their views on labor matters to our management.

NEED FOR LABOR BOARD OVEREMPHASIZED

The National Labor Board has emphasized that it has settled labor disputes involving more than a million persons. That is highly commendable. It does not appear whether that number of employees were directly involved in such cases; but, however that may be, it must be remembered that there are over 23,000,000 workers that have not required such mediation.

The very fact of the existence of such a Board as the National Labor Board has tended to promote agitation on the part of professional strike fomenters. A disgruntled minority will always try to capitalize such a situation, and the public welfare is concerned, if such a Board allows itself to be misdirected into encouraging discord.

I think it unfortunate that so much attention has been paid and that so much emphasis has been put upon the relatively small number of cases where there has been dissatisfaction. These, I think, have obscured the real situation existing in industry. Indeed, it is perhaps surprising that, with all the effort in some quarters toward capitalizing the emergency and creating unrest, more trouble has not developed. It is, of course, natural that where the points of disturbance have been somewhat important unusual attention has been attracted to them. Nevertheless, when we think in terms of national policy, we must not lose sight of the fact that the normal average condition in industry is one of peaceful cooperation between employee and employer.

We are opposed to any bill which would set up a restrictive, militant system in place of methods which have worked successfully in our experience for all concerned over many years. The whole philosophy of this proposed legislation, based as it is upon the fomented dissatisfaction of a small area of our national industrial life, seems to me to be wrong. We feel that further legislation at this time is entirely unnecessary. Industrial relationships do not demand it; section 7 (a) of the Recovery Act is a sufficient guarantee to workers, and it should stand as it is, all interested relying upon existing powers of enforcement as sufficient. We believe that it would be the part of wisdom to change the whole approach to this problem of improving industrial relations, which can readily be done without legislation; and that no one method of collective bargaining should be created by legislative edict to the exclusion of other methods—certainly not until the constructive things that have been done by industry and labor in the application of those other methods shall have been thoroughly examined and weighed and found wanting.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there anyone else who desires to submit a written statement, or a brief, for the record?

Mr. BROWN. I would like to do so, Mr. Chairman.

STATEMENT OF GROVER C. BROWN, NEW YORK CITY, REPRESENTING AMERICAN IRON & STEEL INSTITUTE

The CHAIRMAN. Will you state your full name for the record?

Mr. BROWN. Grover C. Brown.

The CHAIRMAN. You are appearing here in what capacity?

Mr. BROWN. As the representative of the American Iron & Steel Institute, New York City.

The CHAIRMAN. You desire to file a brief or statement?

Mr. BROWN. I desire to file a statement of the position of a number of representative companies of the steel industry.

The CHAIRMAN. That may be included in the record.

(Said statement is as follows:)

A STATEMENT OF THE STEEL INDUSTRY'S POSITION ON THE WAGNER LABOR RELATIONS ACT

MARCH 25, 1935.

Strong opposition to enactment of the Wagner Labor Relations Act now before Congress on the ground that it would stir up industrial conflict throughout the country and retard business recovery is expressed by representative leaders of the iron and steel industry in a statement issued at the offices of the American Iron & Steel Institute:

"The measure rests upon the false and un-American theory that harmony and cooperation is impossible between employees and employers", says the statement. "More than that, it is designed to prevent any such cooperation. Its enactment would set the stage for a conflict which would injure the relations between employees and employers for all time and seriously retard national recovery.

"One of the most destructive effects of the bill would be to strangle employee representation plans which have been in satisfactory operation in numerous industries for many years and are mutually desired by employees and employers. The bill is a definite legislative attempt to force employees to organize only through outside organizations to which they must pay dues.

"This makes it quite clear that the interests of the employees themselves are a secondary consideration of the bill, the first being that of professional labor organizations.

"Such labor organizations are left free from any restrictions under the bill. They can interfere, coerce, or intimidate empolyees at their will. Quite properly, of course, employers are prohibited from coercion or intimidation, but if the measure had the interests of employees at heart, coercive methods of any sort and from any source would be prohibited.

"The obvious intention of the bill is, through the 'majority rule', to impose a closed shop upon industry and create a monopoly in favor of professional labor unions. The closed shop is un-American, and employees in the steel industry and many other great industries have clearly indicated their rejection of any such principle.

"At the present time, peaceful relations exist in the steel industry between employees and employers as a result of the orderly working in practically all plants of employee representation plans. A recent industry-wide survey showed that from 85 to 90 percent of the more than 400,000 steel workers in the country are standing behind their employee representation plans of collective bargaining.

"By contrast, records made public at the annual American Federation of Labor Convention at San Francisco in October 1934 showed a total paid membership in the Amalgamated Association of Iron, Steel and Tin Workers of only 5,500 steel company employees, or less than 2 percent of the total of more than 400,000.

"The records of employee representation plans in the steel industry reveal that thousands of questions have been settled quietly and in an orderly manner. That the plans operate to the benefit of employees is indicated by the fact that 71 percent of all cases were settled in favor of the workers. As might be expected, more of the questions arising under the employee representation plans had to do with wages than with any other subject.

"In view of this widespread support among employees of employee representation plans and the successful and harmonious operation of these plans, it is easily understood why employees in the industry resent any effort to legislate them into professional outside unions in which they have not sought membership voluntarily and which would immediately plunge the industry into industrial controversy.

"The record of the steel industry since the inauguration of the Steel Code not only shows harmonious conditions but it discloses that annual earnings of the employees have increased by approximately $100,000,000 as a result of increased wage rates and added employment. There is nothing in this situation calling for drastic legislation such as is contemplated in the Wagner bill.

"The bill provides that the representatives of a majority of the employees in any unit shall be the exclusive representatives of all the employees in such unit. The steel industry believes that such 'majority rule' plan is unfair to union and nonunion groups alike.

"The industry holds any group of its employees entitled to a fair, equal hearing and that no minority group should be arbitrarily subjected to the will of the majority in matters affecting hours, wages, and conditions of employment. It insists, furthermore, that any individual has a right to make his own bargain with his employer, if he prefers to do so.

"The steel industry fully recognizes the rights of an employee to bargain with his employer and to be free to join with other employees to improve his condition. The steel industry opposes legislation such as the Wagner bill, which would serve not to safeguard the employees' rights of collective bargaining but merely to strengthen professional labor unions and to further project the Government into the field of private labor relations."

AMERICAN IRON AND STEEL INSTITUTE,

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Poole, you may come forward.

STATEMENT OF E. J. POOLE, VICE PRESIDENT, CARPENTER STEEL CO., READING, PA.

The CHAIRMAN. Will you state your full name for the record, Mr. Poole.

Mr. POOLE. My full name is E. J. Poole.

The CHAIRMAN. What is your connection with the Carpenter Steel Co.?

Mr. POOLE. I am vice president of the Carpenter Steel Co.

The CHAIRMAN. The place of business of the Carpenter Steel Co. is Reading, Pa.?

Mr. POOLE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. How many plants have you?

Mr. POOLE. One.

The CHAIRMAN. How many employees?

Mr. POOLE. About 1,150.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you any labor organization of your employees?

Mr. POOLE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What is that called?

Mr. POOLE. Carpenter Steel Co. Employee Representative Plan.

The CHAIRMAN. How many members are in that organization?

Mr. POOLE We do not have any membership list—that is, they do not, it is just the employees of the company.

The CHAIRMAN. It is one of those organizations where there is no membership list and no dues, where there is an annual meeting for the election of representatives to confer with the management?

Mr. POOLE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. How many representatives have the employees?

Mr. POOLE. Thirty.

The CHAIRMAN. How many has the management?

Mr. POOLE. Thirty.

The CHAIRMAN. They both sit together for the purpose of engaging in bargaining?

Mr. POOLE. At times; but most of the meetings are held by the employees, in an individual meeting.

The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed with your statement, Mr. Poole.

Mr. POOLE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, members of the committee, I am appearing before you today as a representative of not only the steel trade, but also much of the business interests of the great State of Pennsylvania, inasmuch as I am the president of the Pennsylvania State Chamber of Commerce, numbering more than 2,000 firms and corporations amongst its members, these firms and corporations having many thousands of employees.

May I also say that I have had nearly 50 years of experience in industrial work, 20 of which were as a workman, working under the supervision of others. I started my industrial experience as a laborer at the age of 11, advancing successively to a mechanic, foreman, master mechanic, assistant superintendent, superintendent, general superintendent, and vice president in charge of operations. I am also a director in the company with which I am connected.

That there has been wonderful improvements in working conditions during this period of time none can deny, and it is my opinion that this has been accomplished because men who have been workmen themselves have been growing with the industrial life of our Nation, bringing into management more and more the viewpoint of the workers. It is further my opinion that legislation will retard rather than help this improvement in working conditions, except where such legislation is enacted after careful study by both worker and management, and is so drawn as to keep the chiseler on both sides in line.

The Carpenter Steel Co., with which I have the honor to be connected, is a specialty steel plant where the orders are of small volume and go through many processes. There have been months when we have had more than 5,000 items represented in a tonnage of approximately 1,000 tons. I think that you will agree with me that it would be impossible for anyone in Washington, or even the representatives of any national labor organization, to discuss the many sides of such a problem as well as can the employee representatives and the management of our company.

My experience as a worker and manager has convinced me that Mr. Ernest T. Weir was right when he stated at the hearing last year that—

> The worker today is fully aware of his rights and is giving serious thought and consideration to the improvement of his position, and his relations with his employer, and even were the employer inclined to coerce him, it would not be possible. Let me say further that I believe the employer today is not interested in the coercion of his employees. He wants to be with them on a fair and constructive basis and one that will be of mutual benefit to the employee and to the industry.

Furthermore, I believe that any industry that has had the experience of real "internal" collective bargaining under the employees' representative plan, operated on the honorable basis of full freedom of expression and the sincere consideration of appeals, I am sure has no objections to but rather strongly favors legislation which will provide such a policy as a permanent program for industry in the United States. We have only to refer to the accomplishments of the past, particularly in the iron and steel industry, to substantiate that statement.

However, in this proposed legislation as indicated by the Wagner bill (S. 1958) there are many provisions that will hamper, delay, or even prevent the promotion of understanding; the fostering of fraternity; the development of personal interest among the workers and national recovery.

1. The bill proposes a new national labor relations board, subject to politics that may become unfriendly to continued operations, and will create strife and retard recovery, and would further project the Government into the field of private employment relations.

2. The bill imposes the violation of the "majority rule" which means the representatives of the majority of the employees have the exclusive right to bargain with management. If an individual or a minority group is not satisfied with its wages, hours, or working conditions negotiated by the majority, there is no recourse or appeal except in the case of grievances.

3. The national labor relations board could intervene in the elections of representatives. They could call special elections when their favorites were "out" and then refuse to call elections after they were "in."

4. The bill provides that the majority may negotiate a closed-shop agreement with the employer. If such an agreement were negotiated, all the employees would be forced to join the labor organization of the majority or lose their jobs. In plainer words it legalizes closed-shop arrangements, under which 49 percent of the workers could be thrown into the streets unless they joined a labor organization favored by the 51 percent.

5. The bill discriminates in prohibiting coercion of employees by employers and not by labor organizations or fellow employees.

6. It does not limit the right to strike, nor require a favorable vote of employees before a strike is called, nor provide a notice to the employer and a waiting period before executing a strike.

There is something fundamentally wrong with an industry that requires the intervention of any agency not directly interested in the enterprise itself in order to safeguard the welfare of those who are engaged in its operations.

The workers who contribute their labor to a given business, the individuals who invest their savings in the undertaking, and those who direct its operations and policies, must all receive their return from the earnings of the enterprise. It is to their common interest that those earnings should be maintained at the highest level attainable, in order that participation of each may be a maximum in amount.

There is, then, a partnership of interest among the three essential elements of industry which demands cooperative recognition by each. None may selfishly or unjustly view the position of the others without destroying the opportunity for success of all. None may ignore the true interest of the others without defeating the primary purpose of its own participation in the joint undertaking.

Human instinct is fundamentally selfish, and self-interest has always tempted men in every walk of life to ignore, more or less, their obligations to their fellows when by so doing they seemed to improve their own economic status.

[New York Herald Tribune, Mar. 25, 1935]

A BILL TO CREATE TROUBLE

The Wagner bill might fairly be described as an effort to prolong and make permanent all the worst features of section 7–A of N. I. R. A., without at the same time attempting to meet any of the grave criticisms of that vague and blundering enactment or solve any of the practical problems raised by it. It is fundamentally a political measure, designed to placate the politicians of the American Federation of Labor. It seems inconceivable that an administration or a Congress which cares in the least to see recovery will push it to passage. For a more active creator of trouble—of strikes, lockouts, industrial unrest and business hesitation and fears—it would be difficult to conceive.

The bill can be fairly criticized in many details of careless language and omitted definition. Yet the basic unsoundness of it transcends any possible weakness in specific clauses. That unsoundness consists in the fact that in this extraordinary piece of one-way legislation the effect is to turn control of labor, and thereby of industry, over to the old A. F. of L. unions, with no adequate protection either for minority workers or for the employers.

The bill, in such parts as sections 7 and 8, gives great space to defining the rights of employees. There is not one line of obligation placed upon the employees to obey a contract or respect an arbitration. To the precise contrary, in paragraph (d) of section 12, employees are expressly authorized to defy an arbitration with impunity, if they so desire. Also in section 15 the right to strike under any and all conditions is asserted in the broadest possible terms.

We do not believe that President Roosevelt, after his experience of the last 2 years, really desires to turn over the fortunes of American labor to the tender mercies of the old unions. If the Wagner bill is being seriously considered at the Capitol and has received a measure of support at the White House, the reasons are political and rest upon no solid ground of observation of the past or plan for the future. The bill is in effect simply another friendly gesture toward the A. F. of L., exactly as was section 7–A, and would prolong the doubts and difficulties of that vague and vexed item on the list of N. I. R. A. blunders.

These practical objections are ample to cause the defeat of the bill. In addition, there is the grave question of constitutionality, already raised by the N. R. A. litigation, upon which the Supreme Court has yet to pass. This question the bill attempts to meet by using vague language about "the free flow of commerce." But no attempt has been made to restrict the bill to interstate commerce, let alone define that term with precision. To pass the bill at present would stir endless litigation and work untold hardship and injustice upon countless industries.

By contrast with this un-American and blundering gesture toward the irresponsible labor autocracies stand the highly practical experiments with true labor democracy in the automobile industry. What Mr. Leo Wolman and his associates are there directing may well be writing labor history in America. In any event, there is a true experiment in the field, sincerely conducted by able experts, as contrasted with the purely political gesture of the Wagner bill. If Mr. Roosevelt would simply halt his administration's opposition to the Michigan experiment he would do far more for industrial peace and the cause of labor than he could accomplish by any political bargain struck with the A. F. of L.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the date of that editorial?

toward those in their employ; and the demonstrated success in the nature of the many employees' representation plans now in operation has long removed the matter from the experimental field. The average worker, as an individual, for obvious reasons, possesses a lesser degree of reasoning power than does his employer. Because of this fact he is easily prompted to feelings of suspicion and uncertainty with regard to the motives and acts of those with whom he naturally desires to cooperate. He is likewise peculiarly susceptible to the influence of those whose principal aim in life is the fomenting of discontent.

Management in industry realizes that such a situation imposes upon it the duty of securing the complete confidence of its employees through the exercise of frank and scrupulously honest treatment of every right, legal or moral, which the worker possesses, to the end that he may come to appreciate not only his own obligation to his task, but also the economic influences which may operate either to his advantage or detriment.

The present employees' representation is furnishing a satisfactory disposition of the so-called "labor problem", and we prayerfully urge to not allow the further entrance of the negative influences this Wagner labor-disputes bill would encourage.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman, for this opportunity of appearing before your committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The next witness is Mr. W. C. Sutherland. Will you please come forward, Mr. Sutherland?

STATEMENT OF W. C. SUTHERLAND, VICE PRESIDENT, PITTSBURGH STEEL CO., PITTSBURGH, PA.

The CHAIRMAN. Will you give your full name, please, for the record?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. My full name is W. C. Sutherland.

The CHAIRMAN. What is your residence?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Pittsburgh, Pa.

The CHAIRMAN. What is your official position with the Pittsburgh Steel Co.?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Vice president of the Pittsburgh Steel Co.

The CHAIRMAN. You appear before this committee representing that company?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. How many employees has your company?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. We have 4,000 in one plant and 2,000 in the other.

The CHAIRMAN. Where are your plants located?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The larger one is at Monessen, Pa., and the other one at Allenport, Pa.

The CHAIRMAN. Are the employees in those plants organized?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. They are not organized into trade unions, but they engage in collective bargaining through the employees' plan.

The CHAIRMAN. A plan similar to that described by the last witness?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you have annual elections in which all employees participate?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. They appoint the number of representatives who meet from time to time to discuss problems relating to their employment and meet with a committee which represents the management?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. They do.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you a separate organization at each of your plants?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. How many representatives are there on the committee representing the employees?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. In the larger plant there are 32, and in the smaller plant 19.

The CHAIRMAN. How many representatives are there of the management?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. An equal number in each case.

The CHAIRMAN. Do the representatives of the employees meet separately or do they meet jointly with the representatives of the management?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. They meet once in 2 months with the management's representatives, and on the alternate months they meet by themselves. When they meet with the management representatives in cases pertaining to wages and working conditions the management representatives have no votes, but they are there in an advisory capacity.

The CHAIRMAN. Does your company contribute to or financially aid, either directly or indirectly, the representatives of the employees?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The employees, when they are attending the meetings, are compensated for the time they are there, in an amount to equal to what their hourly earnings are.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the only assistance or aid given by the employers?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Has this plan worked out satisfactorily?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It has; very satisfactorily.

The CHAIRMAN. How long has it been in existence?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Nearly 2 years.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you had any labor troubles?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Not during that time, whatever.

The CHAIRMAN. Was any effort ever made to form trade unions of your employees?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes; there has been.

The CHAIRMAN. With what success?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Very poor success. There are a certain few who are enthusiastically promoting the Amalgamated Association of Iron, Steel, and Tin Workers, but they have a very small following.

The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed with your statement.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. Chairman, members of the committee, and gentlemen, my experience in the steel industry covers a period of 34 years, during which time I have worked in nearly every branch of the industry and have, during most of the time, had direct supervision over large numbers of men.

My first experience was in a mill where all the skilled steel workers were members of a union. It was at this time a local organization which had formerly been connected with a national union but on account of having been dissatisfied with the rulings of the national organization, had severed all affiliations with that institution, and functioned absolutely independently as an organization through which there was a direct contact between employer and employees, and all matters concerning either of these groups were always negotiated through this collective bargaining agency. Harmony always prevailed, which can be attributed to the fact that the negotiations were always between groups with a common interest and no outsiders or noninterested persons ever participated in any way. This arrangement of 34 years ago was at that time, what the present employees' representation plan, in successful operations in the steel plants today is—a successful means for collective bargaining.

My experience has always found a decidedly friendly and cooperative attitude between the men and the management of those engaged in the steel industry, and I am sure that that condition would prevail in all cases today were it not for the fact that disinterested persons have set out to establish the fact that because one person is an employer and another an employee, they must for that reason be enemies and that legislation must be enacted to provide a means of settling disputes which should never arise and would never arise if the third or disinterested party was not legislated into something where his interests were only of a selfish kind.

When the National Industrial Recovery Act was about to become a law the employees at the various plants of the Pittsburgh Steel Co. had nominations and elections by secret ballot to choose representatives from among their group to be their organization and means of contact with the management for the discussion and adjustment of such matters concerning working conditions, wages, and terms of employment as might arise.

The plan followed in this selection of representatives was the employees' representation plan of the Bethlehem Steel Co. which had been in successful operation for about 15 years.

The result of the elections showed that over 80 percent of the employees participated in the voting, which condition was repeated at the end of the first year, with conspicuous interest being shown by the employees in the election of their representatives.

The plan has been in successful operation for nearly 2 years, and during that time the relations between the management and the representatives have been close, friendly, and harmonious, with a clear understanding on all decisions and the reasons for the same.

The management's door has always been and still is open to receive any employees who have anything to say for themselves or their fellow workmen, and they do come in in groups and individually, and are always given a courteous hearing and an honest answer, and reasonable requests where conditions permit are granted or adjusted. Some requests have been made which the management could not in fairness grant, and the refusal in these cases, when thoroughly explained, has always been accepted in the spirit in which the decision was made.

Anything which would tend to interfere with the friendly and cooperative arrangement now in effect at the plants of the Pittsburgh Steel Co. as their means of collective bargaining between employer and employees would be detrimental to the harmony which exists, and for that reason I am opposed to the passage of the revised Wagner bill, S. 1958, the object of which is claimed, is to promote equality of bargaining power between employers and employees, to diminish the cause of labor disputes, to create a National Labor Relations Board, and for other causes, but which I think will lead to more disputes by establishing a bearer between employer and employee, interfere with the progress of industry, and retard recovery.

The revised Wagner bill sponsors majority rule and legalizes the closed shop, which would be grossly unfair to the minority group of employees should the majority group in any steel plant or similar industry elect to have a closed shop, as the minority group would be compelled to either join the union and pay dues or be forced out of employment

The revised Wagner bill is urged by its advocates as a measure to promote industrial peace, but the practical results of its passage would be to set the stage for conflict which would retard national recovery and injure employers and employees, as well as the public.

The bill specifying certain acts to be unfair labor practices shows it is biased in favor of professional labor unions. It is designed only to further the advancement of these organizations and impose the closed shop, as is evidenced by the provision that an employer shall not "interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in section 7." No such restraint is placed upon fellow employees or labor representatives.

The provision of the bill which forbids an employer making contributions toward the operating expenses of the representation plan of his employees is a conspicuous contrast to the absence of restraint upon the amount of dues to be collected by the union-labor organizations or upon the use of these funds.

I am firmly convinced that the foremost desire of labor in the steel industry today is for an opportunity for regular and steady work, and any legislation the influence of which will cause a contrary condition will not be pleasing or beneficial to that large group of people who are most anxious to see the last traces of the industrial depression disappear, and for these reasons I protest against the passage of the revised Wagner bill, S. 1958, as it will be more destructive than constructive in developing and maintaining cooperation and goodwill between employers and employees, which is indeed essential for the welfare of the individual, the people at large, and the prosperity of the Nation.

The CHAIRMAN. How many members of the management of steel-industry employers are in the room? I would like you all to stand up.

(Said representatives at this point arose, as requested.)

The CHAIRMAN. Do you gentlemen all understand that there is nothing in this bill requiring your employees to organize, first of all? And, secondly, there is nothing in this bill that prevents your employees from forming a company union.

Do you understand that, Mr. Sutherland?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Then I take it your objection is largely based upon a belief of fear that this bill indirectly tends to promote and encourage trade-union organizations rather than company-union organizations?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It does.

The CHAIRMAN. And that you would be harassed by efforts to organize trade unions in substitution for company unions?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Ours is not a company union; it is simply a means for them to deal with their employers, but they have no signed membership.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course, there is no objection to that, and I think this committee is disposed to protect in every possible way the existence of such unions or organizations as you have indicated.

I think I can appreciate the fear that you have, or the fear that exists at the present time. There is nothing, without this law at all, to prevent any representatives of any labor organization working among your men to induce them to form a trade union. That is true, is it not?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. But you think enactment of legislation of this kind will tend to encourage that movement?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. We pay no attention to whether a man belongs to a union or not. That does not enter into the conditions of our employment.

The CHAIRMAN. Except for this feeling you have of agitation that may come from existing trade-union organizations, I do not see how there will be any change in relationship you have now with your employees.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The main thing we see is the provision where the proposed labor relations board would be permitted to call an election at any time they might choose, and if the request should be made they could repeatedly call these elections, and do these things over and over.

We find the attitude of the men most pronounced in their desire to have steady work, and many requests have come to us where they say we will drop all of these if we can have steady work.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you think the minority of your employees could exert influence or opposition repeatedly on the Labor Board to hold elections which would be harassing and embarrassing to your organization?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Senator THOMAS. In your informal organization how does anyone of your employees become articulate?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Through their representatives.

Senator THOMAS. How do their representatives express themselves?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. To the management.

Senator THOMAS. How are the representatives chosen?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. By secret ballot.

Senator THOMAS. Under what auspices?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Under the auspices of their own group, handled entirely by employees, and they nominate and elect by secret ballot.

Senator THOMAS. Some one of the employees causes a meeting?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The general chairman of the rules committee.

Senator THOMAS. Within their own organization?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It is their own organization, but there is no membership in the organization, all of the employees being entitled to participate.

Senator THOMAS. It exists all of the time, doesn't it?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Senator THOMAS. In case the chairman wants to meet his organization, which is not an organization in the ordinary sense, what do the employers say about that?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. They give them permission to meet whenever they want to.

Senator THOMAS. There is, then, cooperation between the employer and the employee in the function of the employees' organization?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course, the primary purpose of this proposed legislation is to make it possible for the employees in any industry to meet independent of the management, to hold an election independent of the management, to select representatives independent of the management, and to permit and to force the employers in good faith to sit in and engage in collective bargaining with the representatives of the employees; and I understand you are now doing all of that?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Oh, yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you anything further you wish to add, Mr. Sutherland?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No; Mr. Chairman, that is all I have to say.

The CHAIRMAN. The next witness is Mr. Traer. Will you come forward, Mr. Traer?

STATEMENT OF CHARLES S. TRAER, CHICAGO, ILL., VICE PRESIDENT ACME STEEL CO.

The CHAIRMAN. Will you give your full name for the record, Mr. Traer?

Mr. TRAER. Charles S. Traer.

The CHAIRMAN. You are vice president of the Acme Steel Co. of Chicago, Ill.?

Mr. TRAER. I am.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you here in your official capacity representing that company?

Mr. TRAER. I am.

The CHAIRMAN. How many employees and how many plants have your company?

Mr. TRAER. We have about 1,850 employees in 2 plants.

The CHAIRMAN. Where are they located?

Mr. TRAER. One at Riverdale, just outside of the city limits of Chicago, and the other in the city of Chicago.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you any organization of your employees?

Mr. TRAER. We have at the Riverdale plant an employee representation plan.

The CHAIRMAN. At the other plant there is no organization?

Mr. TRAER. No; there is none.

The CHAIRMAN. There is nothing in this bill to prevent that you know of?

Mr. TRAER. Absolutely.

The CHAIRMAN. How many employees did you say you had in each plant?

Mr. TRAER. We have about 1,500 at Riverdale and about 350 at Archer Avenue.

Mr. TRAER. It is.

The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed, Mr. Traer.

Mr. TRAER. I have had charge of the Riverdale plant since its inception early in 1919. Since that time it has grown from a very small plant employing some 100 men with a capacity of 50,000 tons per year, to its present size of 1,500 men and a capacity of close to half a million tons per year. While we are relatively a very small steel company, we do occupy a more or less important niche in the hot- and cold-rolled strip steel field.

In all these 16 years of growth, the relations between our employees and the management have been extremely harmonious and pleasant. We have worked on the basis of associates in a joint enterprise rather than in the outmoded relation of master and servant. This is evidenced by the fact that after 5 bitter years of depression, some 25 percent of our employees are still stockholders in the Acme Steel Co. We have always prided ourselves on our high wage scale, not only in comparison with other industries in our particular neighborhood, but with the Calumet steel district and the steel industry as a whole.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the average wage scale?

Mr. TRAER. I am just coming to that.

During January and February of this year our hourly paid employees, including common labor, averaged 73 cents per hour, which figure, according to the Steel Code Authority statistics, is well above any district in the country.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the wage scale the same in that plant that is not organized as in the plant that is organized–

Mr. TRAER. It is; where we have equivalent jobs or positions.

This brings me to our general protest against the Wagner labor-disputes bill, which to us seems to be predicated upon the fact that the interests of employee and employer must be antagonistic rather than mutual. I do not think that Judge Nields' conclusion from the evidence in the Weirton case could possibly be improved upon. He stated:

> It is said this relation involves the problem of the economic balance of the power of labor against the power of capital. The theory of a balance of power or of balancing opposing powers is based upon the assumption of an inevitable and necessary diversity of interest. This is the traditional Old World theory. It is not the twentieth century American theory of that relation as dependent upon mutual interest, understanding, and good will.

Experience shows that when collective bargaining is controlled by professional unions there is no possibility of using common sense to arrive at an equilibrium between rate of wages and economic conditions. Regardless of any other factor or condition, organized labor must at all costs maintain maximum rates of pay, and usually a strike is the method of coercion selected to maintain such rates; to the detriment of employee, employer, and the public at large. The perpetuation of organized-labor leaders in office requires that they advocate a maximum wage scale even though they may be convinced themselves that it may be economically unsound. I need only cite the excessive rates demanded by the building-trades unions which are undoubtedly a very vital factor in the lag in the construction industry. What possible good does it do a bricklayer or a carpenter to demand an exceedingly high daily wage when his yearly income, which, after all, is the real thing that counts, is either pitifully small or entirely absent. We have recently had occasion to hire quite a few men, and a large portion of the gang at our gate of a morning have been union building mechanics clamoring to go to work at even our lowest rate of pay.

Our second more or less general objection to the Wagner bill is that to us it seems intent on either destroying or greatly crippling employee-representation plans. Inasmuch as our particular situation is somewhat different from other steel companies who have appeared before this committee, I would like to briefly outline the inauguration of our employee-representation plan and its subsequent complete vindication by the Steel Labor Relations Board. Our plan was not only drawn by the employees themselves, but it was accepted by a healthy majority in an out-and-out "yes" or "no" vote by secret ballot.

The CHAIRMAN. You say the Labor Board has approved your organization?

Mr. TRAER. There was a petition filed to hold the second Government-supervised election that was denied.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you have a petition for a governmental election?

Mr. TRAER. We did not.

The CHAIRMAN. Why was one held?

Mr. TRAER. There was not.

The CHAIRMAN. But the election the men themselves held was approved, and the petition for the second election was disapproved?

Mr. TRAER. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed.

Mr. TRAER. Furthermore, the referendum, in which 97 percent of the eligible voters cast their ballot, was conducted by the employees themselves. Late in September 1933 two organizers from the Pittsburgh headquarters of the A. A. of I. S. and T. W. appeared in our immediate neighborhood and started to hold mass meetings, with the object in view of unionizing our Riverdale plant. By a campaign of misrepresentation and unfulfillable promises they were able to organize a local lodge among a small group of chronic malcontents that can easily be found in any fairly large group of men. With this as a nucleus, they started on a real program of intimidation and coercion, with the idea in mind of forcing our employees to join the union, whether they cared to or not. Our company absolutely ignored this organizing activity; we laid off no men, we took no position whatsoever in the matter, and, so to speak, we let nature take its course.

After several months a very definite sentiment developed in our plant for an employee representation plan among a large number of our employees who thoroughly dislike and distrust organized labor. Many of these employees had been former union men and had had bitter experience with the methods and procedure of professional unionism. Almost every company in the steel industry at that time had employee representation plans in effect, and early in January 1934 it came to my attention that our employees would like to inaugurate a plan in the Riverdale plant. We happened to have an organization in the plant known as the "Goodfellowship Club." This is an organization of our employees for the purpose of aiding the employees in time of sickness, death, or when they are in need of financial assistance. It had been in existence for at least 10 years and is run solely by the employees, for the employees, and the company has nothing whatever to do with the administration of its affairs. While membership is in no way compulsory, it is of interest to note that all but one of our employees were members of the club. Its affairs are governed by a president, vice president, secretary, treasurer, and four additional trustees, who are chosen from among the membership by secret ballot.

I called the officers and trustees of the club together, all of whom were hourly paid men and not foremen, and explained to them that there was apparently considerable sentiment in the plant for collective bargaining; that the men could bargain individually as they had been doing in the past or they could bargain collectively, and they could choose their representatives for such purpose without any restraint, coercion, or interference from the management. I explained that a representation plan had been suggested as a satisfactory vehicle for collective bargaining, but it was believed by the company that if any such plan were drawn up it should be prepared by the employees themselves and put up to the men for a "yes" or "no" vote to accept or reject it.

It being obviously impossible to consult every man in the plant, I told the officers and trustees that the management considered them to be the group most representatives of the entire employee body. The then officers and trustees of the club had been elected the preceding month at an election in which a large majority of the employees had voted. These men had been voted into positions of considerable financial responsibility and trust, and the management assumed that they commanded the confidence and respect of the employee body. I impressed upon them the fact that I was not asking them to accept a plan on behalf of the employees but merely to draw up what they considered a workable plan for submission to the entire body of employees for acceptance or rejection on a secret ballot. Not wishing to have anything to do with the holding of the referendum election on the adoption of the plan, I requested the officers and trustees to serve as election judges and clerks.

To aid in the formulation of a satisfactory plan I supplied them with a number of model plans, some of which were in use in other industries. From the plans so submitted as working models they evolved the plan now in operation. Some of the ideas contained in the model plans were rejected and others, which they felt suitable to their needs, were included, and they further added some ideas of their very own.

When the plan had been finally formulated, it was printed and put in the hands of all employees about a week to 10 days prior to the referendum election so that they would have an opportunity to study it. The referendum on the plan and the nominations for first representatives were held on February 8, 1934. The results of the vote were as follows: 516 yes, 306 no, 11 voided ballots, and 49 blank ballots. The votes were counted and the results certified to the management by the officers and trustees of the club. One week later or on February 15, 1934, the same men acted as election judges and clerks at the election in which the representatives were elected from these nominated on February 8, and again the results were certified to the management. Since that time, to my mind, the plan has functioned admirably in the settlement of such differences as have arisen between the employee body and the company. You will hear the men's viewpoint from certain of our employees who have requested that they be heard by this committee.

Notwithstanding the fairness with which our plan was drawn and adopted, our local A. A. lodge attacked it by filing a petition with the Steel Labor Relations Board to hold a second Government-supervised election, at which our employees would ostensibly be permitted to choose their representatives for collective bargaining. A very full and complete hearing on this petition was held by the Steel Labor Board in Chicago during October and November 1934, and early in January of this year the following decision was handed down:

Upon the foregoing facts, and upon the entire record now before it, the board concludes that it is not in the public interest at this time to hold another election of employees of the Acme Steel Co.'s plant at Riverdale, Chicago, Ill., and such election is not therefore ordered.

I hesitate to take any more of this committee's valuable time, but we have several specific objections to the Wagner bill in addition to the aforesaid general ones. Paragraph 1, section 8, prohibits the employer from interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed in section 7, but no such prohibition is extended to organized labor. If any bill is to be recommended by the committee, this paragraph should certainly be amended so that it will be an unfair practice for anyone to interfere with, restrain, coerce, and so forth. It is a well-known fact that principal interference and coercion is not from employers but from outside organizations, who will use almost any method to obtain members. Whether such methods have the approval and sanction of the labor leaders in Washington is beside the point; I personally know they are used by professional organizers in the field.

Paragraph 3, section 8, seems to us to be a plain attempt to force the closed shop on industry. It is unthinkable that a bare 51 percent of the men in our plant could be permitted to force the other 49 percent to pay tribute to a labor union in order to hold their jobs. The prohibition law should certainly have taught us that it takes far more than a bare majority to support any legislation; in fact, approval must be almost unanimous.

The CHAIRMAN. This bill, as you have indicated, provides that when a majority of the employees through their representatives petition their employer for a closed shop, the employer may sign an agreement that that industry will become a closed-shop industry. Of course, that condition can exist today without this law, and I assume you and the other employers who have appeared before us object to this, largely on the ground that the statement of that right in a law is an inducement to a majority of the employees to force the closed shop by striking in the event the employer refuses.

Mr. TRAER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course, the right exists today just as much as it would under a statutory law, if the employer sees fit to do it.

Mr. TRAER. I understand that.

The CHAIRMAN. I have observed, from those employers who have been before the committee who have organizations similar to yours, that they have no desire to have a closed shop.

Mr. TRAER. We do not.

The CHAIRMAN. Even if your organizaion voted by an overwhelming vote to petition you for a closed shop, requiring that no one would be employed except those who are members of the existing organization, you would refuse?

Mr. TRAER. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. I understand that is the position of the other members of the steel industry who are in the room. So your objection to this provision of this bill is that it is a statement of a right, which would be construed to give justification for a strike in the event the employer refuses to maintain a closed shop?

Mr. TRAER. That is correct, I believe, Mr. Chairman.

Finally, the provision in paragraph C, section 10, that "in any such proceeding the rules of evidence prevailing in courts of law or equity shall not be controlling" seems to be particularly vicious. This can be construed to mean that the Board could act upon hearsay evidence, affidavits, unsubstantiated statements, rumors, gossip, and so forth, and call them evidence on which findings of fact could be made. Such a procedure would violate every concept of fairness and justice.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee thanks you for your statement, Mr. Traer.

Senator MURPHY. If I understand correctly, you did have one election there that was supervised by the Labor Board?

Mr. TRAER. No, sir; there was a petition for an election that was denied.

Senator MURPHY. By whom?

Mr. TRAER. By the Steel Labor Relations Board.

The CHAIRMAN. I understand now there are present in the room groups of employees representing various branches of the steel industry.

The first group I will call forward are those who are employed by the Republic Steel Corporation. Will you gentlemen come forward?

Mr. Mark Murphy is chairman of the Youngstown district; Mr. James Moore is chairman of the general body, Cleveland district; and Mr. E. J. Mulligan is chairman of the general body, Warren district. Will two of you gentlemen be seated here, and the other we will hear at this time?

STATEMENT OF MARK MURPHY, CHAIRMAN GENERAL BODY OF EMPLOYEES, YOUNGSTOWN DISTRICT, REPUBLIC STEEL CORPORATION

The CHAIRMAN. What is your full name?

Mr. MURPHY. Mark Murphy.

The CHAIRMAN. You are employed by whom?

Mr. MURPHY. The Republic Steel Corporation.

The CHAIRMAN. In what plant of the Republic Steel Corporation?
Mr. MURPHY. The Bessemer plant in Youngstown, Ohio.
The CHAIRMAN. What is your occupation in this plant?
Mr. MURPHY. Bloom-mill engineer.
The CHAIRMAN. How many employees are there in this plant?
Mr. MURPHY. In the Youngstown district I would say there were approximately about 6,000 men.
The CHAIRMAN. How many in the particular plant in which you are employed?
Mr. MURPHY. I would say about half of that number.
The CHAIRMAN. That is about 3,000?
Mr. MURPHY. Yes.
The CHAIRMAN. Have you an organization of the employees in that plant?
Mr. MURPHY. Yes, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. Have you any official relationship to that organization?
Mr. MURPHY. I don't think I quite understand you.
The CHAIRMAN. Do you hold any position in that labor organization of the employees?
Mr. MURPHY. I am general chairman of the employees' representative plan.
The CHAIRMAN. You appear now as general chairman of the employees' representation plan in that plant of the Republic Steel Co.?
Mr. MURPHY. Yes, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. How many other representatives are there other than yourself in that plant?
Mr. MURPHY. Thirty in the district.
The CHAIRMAN. Thirty in the whole district?
Mr. MURPHY. Yes, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. And they represent how many different plants?
Mr. MURPHY. Two.
The CHAIRMAN. How far apart are the plants located?
Mr. MURPHY. I would say about a mile and a half.
The CHAIRMAN. So that you have more or less a common interest?
Mr. MURPHY. Yes; sir; we work in common as one body.
The CHAIRMAN. Do the plants produce the same products?
Mr. MURPHY. Practically so.
The CHAIRMAN. Do the employees vote together in both plants, or do they vote separately, the employees of each plant?
Mr. MURPHY. We vote in common.
The CHAIRMAN. When did you have your last election?
Mr. MURPHY. June of last year.
The CHAIRMAN. When did you have one before that?
Mr. MURPHY. June of the preceding year.
The CHAIRMAN. And before that?
Mr. MURPHY. We had none.
The CHAIRMAN. So you have been in existence for 2 years?
Mr. MURPHY. Exactly.
The CHAIRMAN. Have you been chairman both years?
Mr. MURPHY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. When you organized 2 years ago did you adopt a constitution and bylaws?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. How was that brought about?

Mr. MURPHY. A meeting of the men was convened and they named myself temporary chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. This, I suppose, was done aside from a ballot in the very first instance. You did not have a ballot in the first instance, when you met to form the organization, but it was a mass meeting of the employees?

Mr. MURPHY. I would term it such; yes. In that body there were about 58 men, I think, from the district.

The CHAIRMAN. That many came together for this purpose?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. How were you selected?

Mr. MURPHY. I don't know exactly how the selection was made.

The CHAIRMAN. In any event, 58 of you met together and you were made general chairman?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You proceeded then to formulate a constitution and bylaws?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Were those submitted to all of the employees?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The constitution was adopted by them?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. By a secret ballot?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Was there a choice of different forms of constitution, or just this one, where they approved or disapproved it?

Mr. MURPHY. Just the one.

The CHAIRMAN. This constitution provided for an organization of the employees for the purpose of collective bargaining, which, briefly stated, provided for the election in secrecy of a certain number of representatives of the employees to confer from time to time with the employers with reference to matters relating to the relationship between the employees and the employers?

Mr. MURPHY. That is true.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the vote on the adoption of this constitution, if you remember?

Mr. MURPHY. It was 93.2 percent of the entire working force of those combined plants.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know how many participated in that balloting?

Mr. MURPHY. I would say 93.2 percent of 6,000 working force.

The CHAIRMAN. Of the 6,000 employees, 93.2 percent participated in the adoption of a constitution?

Mr. MURPHY. Exactly.

The CHAIRMAN. What part of that percentage voted for the constitution under which you are now operating?

Mr. MURPHY. Just what I am telling you.

The CHAIRMAN. All of the employees voting?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes, sir; exactly.

The CHAIRMAN. Did all of the employees vote?
Mr. MURPHY. 93.2 percent did.
The CHAIRMAN. Were there any against the constitution?
Mr. MURPHY. No; it was unanimous.
The CHAIRMAN. So 93.2 percent of all of the employees voted for this plan to organize for the purpose of collective bargaining?
Mr. MURPHY. That is true.
The CHAIRMAN. Then later you selected these 30 representatives?
Mr. MURPHY. Originally there were 18.
The CHAIRMAN. Originally you had an election of those 18 representatives to represent the employees in collective bargaining with the employers?
Mr. MURPHY. That is true.
The CHAIRMAN. Was that election a secret election?
Mr. MURPHY. By secret ballot; yes, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. How many participated in that election?
Mr. MURPHY. 93.2 percent of the entire workmen.
The CHAIRMAN. The same number that decided to adopt a constitution?
Mr. MURPHY. That is true.
The CHAIRMAN. Now, how many candidates were there for the purpose of choosing these 18 representatives?
Mr. MURPHY. I believe in one unit down there, there were about 400 candidates. I think every man in the mill was a candidate.
The CHAIRMAN. That sounds like the Democratic Party.
Mr. MURPHY. If that is not democratic enough, I don't know what would be.
The CHAIRMAN. Did they vote in each unit, so that each unit would have a representative?
Mr. MURPHY. They voted this way, so that there would be 1 representative for 200 employees; and then in the units where there were 1,800 to 2,000 men, they, of course, had that many employees representing them.
The CHAIRMAN. The result of the balloting was that 18 men were chosen at the first election?
Mr. MURPHY. That is true.
The CHAIRMAN. And it was considerably divided?
Mr. MURPHY. If 400 men in candidacy in one outfit were voted for, it naturally was very much divided.
The CHAIRMAN. Those men then became the representatives of your body of employees?
Mr. MURPHY. That is true.
The CHAIRMAN. You continued in office for 1 year?
Mr. MURPHY. Yes, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. At the end of that year you had another year?
Mr. MURPHY. That is true.
The CHAIRMAN. Did you increase the number of representatives at the second election?
Mr. MURPHY. Due to the fact the Democratic Party had put more men to work, we naturally had more working force and consequently more representatives.
The CHAIRMAN. So there are some advocates of the "new deal" up there?
Mr. MURPHY. That is true.

The CHAIRMAN. How many representatives did you include in the second election?

Mr. MURPHY. Thirty-one.

The CHAIRMAN. You, of course, had many candidates, as you did in the previous election?

Mr. MURPHY. I don't think we had quite 400 in that outfit, but we did have numerous candidates.

The CHAIRMAN. And after a secret ballot was taken, 31 of the men were chosen?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. How many of the men participated in this second election?

Mr. MURPHY. 98.2 percent.

The CHAIRMAN. Of all of the employees?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Was there any influence, pressure, or interference of any kind exerted by the employers in either of these elections in the choosing of the representatives?

Mr. MURPHY. No, Senator; there was not. The employers had absolutely nothing to do with it, other than convening the first gathering, where they explained to us their desire was to put into effect a representative plan.

Prior to that time we did not have any form of representation, though it is true that there were a number of Amalgamated Iron and Steel Workers employed in the district.

We have no quarrel with the outside organizations; and as a matter of fact, a number of the fellows that are representatives carry cards, and I feel sure they are regarded very highly in outside labor organizations.

It is also true that the president of the Amalgamated Lodge is a member of our representative body, and he was appointed by myself on no. 2 body that is charged with wage disputes, working conditions, and so forth.

The CHAIRMAN. He was elected one of the representatives?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes, sir; he was.

The CHAIRMAN. And he is on a subcommittee of your representatives?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you chairman of the representative body?

Mr. MURPHY. Of the Youngstown district; yes.

The CHAIRMAN. How often do you meet?

Mr. MURPHY. We meet every month.

The CHAIRMAN. What do you discuss at these meetings?

Mr. MURPHY. Well, plenty.

The CHAIRMAN. All of the disputes, grievances, and differences of anyone that arise in the carrying on of the work of the steel plant are discussed?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. How often do you meet with representatives of the employers?

Mr. MURPHY. We meet together as a body of employees this month, and the following month we meet in joint session with representatives of the management.

The CHAIRMAN. How has this method of settling disputes and differences over conditions of work and wages operated?

Mr. MURPHY. It has been very good.

The CHAIRMAN. Are the men satisfied with it?

Mr. MURPHY. That would be a difficult thing to say. I would say that the majority of the men today are satisfied with it, and when I say they are satisfied I do not mean to imply that the entire plant is, but I would say at least 98 percent of the men in there are well satisfied with it.

The CHAIRMAN. Has any attempt been made to form a local branch of any national labor union?

Mr. MURPHY. I mentioned the fact that we have a gentleman who is at present a member of one of the unions on our board.

The CHAIRMAN. So there is coexistent with this organization many employees members of a branch of a national labor organization?

Mr. MURPHY. That is true.

The CHAIRMAN. And that is called what?

Mr. MURPHY. The Amalgamated Association.

The CHAIRMAN. How many members belong to that?

Mr. MURPHY. That I couldn't say, but I can say they are only organized in one small mill, a 10-inch mill.

The CHAIRMAN. That is a small group of all of the employees who have a separate organization connected with the Amalgated Union?

Mr. MURPHY. That is true; but in addition to that there is this other outfit I speak of in the lower plant, I do not know what its name is, but I do not believe they have very many members.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you care to make any further statement?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes, Mr. Chairman, I have a written statement I would like to have submitted.

Senator WAGNER. Mr. Chairman, before going further with that, may I ask a few questions?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly.

Senator WAGNER. How long have you meen working in this particular plant?

Mr. MURPHY. Twenty-eight years.

Senator WAGNER. Was there any organization or any union of any character there until 2 years ago?

Mr. MURPHY. Formerly there was. When I speak of the Youngstown district, that district formerly was an iron district; that is, they produced puddled iron, and the mills then were comprised of puddling mills.

Senator Davis brought out at the session last year that these puddling mills and finishing mills were concerned only with iron products, and when the steel mills came in we never had any organization in the steel mills, and I believe that is true throughout the entire country.

Senator WAGNER. At least, there was no so-called "representative plan" or "company union?"

Mr. MURPHY. Absolutely none.

Senator WAGNER. Until the National Recovery Act was passed?

Mr. MURPHY. That is true.

Senator WAGNER. Until 7 (a) became a part of the National Recovery Act?

Mr. MURPHY. That is true.

Senator WAGNER. Then you proceeded to organize a union within the shop?

Mr. MURPHY. I would not call it a union.

Senator WAGNER. A representation plan?

Mr. MURPHY. A representation plan; yes, sir.

Senator WAGNER. That began by submitting to the workers a constitution; is that right?

Mr. MURPHY. That is right.

Senator WAGNER. Who drafted that constitution?

Mr. MURPHY. I think probably—when I say I think, I mean I later learned, I believe—this plan had been in vogue in different plants, like the Bethlehem Steel and the Youngstown Sheet & Tube, the Colorado Iron & Fuel.

Senator WAGNER. What I mean, it was a plan drafted by the employer and not by the workers?

Mr. MURPHY. That is it exactly.

Senator WAGNER. Have you a copy of the constitution here?

Mr. MURPHY. I am sorry to say I do not have a copy.

The CHAIRMAN. The other gentleman has furnished a copy of the constitution.

Mr. MURPHY. May I say this to you——

Senator WAGNER. May I ask a few questions first?

Mr. MURPHY. Certainly.

Senator WAGNER. Does this constitution limit those that may represent the workers in efforts of collective bargaining, to employees of the particular plant, under this constitution?

Mr. MURPHY. Not as that constitution reads. In other words, any man could be elected in that plant, but it so happens each of the men in the plant is capable of effecting their own bargaining, and they do not go outside.

Senator WAGNER. All of those who are members of the committee are employees of the plant?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes, sir.

Senator WAGNER. Under this constitution could you have a ballot drawn by which the workers would be permitted to vote for an outside organization to represent them?

Mr. MURPHY. Let me understand that. Under this constitution would it be possible——

Senator WAGNER (interrupting). In balloting, for instance, for representative, could the workers in that plant vote for an outside union to represent them?

Mr. MURPHY. I would say yes. That is my personal opinion.

The CHAIRMAN. That is, if a substantial number of employees petitioned your group known as the "representatives", for a ballot to decide whether or not you would abandon this present system and set up a trade union, would it be possible for such a ballot to be taken?

Mr. MURPHY. You mean to change the name of the organization?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; and the form of it.

Mr. MURPHY. I think if a substantial number did that, it would be their prerogative, and I may say I think that should be their prerogative. I have no ax to grind against organized labor, and I think if they wanted to be represented outside, the company will meet them outside.

Senator WAGNER. I have the constitution here, and I will read it to see if that can be done.

The constitution provides:

> Any employee who has been on the company's pay rolls for a period of at least 1 year immediately prior to the nomination; who is 21 years of age or over, and who is an American citizen, shall be considered qualified for nomination and election as an employee representative.

That seems to exclude anybody as an employee representative unless he has been at least on the company's pay roll for 1 year prior to nomination.

Mr. MURPHY. I grant that, but you asked me if they could elect an outside representative.

Senator WAGNER. Does that not limit it?

Mr. MURPHY. They cannot elect them under that plan, the very name of it answers that.

Senator WAGNER. That is what I am saying, under your plan at the present time no one can be elected as a representative except one who is elected under the plan.

Mr. MURPHY. Certainly, that is correct.

Senator WAGNER. That is what I asked, Mr. Chairman, that under this constitution they could not vote for an outside union to represent them.

The CHAIRMAN. I do not think that, but I do think if the majority of the employees wanted to form a trade union, they could force the representatives to hold an election for that purpose.

Mr. MURPHY. Yes; I think that is so.

The CHAIRMAN. In other words, when a majority of the employees would see fit in an election to choose men who are union men, a majority of them could do so.

Mr. MURPHY. That is true. I think I might answer that question in this way: I have heard our district manager make this statement, that he was prepared to meet anybody, regardless of what outside national organization they represented, but he wanted to meet his employees, and that question, as far as I am concerned, as an employee, I don't think should be asked of an employee to answer company matters that pertain to company policies. I am not speaking anything with regard to the company.

Senator WAGNER. I am guided entirely by your constitution. As the constitution is now written, you are limited in your elections to elect only a person qualified as I enumerated a moment ago.

Mr. MURPHY. That is true as an employee representative.

The CHAIRMAN. Some of those employee members are members of a union?

Mr. MURPHY. That is true.

The CHAIRMAN. And they have been elected as a representative of the employees?

Mr. MURPHY. That is true.

The CHAIRMAN. If a time came when you elected a majority of your board of 31 from among union men, they could proceed to unionize your plant if they are capable of doing it?

Mr. MURPHY. Absolutely. And I would say if they had a majority in this national labor outfit representing a majority of the plant of workers, there would be no question about it.

Senator WAGNER. If I may ask, Mr. Murphy, how does this legislation interfere in any way with what you say? Do you oppose the prohibition of any of the unfair labor practices that are enumerated in this proposed bill?

Mr. MURPHY. The only part I am objecting to is the part that might render ineffective the representation plan.

Senator WAGNER. In what way?

Mr. MURPHY. I feel that the interests of the employer and the employee are mutual to a certain extent, and I think the service performed by this body of representatives is a mutual benefit to both the men and the employer, and for that reason I believe the company should be permitted to compensate those men on the ratio of their hourly rate of pay.

As I read the bill, it would render that impossible, and consequently it would render our representation plan ineffective.

Senator WAGNER. The only objection you have to this proposed legislation is that it does not permit the management or the employer to pay the rates of the workers' pay while they are representing the workers. Is that the objection you have?

Mr. MURPHY. Well, I put it this way; I feel any laborer is worthy of his hire. Don't you?

Senator WAGNER. Yes.

Mr. MURPHY. And I think those representatives that are performing this collective bargaining for their fellow workmen should be paid.

Due to the fact there is no outside organization, and they do not receive the money that the outside worker does receive, the only place he can receive it is from the company, and it is a very limited amount.

The wording of this proposed labor bill would render that part of it ineffective. For that reason I am opposed to that particular part of this bill.

Senator WAGNER. Of course, the bill, even as it is, under the rules of the Board, permits the allowance for time actually spent by the representatives in the work of their union, either in the inside union or representative plan, or the outside union. Do you hold there should be compensation beyond that?

Mr. MURPHY. No, sir.

Senator WAGNER. The bill permits that payment to be made now, as I understand it.

Mr. MURPHY. I do not so understand it.

The CHAIRMAN. I understand, Senator Wagner, the reason for these employees coming here—perhaps I got it from their communication, or from their employers—is for the purpose of showing that there exists in the steel plants some kind of organization which is working satisfactorily with the employees and the employers, and they do not want any law passed which will interfere with those organizations.

Your real purpose is to see that we do not interfere with the kind of organization you have, and you really say, let us alone and let us work out our own problems through this form of organization you have?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes; that is correct, and we do not think this bill will permit us to do that.

The CHAIRMAN. I think you are wrong in the way you think about it.

Senator WAGNER. I recognize the fact that we have to make concessions, even of our views, but I never could myself understand how one could effectively represent workers in his activities if he is paid by the very person from whom he expects to get the best terms possible for his fellows. To me it always looked like the plaintiff lawyer paying the attorney fees for the defendant, and that is a general view. That is the reason I have been a little apprehensive about that provision.

However, let me ask you another thing, Mr. Murphy; you are paid for the services you perform on behalf of the workers?

Mr. MURPHY. That is true.

Senator WAGNER. You are paid by the employer with whom you negotiate for the workers?

Mr. MURPHY. That is true.

Senator WAGNER. You have a written agreement now setting forth the wages, the maximum hours of employment, and other conditions of employment, have you not, between the employer and the employees?

Mr. MURPHY. I have no general agreement that would cover the entire worker, but I do have special written agreements that cover practically all of the important jobs of the plant.

The CHAIRMAN. Previous witnesses have testified they keep minutes, and in the minutes of the proceedings there are statements of what have been agreed to and what they understand to be the policy of the employee and employer in these disputes, but there is no written contract.

Senator WAGNER. That is what I had in mind—a collective-bargaining agreement, such as are usually made by outside representatives of the workers.

Mr. MURPHY. We do not have that in the sense you say, but we do have an agreement signed by the men and by the management that covers the tonnage workers of the plant and that covers the important workers in the plant.

Senator WAGNER. Now, as to the meaning of this constitution which has this limitation in it to which I have referred, it also provides it may be amended at any time by a two-thirds vote of the entire membership of the joint committee on rules, ways, and means. That is not a two-thirds vote of the workers, but by a concurrent vote of the majority of the representatives of the general body of workers, and in addition, also, of the representative of the management.

In other words, here is a constitution to guide the activities of a union, organized to better their working conditions, whose constitution, originally drafted by the employer with certain specific limitations cannot be amended so as to remove those limitations without the consent of the employers.

I am giving this for the information of the committee.

Mr. MURPHY. I might say, for the information of this committee, this is practically a new plan to me, and it was put into effect, as I stated, 2 years ago. At the end of the first year I asked for four amendments, and to me they were vital amendments. They set up the specific time in regard to how long it would take the management to reply to any question pertaining to wages or working conditions, and they made all such applications for wage adjustments retroactive to the time the petition was filed with the company, and also an amendment that the plan could only be terminated by a three-fourths majority; and they gave me every amendment I asked for.

Senator WAGNER. Do not understand me to question in the slightest your sincerity; you are doing your best for the workers; but I am talking about the handicaps you are under.

So far as this bill is concerned, I think all it attempts to do is to make the American worker a free man to do as he chooses—to have your plan or some other plan or to have no plan.

As I understand it, the only objection you have to the plan is that it may prohibit the employer from paying the representatives of the workers during their activities in behalf of the workers.

Is that right?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes; and I may say, my instructions from the general body was, they did not ask me to do anything nor did the company ask me to do or say anything about organized labor on this particular bill; and the only statement I wanted to make was, we wanted our plan to continue and we do not want anything done to destroy its effectiveness.

The CHAIRMAN. There is not anything in this bill objectionable to this man.

Sentor WAGNER. Absolutely nothing, so long as it is the free will of the worker. I would not myself belong to an organization in which the constitution under which I am guided as a worker cannot be amended unless my employer says so. I think that is against the whole idea of the economic freedom of the worker, but that is your matter, and not mine, and if the workers want that, they have the right to have it. All I want is to have them economically free, as well as politically free.

Senator MURPHY. Has your organization the right to review the action of the management in dismissing an employee?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes; to a certain extent.

Senator MURPHY. If an employee be dismissed for insufficient reasons, he is enabled to make contact with his representative, and the representative would take that before the proper committee. I might say the ratio of those cases amount to about 83 percent of all cases brought before the joint committees, have been determined in favor of the men.

Senator MURPHY. How many men would sit in a council that would pass on that question?

Mr. MURPHY. Five men representing the employees and five men representing the management.

The CHAIRMAN. So that you have had many cases where employees have been discharged, and the employees felt that the discharge was unfair, and they have brought it to the attention of the representatives and the representatives have fought it out with the management. and in 83 percent of the cases the employees have been restored to work?

Mr. MURPHY. We do not have any men discharged, believe it or not. As a matter of fact, I do not know since I have been engaged in this representation plan of one man we have had any labor trouble with. As a matter of fact, I have been employed practically all of my working years in this plant, and I never knew of any labor trouble in the plant. That goes back more years than I care to think of.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the nature of these complaints you have adjusted?

Mr. MURPHY. They cover practically everything. Taking the cosmopolitan groups that are employed in the plants, you can imagine what they would do. It covers everything in regard to the distribution of time due to the fact that their work today is not going 100-percent capacity, and our operations are limited, so that the distribution of time is a very important thing, and they want a fair ratio of the time the plant is operating.

The CHAIRMAN. All of those questions are decided by your board?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, about your payments, I do not know whether Senator Wagner understood just what you meant by what you were paid by the employer, and I am wondering if your constitution is the same as testified by other witnesses. Just what are you paid by your employers as a representative of the employees?

Mr. MURPHY. I am paid exactly what I would make as a bloomwell engineer, and that only.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not interferred with in this bill.

Senator WAGNER. That payment is for the time you use off of your job. You are paid for that time and nothing else?

Mr. MURPHY. That is correct; nothing else.

The CHAIRMAN. You are extended no other favors or privileges by the management?

Mr. MURPHY. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Are any of the others?

Mr. MURPHY. Not that I know of; no, sir.

Senator WAGNER. Did you have a meeting of the workers before you came here?

Mr. MURPHY. Absolutely, and I asked for it.

Senator WAGNER. Of all of them?

Mr. MURPHY. All of them.

Senator WAGNER. I got a letter from somebody denying that there was any meeting of the workers themselves, and that is why I am inquiring.

Mr. MURPHY. In the Youngstown district—of the workers, is that what you mean?

Senator WAGNER. Yes.

Mr. MURPHY. That would be just as logical as to say for the Congress to ask to have a meeting of the men who elected them. We could not have a meeting every time like—every time anything like this came up.

Senator WAGNER. I wanted the committee to know you are representing the council and not the entire employees.

The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed with your statement now, Mr. Murphy.

Mr. MURPHY. My name is Martin Murphy; my place of residence is no. 396 Warren Avenue, Youngstown, Mahoning County, Ohio.

I am employed by the Republic Steel Corporation in said city in the capacity of a blooming mill engineer and I have been in their service for a period of 28 years.

In June 1933 an employee plan of representation for the purpose of collective bargaining was inaugurated and an election held, at which time 93.2 percent of the approximate force of 6,000 employees cast their ballots in approval of such a plan. There were 18 representatives elected in the district and I was chosen as general chairman of the representative body.

In June 1934 the second election was held and at that time 98.2 percent of said body of employees cast their ballots, resulting in the election of 31 representatives. I was again chosen as the general chairman of the representative body for the years 1934 and 1935.

From the time of the inauguration of the plan in 1933 to March 1, 1935, these representatives, through their individual action or collectively, have acted upon 495 cases, of which 83 percent were decided in favor of the employees. These cases covered a large scope and embraced matters of safety, sanitation, hours of service, wage adjustments, distribution of available working time, comfort stations, employee gardens, welfare projects, employee transportation, parking of automobiles, and so forth.

We hold the employee plan of representation as here conducted to be a good and sufficient means of collective bargaining.

As chairman of the general body of employee representatives representing 6,000 workers in Youngstown, Ohio, I am opposed to any legislation which would interfere with our present satisfactory method of collective bargaining under the employee representation plan.

Senator WAGNER. Just one more question, since you are familiar with the procedure. Where are these elections held?

Mr. MURPHY. The Youngstown district covers quite an area, and we have elections in the whole area.

Senator WAGNER. I mean are they held right in the plant?

Mr. MURPHY. Surely.

Senator WAGNER. And as each man votes he is checked off; is he not?

Mr. MURPHY. No; they are not; I stopped that.

Senator WAGNER. That is one improvement; but originally in your first election, each man was checked off as he voted. Is that right?

Mr. MURPHY. No, sir; the first election I stopped that. The only possible way that a man could be identified was by a number on that ballot, and all of those numbers were carefully removed before any ballot was cast.

Senator WAGNER. There was a method of identification?

Mr. MURPHY. Absolutely none.

Senator WAGNER. When he voted, what did you do?

Mr. MURPHY. They had a poll book just the same as you would have in any election.

Senator WAGNER. It is a pay-roll book, is it not?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes; of the men in that particular district.

Senator WAGNER. And as each man would vote was that not checked off?

Mr. MURPHY. Surely.

Senator WAGNER. So that the employer knew exactly who voted?

Mr. MURPHY. He knew who voted, yes; otherwise we would have men voting a dozen times, and we had to make some kind of a check, but there was no identification of that check. When that employee came for his ballot, when his name was called off, he was given his ballot; but that ballot was a blank ballot, and there were no identification marks on it whatsoever.

Senator MURPHY. What were these numbers on there originally?

Mr. MURPHY. It was for the convenience of both the workers and the employers. They were originally numbered and somebody told me about it, and I told them to cut them off.

Senator MURPHY. It would have been possible to identify them by that number?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes; but I really think there was not any thought of that nature entered into it.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you any further statements, Mr. Murphy?

Mr. MURPHY. No; thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. We will next have Mr. Moore.

STATEMENT OF JAMES MOORE, CHAIRMAN OF THE GENERAL BODY, CLEVELAND DISTRICT, REPUBLIC STEEL CORPORATION

The CHAIRMAN. Will you give your full name, Mr. Moore?

Mr. MOORE. James Moore.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you employed in the same plant as the other gentleman?

Mr. MOORE. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What is your occupation?

Mr. MOORE. Bricklayer.

The CHAIRMAN. Who is your employer?

Mr. MOORE. The Republic Steel Corporation.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you a member of the representation council of workers in that plant?

Mr. MOORE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you chairman of that council?

Mr. MOORE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. How long have you been chairman?

Mr. MOORE. This is the second year.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the general plan of your organization similar to that testified by the last witness?

Mr. MOORE. It is.

The CHAIRMAN. How many elections have you had?

Mr. MOORE. Two.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you a statement you desire to make to the committee?

Mr. MOORE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed with your statement.

Mr. MOORE. I respectfully request that the following statement, made by me voluntarily, be filed with your committee and entered upon the record of this hearing relative to the Wagner national labor relations bill no. S. 1958.

My name is James Moore. I am employed as a bricklayer at the Upson nut division of the Republic Steel Corporation, Cleveland, Ohio. I have been employed by this for the past 12 years. I reside at no. 9823 Simmer Street, Cleveland, Ohio.

I am chairman of the general committee of employee representatives of the Upson nut division and I am here by the unanimous approval of that committee. This committee represents the employees of the company which, by the way, totals 1,143 persons in matters of collective bargaining.

The employee representation plan was started in June 1933. I was elected to represent the department in which I work by the employees of that department. The general body of representatives elected me general chairman of the group. At the time of the hearings on the Wagner bill last year I appeared before this committee. Since that time I have been again elected to represent the employees of the department in which I work and was also chosen general chairman of the employee committee. I am appearing before this committee for the second time and now with practically 2 years' experience of collective bargaining under the employee representation plan.

The committee has handled 59 cases during the period from June 1934 to February 28, 1935. Of these, 49 were settled in favor of the men. Since the plan has been in force the employee committee has handled 117 cases. Of this number 107 were adjudicated in favor of the employees.

The members of the general body of employee representatives were elected by 96.1 percent of the total number of employees in 1933 and 97.2 percent in 1934, and I believe that the general body expresses the opinion of their constituents when they say that the employee representation plan, as functioning in our plant, is an effective means of collective bargaining.

As I said last year, we at all times have access to the management's office and this has done much to get a better understanding between employee and employer.

If I may, permit me to repeat my comment when appearing before this committee 1 year ago:

> I have obtained more good for myself and the people whom I represent in the short time the shop representation has been in effect, than from any labor union, and understand, I was a member of the Bricklayers' Union for many years. I am opposed to any legislation which will injure this representation plan.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there any questions you would like to ask, Senator Wagner?

Senator WAGNER. Yes; there are. Who suggested 2 years ago that you organize this representation plan, Mr. Moore?

Mr. MOORE. The company.

Senator WAGNER. And the company drafted your constitution?

Mr. MOORE. Yes, sir.

Senator WAGNER. Have you paid your own expenses down here?

Mr. MOORE. No, sir; I have not.

Senator WAGNER. Who is going to pay them?

Mr. MOORE. I think myself, the company should pay them. I have paid them so far myself.

Senator WAGNER. Do you expect the company to pay them?

Mr. MOORE. To reimburse me; yes.

Senator WAGNER. Is that so of the other representatives, do you know?

Mr. MOORE. I think so, but they can answer for themselves.

Senator WAGNER. You are also paid for your services by the company as representative of the workers?

Mr. MOORE. Yes, sir.

Senator WAGNER. I do not think I want to ask anything further, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The next witness is Mr. Mulligan.

Please come forward Mr. Mulligan.

STATEMENT OF EDWARD J. MULLIGAN, CHAIRMAN GENERAL BODY, WARREN DISTRICT, REPUBLIC STEEL CORPORATION

The CHAIRMAN. Will you please give your full name for the record, Mr. Mulligan?

Mr. MULLIGAN. Edward J. Mulligan.

The CHAIRMAN. You are employed as an electrician?

Mr. MULLIGAN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. With what company?

Mr. MULLIGAN. The Republic Steel Co.

The CHAIRMAN. In what district?

Mr. MULLIGAN. The Warren (Ohio) district.

The CHAIRMAN. What is your plant known as?

Mr. MULLIGAN. It is the Warren plant of the Republic Steel Co.

The CHAIRMAN. You are chairman of the representatives, representing the employees in that plant?

Mr. MULLIGAN. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. How many employees do they have?

Mr. MULLIGAN. Around 6,000.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the plan of your organization similar to that testified by the previous witnesses?

Mr. MULLIGAN. It is.

The CHAIRMAN. You have a statement you desire to present to the committee?

Mr. MULLIGAN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed with that statement.

Mr. MULLIGAN. I am Edward J. Mulligan, general chairman of the employees' representation plan of Warren district, Republic Steel Corporation. I have been properly authorized by this representative body to appear before the Senate Committee on Education and Labor in the interest of our employees' representation plan.

At our last annual election of employee representatives in June 1934, there were 6,059 employees on the pay roll of Republic Steel Corporation, Warren district. Of this number, 78 percent voted for representatives under this plan. I want to convey to you our opinion of the usefulness and the value of the employees' representation plan to the employees in our district.

Considering the fact that our plan has been functioning less than 2 years, we believe our accomplishments in industrial relations are outstanding. As proof of this, we offer the following data taken from our records:

During the past 21 months, 303 items covering employment, working conditions, wages, safety, health, sanitation, athletics, and so forth, were disposed of in committee as follows:

Two hundred and fifteen settled in the affirmative.

Forty-one settled in the negative.

Twenty-two withdrawn by employees.

Fourteen compromised.

Eleven pending.

The figure of 303 items does not include a vast number of departmental problems handled directly by the representatives with the superintendents concerned, of which we have no written record but can safely say will run into several hundred.

In the disposition of matters through our plan, we adhere to the following procedure:

Any matter which, in the opinion of any employee or group of employees, requires adjustment, and which such employee or group of employees has been unable to adjust, either directly with the foreman or through his or their representatives, may be taken up by such employee or group of employees, either in person or through any representative by his or their department in writing: First, with the superintendent concerned; second, with the management's representative; third, with the management, who shall endeavor to effect a settlement, or who may, with the approval of all the parties, refer the matter to proper joint committee. If the joint appeals committee shall fail to effect a settlement, the president of the company shall be notified, and the matter may be referred if the president and a majority of the employee representatives on the joint appeals committee agree to such reference to an arbitrator or arbitrators, to be determined at the time according to the nature of the controversy.

I have observed, as general chairman, that the employees have little or no hesitancy in bringing before the management such matters as concern their general welfare, and that the plan has been the means of developing a closer relationship between the employees and the management than has ever existed in our plant. It has also given the employees a much better understanding of the management's problems as regards plant operations, and I believe it furnishes the management a means of getting a better insight into the worker's viewpoint.

I am convinced that our employees' representation plan furnishes the best method of collective bargaining today; however, I believe time and experience will show many improvements. In large corporations, such as ours, difficulties and delays sometime occur. When bargining with local managers it is found that authority is limited to minor items. Subjects of major importance must necessarily be referred to higher officials; consequently delays are likely to ensue. This sometimes tends to create doubts in the minds of employees as to the feasibility of the plan, or the sincerity of those involved in the adjustment of the subject under discussion.

Our interpretation of the proposed legislation, Senate Bill No. 1958, is that in the event of its adoption our representation plan would become ineffective as an agency for collective bargaining, although we represent a substantial majority of the employees. We ask you to give serious consideration to these facts.

Senator WAGNER. What in this bill will destroy your representation plan?

Mr. MULLIGAN. Senator Wagner, as I understand this proposed bill, it is a majority rule. For instance, if your bill was adopted it would necessarily mean that one would be practically forced to join an organized outside representation plan.

Senator WAGNER. Where is that in the bill?

Mr. MULLIGAN. I did not quite understand.

Senator WAGNER. What provision of the bill does that?

Mr. MULLIGAN. The majority rule.

Senator WAGNER. You have the majority rule in your plant now, have you not?

Mr. MULLIGAN. We have, but by the adoption of this bill the representation plan would become ineffective to the extent that the amalgamated association, or some other outside association would be recognized as the outstanding organization, and necessarily so, and a 10 percent membership in the outside organization would mean it would be a minority ruling the majority, rather than the majority ruling the minority.

Senator WAGNER. I see you have a clear misconception of the bill. As to the minority ruling the majority, as long as they can elect you, you are the representative?

Mr. MULLIGAN. That is right.

Senator WAGNER. That is a majority rule and it cannot be changed unless the constitution is changed, and the majority of the workers vote for some other representation.

Mr. MULLIGAN. That is correct.

Senator WAGNER. That is not changed by this legislation. I was sure you had a misconception of it.

Mr. MULLIGAN. You understand we have both the amalgamated representation plan functioning in our plant and the employee representation plan, right now.

Senator WAGNER. This does not disturb that. We were talking about the majority rule, and I am trying to find out what is your real opposition to the legislation. Let me ask one or two questions. Are your expenses here being paid by the company?

Mr. MULLIGAN. I hope so.

Senator WAGNER. I mean, do you expect them to pay your expenses?

Mr. MULLIGAN. I do.

Senator WAGNER. Are you paid by the company during the time you represent the workers?

Mr. MULLIGAN. Yes, sir.

Senator WAGNER. This organization in your shop was only started 2 years ago?

Mr. MULLIGAN. Two years ago; yes.

Senator WAGNER. That was after 7–A and the National Recovery Act became effective?

Mr. MULLIGAN. That is right.

Senator WAGNER. Up to that time you had no means of bargaining?

Mr. MULLIGAN. No definite means; no.

Senator WAGNER. Did your management suggest the organization of this union?

Mr. MULLIGAN. The plan was, or the constitution was, submitted for the approval of a certain group of men who were selected for various reasons, possibly because they had been longer in the service, or for being outstanding for some reason or other, and they voted as to whether to accept it.

Senator WAGNER. Where did the constitution come from, do you know?

Mr. MULLIGAN. I could not say definitely.

Senator WAGNER. It did not come from the workers?

Mr. MULLIGAN. No, sir.

Senator WAGNER. Then it came from the management, did it not?

Mr. MULLIGAN. It did, but I do not know what source.

Senator WAGNER. You are familiar with the constitution; does that limit the representatives to those who actually work in the shop?

Mr. MULLIGAN. Yes.

Senator WAGNER. So that under your system, no outside person or union could be elected to represent the workers?

Mr. MULLIGAN. We have never had any request for it.

Senator WAGNER. I am not complaining, I am just talking about the constitution. It also provides that the constitution cannot be amended without the consent of the management?

Mr. MULLIGAN. That is correct.

Senator MURPHY. I thought I sensed an apprehension on your part that if this bill should be passed, 51 percent of the employees would vote to join a national union. Is that correct?

Mr. MULLIGAN. No, sir.

Senator MURPHY. You are not apprehensive of that?

Mr. MULLIGAN. No, sir.

Senator WAGNER. As a matter of fact, under the constitution which the management has drafted for you, such an election cannot be held until your constitution is amended, and that cannot be amended without the consent of the management?

Mr. MULLIGAN. I would like to make this point clear. We do have the amalgamated association representation there, and if they do not care to vote under this employees' representation plan, they would simply join the amalgamated association. Both organizations have collective bargaining with the management.

Senator WAGNER. As long as you control the majority you are in control of negotiations with the management, which is a majority rule.

Mr. MULLIGAN. That is right but the management recognizes the other organization as well. They function separately from our organization.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there anything further, Mr. Mulligan?

Mr. MULLIGAN. No, thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. If the representatives of employees of the Bethlehem Steel Co. are in the room, will they please come forward?

STATEMENT OF ALBERT CREW, REPRESENTATIVE OF THE EMPLOYEES OF THE BETHLEHEM STEEL CO. PLAN OF EMPLOYEES' REPRESENTATION AT MARYLAND PLANT OF BETHLEHEM STEEL CO., SPARROWS POINT, MD.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Crew, yourself and Walter Franz, W. J. Wolf, Russell E. Mackey, and James C. Holland are here as representatives of the employees' representation plan of the Bethlehem Steel Co., at the Maryland plant, Sparrows Point, Md.?

Mr. CREW. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Will you speak for all of these employees?

Mr. CREW. Yes, sir; I will.

The CHAIRMAN. Will you give your full name?

Mr. CREW. Albert Crew.

The CHAIRMAN. What is your occupation?

Mr. CREW. Carpenter.

The CHAIRMAN. Where do you reside?

Mr. CREW. Sparrows' Point, Md.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the company with which you are employed?

Mr. CREW. Bethlehem Steel Co., Maryland plant.

The CHAIRMAN. You are chairman of the representation body of the employees?

Mr. CREW. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You are speaking for them in your representative capacity?

Mr. CREW. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed with your statement.

Mr. CREW. At a special meeting of the employees' representatives of the Maryland plant of the Bethlehem Steel Co., at Sparrows Point, Md., called to discuss the bill now in hearing before your committee, we, the undersigned, were authorized to appear and protest vigorously the passage of Senate bill no. 1958.

The employees at our plant feel that the enactment of this bill into a law will seriously handicap the operation of the plan of employees' representation, which has been so effective in settling problems and in promoting a feeling of goodwill and understanding between ourselves and the management at our plant. Such action, we believe, would be very unjust, and we know you would only take it through being mislead in your belief as to what the majority of the working men want. Any law that would restrict the operation of our plan in its present form would be very unjust, as unrestricted by legislation it is meeting satisfactorily our needs as a "collective bargaining" agency.

It has been made very clear to us by published reports and through the papers that the bill has been drafted with but one idea in view, viz, to promote and advance the interests of organized labor to the detriment of our plan, that of employees' representation.

The plan of employees' representation has been in force in our plant for 16 years, during which time we have received, and are continuing to receive, all the benefits and opportunities which could possibly be available under the bill now proposed.

The result of our last election, completed on March 20. 1935, proved very decidedly the wishes and faith of the men in our plan of representation. The number of men available to vote was 11.290 and of this number 10,814, or 94.8 percent, cast ballots in favor of the plan, which leaves small doubt as to their feeling in the matter.

We earnestly entreat you not to pass any legislation designed to weaken our plan of employees representation.

If any of our men wish to join the union they are free to do so, and there is no discrimination against them, but we who want to deal with the management through the plan of employees' representation seriously object to any legislation designed to weaken the plan and eventually force the men into the union.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there a union at your plant?

Mr. CREW. The Amalgamated Association has a very small representation there.

The CHAIRMAN. Do they cooperate with you?

Mr. CREW. In no shape or form.

The CHAIRMAN. They do not vote with you either?

Mr. CREW. No, they do not vote under our plan, but vote in their own organization.

Senator TYDINGS. There is no question in your mind that what you have just read is the untrammeled opinion of the men in the plant at Sparrows' Point?

Mr. CREW. If there was any question in my mind as to that, I would not be here.

Senator TYDINGS. In other words, your coming here does not mean that the company has sent you, but means as well that the men have sent you?

Mr. CREW. This was proposed by myself with a small group of other men, and we called a general meeting and took a vote.

Senator TYDINGS. How do you support your observations that this bill will break up your present arrangement and substitute therefor an organization that your men do not want to join? What do you base that contention upon?

Mr. CREW. I base that contention upon one thing, among other things, but there is one primary reason for that belief of mine, and that is I know, and I have seen it proven time and again, that in any labor board similar to this one or any board sent up to arbitrate anything in any question of a labor dispute, they generally appoint one member to take care of the labor end, and it is invariably some one who is in sympathy with or connected with the American Federation of Labor. That is my principal reason for thinking that bill would break up our plan.

Senator TYDINGS. Would you rather have your own men selected rather than have some one appointed from the outside? Is that it?

Mr. CREW. I do not mean that, but I think, to be perfectly fair, such a board should contain a man from both organizations.

Senator TYDINGS. Let me get that. You have about 95 percent in round numbers in your organization over at Sparrows Point, and around 5 percent in the Amalgamated Association. It is your fear if this bill goes through that the man who represents labor will come from the 5 percent rather than the 95 percent?

Mr. CREW. I believe it would eventually lead to that, and I would like to add, I believe due to the fact that if a charge is brought against our organization naturally it would be heard under this bill before the proposed board sitting at that time, and that board would be a man who has entire sympathy with the American Federation of Labor.

Senator TYDINGS. Are these ballots secret ballots or open ballots?

Mr. CREW. They are secret ballots.

Senator TYDINGS. Do any of the Amalgamated men offer themselves as candidates for these representative places?

Mr. CREW. Occasionally.

Senator TYDINGS. Are they elected or defeated?

Mr. CREW. I cannot recall off-hand of anyone who has been elected, but it is a possibility for him to be elected.

Senator TYDINGS. Your main objection, as I understand, is that you are satisfied now with the working arrangement in the plant at Sparrows Point, Md.?

Mr. CREW. Absolutely.

Senator TYDINGS. And you fear if some other bill goes through, those relationships may be disturbed?

Mr. CREW. I feel they will.

Senator TYDINGS. Is that the main objection you have?

Mr. CREW. That is the main objection.

Senator TYDINGS. Suppose it was represented on the floor of the Senate that the new bill would not disturb the present relationship and there was sound argument produced to substantiate that point, would you still maintain that view?

Mr. CREW. Not necessarily; but I cannot conceive of any such circumstance.

Senator TYDINGS. I tried to represent your point of view at the last session of Congress, because I had these signed papers from the men of your organization, but it was contended at that time that the bill would not affect you in any way, and that you could still proceed with your own arrangement. Whether that is so or not I am not prepared to say, but according to the thought you expressed to me that the present set-up might be disbanded, do you still maintain that position?

Mr. CREW. I still maintain that position.

Senator WAGNER. What particular provision of the bill is it that you think will be destructive of your plan—that is, providing a majority of the workers vote for it?

Mr. CREW. The provision that describes the manner in which the board shall be created. Not exactly that, but the board itself shall be composed of so many members, and naturally in such a board there will be a labor man appointed.

Senator WAGNER. Then it is not the bill at all, I understand, that you are disturbed about, but you are disturbed that the President will appoint a member on this board to administer these important functions that you will not be willing to trust to give you a square deal. Is that what it is?

Mr. CREW. No; that is not it at all.

Senator WAGNER. What is it?

Mr. CREW. I believe if the President realizes the circumstances he would be perfectly fair, but I am just judging by past labor boards. For instance, one of the regional labor boards in our own State, in Baltimore, had on that board an official of the American Federation of Labor. I do not hold the President responsible for that.

Senator WAGNER. The National Labor Board has today no so-called " representatives of labor " on it at all. There are three members on that board appointed by the President. One is Mr. Biddle, who is a prominent lawyer in Philadelphia. The other is Professor Millis, who is professor of economics at the Chicago University and has had great experience in this field; and the other is Mr. Smith, who comes from the State of the distinguished chairman of this committee, and I think he is regarded very eminently there as a man of high standing with a very high conception of what is just.

Your point is, as I see it, you do not oppose the bill as a bill, but you are not willing to trust these other men on a labor board to decide questions that may arise in the differences between employees and employers. Is that it?

Mr. CREW. No, sir.

Senator WAGNER. What is it then?

Mr. CREW. I believe your point is just a little unfairly taken.

Senator WAGNER. I want you to state it then.

Mr. CREW. I mean no disrespect, but I mean I think your point is a little unfairly taken. I do not disbelieve the honesty of these men, they may be sitting there perfectly honest in their intentions, but the very fact their sympathies lie with a certain organization will unconsciously influence their opinions as handed down.

Senator WAGNER. But, at the present time there is not one man on the Labor Board that is a member of any labor organization.

Mr. CREW. That is one labor board, I might say, one of many.

Senator WAGNER. What I am trying to find out is just what your objection is. You say you cannot conceive of any board being appointed that will be just to you and the men you represent.

Mr. CREW. No; not as long as there is a man on that board, the particular labor board, whose sympathies may unconciously or consciously lie with the other group.

Senator WAGNER. That is your objection to this legislation. Have you any other reasons?

Mr. CREW. Mr. Wolf would like to make a statement.

Senator WAGNER. I will ask you this. Are you being paid for coming here?

Mr. CREW. I am being paid for the time I actually would have worked if I had not come here.

Senator WAGNER. And your fare?

Mr. CREW. My fare; no, sir.

Senator WAGNER. You are paying that yourself?

Mr. CREW. I am not paying it myself; I borrowed it.

Senator WAGNER. We can be candid with one another. I mean do you expect the management to pay your fare?

Mr. CREW. I can reasonably expect it.

Senator WAGNER. You are also paid for your services when you represent the workers in any dealings with the management—you are being paid by the management?

Mr. CREW. Yes; when I receive pay for that. I perform other duties than the duty of collective bargaining.

Senator WAGNER. But you are being paid?

Mr. CREW. Yes; and there is safety work and other things attached to that.

Senator WAGNER. Do you know whether your constitution permits the selection by the workers of anybody who is not employed in your plant?

Mr. CREW. Yes; the constitution does not permit anybody who is not an employee in our plant to be our representative.

Senator WAGNER. You cannot have anyone outside to represent you under your constitution?

Mr. CREW. Not anybody we do not want to represent the workers.

Senator WAGNER. Doesn't your contitution limit the representation to men that are actually employed in your plant?

Mr. CREW. No, sir; I only actually represent the men that voted for the plan. The men that did not vote for the plan, they can get anybody under the sun to represent them that they want.

Senator WAGNER. Do you have a copy of the constitution?

Mr. CREW. No, sir.

Senator WAGNER. You do have a constitution, though?

Mr. CREW. Yes, sir.

Senator WAGNER. And that constitution enumerates certain qualifications necessary in order to be elected a representative?

Mr. CREW. That is right.

Senator WAGNER. Is one of those qualifications that you must be an employee of the plant?

Mr. CREW. That is right.

Senator TYDINGS. You say this organization you represent has been in existence for about 16 years?

Mr. CREW. Yes, sir.

Senator TYDINGS. Have you ever had any labor trouble during that time?

Mr. CREW. We have had no labor trouble that could properly be classed as such.

Senator TYDINGS. This meeting that was called, at which you were elected and asked you to come over here and present the views of those on the question you represent, who called that meeting, the company, yourself, or both?

Mr. CREW. I personally called it.

Senator TYDINGS. Was there a full and frank discussion of this bill, as full as you could have?

Mr. CREW. There was such a discussion and it lasted 2 hours.

Senator TYDINGS. Was a vote taken at the end of that discussion?

Mr. CREW. Yes, sir.

Senator TYDINGS. And the vote, I understand, was about 94 against a 6 percent vote?

Mr. CREW. Out of the entire body there were 10 votes against, and the balance was for sending this delegation.

Senator TYDINGS. Sending the delegation here to oppose the plan?

Mr. CREW. Yes, sir.

Senator WAGNER. How many did you say?

Mr. CREW. It was 10 against 41.

Senator WAGNER. It was not a meeting of the entire employees but it was a meeting of just the representatives being paid by the management.

Mr. CREW. This group of representatives; yes.

Senator TYDINGS. Then the men never had any real voice on the proposition?

Mr. CREW. They have had a voice in this form. I have spread it among the shops and I know their sentiments there.

Senator TYDINGS. You say 41 were for it and 10 were not for it?

Mr. CREW. That is right.

Senator TYDINGS. Now, of that percentage that were not in favor of coming over, what is their attitude on this bill?

Mr. CREW. I do not know.

Senator TYDINGS. Was the reason expressed in the meeting because they were opposed to the bill, or because of any other reason?

Mr. CREW. The only other reason I think of was that they could not be quite sure how the men in their particular shop felt about it.

Senator WAGNER. Did you draft this statement yourself?

Mr. CREW. The other four members and myself drafted this statement.

The CHAIRMAN. This statement represents the views of the other three members with you?

Mr. CREW. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And they are Walter Franz, secretary, general body employees' representatives; W. J. Wolf, representative; Russel E. Mackey, representative; and James C. Holland, representative.

Mr. CREW. Yes, sir; that is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there anything further?

Senator WAGNER. No; that is all I think.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the representatives of the employees' representatives of the Weirton Steel Co. come forward?

STATEMENT OF JACK LARKIN, GENERAL CHAIRMAN EMPLOYEES' REPRESENTATIVES, WEIRTON STEEL CO., WEIRTON, W. VA.

The CHAIRMAN. What is your full name, for the record?

Mr. LARKIN. Jack Larkin.

The CHAIRMAN. Where are you employed?

Mr. LARKIN. Weirton Steel Co.

The CHAIRMAN. Where is that located?

Mr. LARKIN. Weirton, W. Va.

The CHAIRMAN. What is your position?

Mr. LARKIN. Roller, 48-inch strip mill.

The CHAIRMAN. You are chairman of the general representative body of that industry?

Mr. LARKIN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And accompanying you is Norman K. Moore, whose occupation is blower in the blast furnaces?

Mr. LARKIN. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Moore, you are general secretary of the representative body?

Mr. MOORE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Larkin, you may proceed with your statement.

Mr. LARKIN. I am general chairman of the 49 employee representatives elected by the employees of the Weirton Steel Co. The present board of representatives was chosen last December at an election in which 98 percent of the approximately 12,000 employees voted.

Our plan of representation is entirely in our own hands. We make our own bylaws and the comapny has no control over us whatsoever. I resent the frequent use of the phrase "company-dominated union." Some of our representatives appeared before your committee last year, and as the independence of our plan and its success has been set out fully as a result of an extensive hearing in the United States District Court in Delaware, I do not think it necessary to go into the details of it. I believe that no one can read Judge Nields' opinion without realizing that we have a thoroughly independent and efficient organization.

There are hundreds of other organizations throughout the United States that have been functioning efficiently over a long period of years and I cannot see any reason why the Government should want to exterminate these organizations because of the political pressure of highly paid professional organizers of the American Federation of Labor, who are constantly calling our organization "company dominated" without any proof or evidence. If the American Federation of Labor is good for the workers of this country it can win on its merits and it ought not to have any laws designed to exterminate other organizations, and that is the effect of the bill proposed here.

I want to mention just one point of that bill, and that is the provision of it which would prevent the company from paying any of the expenses of such an organization as ours. We made a written demand upon the management that it pay into our treasury 50 cents a year for each member to cover the expenses of the organization in printing of ballots, circulars, making trips to other mills to compare rates, attendance upon these and other hearings, and so forth. After that money is paid to us on the first of January each year, it belongs to us and we can do with it as we please. We have used it to employ attorneys for services sometimes adverse to the interests of the company. We also demanded that the representatives receive $25 a month compensation for services rendered outside of working hours and the company agreed to make that payment. Under most employee representation plans the representatives are paid at their regular rate of pay for the time spent in the performance of their duties. This is all right when representatives are called away from their regular work because they certainly should not be penalized for time lost in performing their duties as representatives of the men, but when they attend meetings on their own time there is no reason why they should be paid differently according to their hourly rates. A steel mill works 24 hours a day and you can't hold any meeting without taking some away from their work.

A man may be a low-paid man in the mill but his services as a representative of his fellow employees may be just as valuable as a highly-paid worker, and we felt that the representatives should have a flat rate of $25 a month. There is less chance for favoritism under such an arrangement. If the management has to approve the time slips, it would be possible for them to favor one man and stint another. It might even be possible to call meetings at a time which would cause a loss of money to some of the representatives to attend. Under our system every man is paid the same. The men all know that the representatives get this amount. There is no inducement to a representative to manufacture claims in order to build up his time spent in his duties as a representative and there is a right of recall if any representative is not attending to his duty.

What good reason is there why the expenses of such an organization should not be paid by the company? We contribute to the income of the company; it's our labor and services that bring in the money, and the fact that a small part of it is set aside for the use of our organization is perfectly fair and just. The total expense of maintaining this plan does not amount to more than one-fourth of 1 percent of the pay roll of the company. The company has nothing to say about who gets the money. The employees choose the representatives. How can it be said that the company has any control over the organization at all by reason of the fact that it pays this sum of money over for the use of the organization? An expenditure of one-fourth of 1 percent to maintain peace and harmony for the men, settle their grievances and adjust their wage disputes, is no unfair burden to the company, and if placed upon the men it does work a hardship. Some of the men receive very low rates of pay and even a couple of dollars a month dues to such men is a burden.

Furthermore, why should any employee have to belong to an organization in order to have his grievances redressed? Why should not every employee in the mill have a right to vote for the persons who are going to represent him, without the necessity of belonging to some national union and contribute to the war chests of the American Federation of Labor?

Why should any employee have to submit to the fines and assessments levied by a national union in order to have some say about the affairs of the employees of the company he works for? Under our system every man in the mill is entitled to representation. He can present any grievance he has and it doesn't cost him a cent.

You would think to hear the arguments that are advanced criticizing the fact that the company pays the expenses of the employee organization that it had the power to pay one man and not another, or to pay or withhold pay, as it saw fit, for the purpose of influencing the votes of the representatives. This is absurd. The ultimate source of the money paid in by the members of a labor organization is from the employer and I cannot see what difference it makes whether the company turns over a lump sum each year, according to a fixed arrangement, or whether the men pay a check-off, which is the system which the American Federation of Labor wants. In the latter case it comes off the men's salaries. A Federal judge gets a fixed salary. It comes from the United States. Would anyone say that he was prejudiced in favor of the United States in deciding a case because his salary happens to come out of the United States Treasury? As long as his salary is fixed and it cannot be taken away from him, he is independent. It is the same situation with our representatives. The amount they get per months is far less than the time they actually spend in their duties as representatives, and neither the company nor anybody else can deprive them of that compensation.

The men can elect anybody as a representative that they wish, even an outsider, and if William Green were elected a representative under our plan, he would be entitled to his $25 a month, just the same as anyone else. How it can be said that this is a method of dominating or controlling the repreesntatives, I do not see. Judge

Nields found this was not company domination. The only reason the American Federation of Labor would like to get that clause in this bill is because it thinks these organizations of employees, to which an employee may belong without being charged dues or assessed fines, interfere with its revenue. I cannot think that the Government wants to lend its assistance to help force the working men of the country to pay tribute to the American Federation of Labor. A great many more men belong to independent organizations, so-called "company unions", than to the American Federation of Labor. If these employee representation plans had the high-paid lobbies of Washington that are maintained by the American Federation of Labor we could bring thousands of men here to complain of this proposed bill, but I believe that you men intend to protect the rights of the workers who want their own organizations, and one of the most damaging things about this whole bill, as far as we are concerned, is the attempt to make it illegal for the company to pay the expenses of our organization.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you a national trade union among your employees?

Mr. LARKIN. No national union, but it has been talked of several times.

The CHAIRMAN. The only organization for collective bargaining is this organization you represent?

Mr. LARKIN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. How many of your employees participated in the balloting?

Mr. LARKIN. Ninety-eight percent of all of the total workers.

The CHAIRMAN. When did you have the last election?

Mr. LARKIN. Last December.

The CHAIRMAN. How many elections had you had prior to that?

Mr. LARKIN. Two—one in 1933.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will stand adjourned until 2:30 o'clock this afternoon and at that time we will hear the employees of the American Rolling Mills Co., Jones-Laughlin Steel Corporation, American Sheet & Tin Plate Co., Carnegie Steel Co., and the American Iron & Steel Institute.

(Thereupon a recess was taken until 2:30 o'clock of this day.)

AFTERNOON SESSION

(The recess having expired, the committee reconvened at half past 2 p. m.)

Present: Senators Walsh (chairman), Murray, Wagner, and George.

TESTIMONY OF EMPLOYEE REPRESENTATIVES, WHEELING STEEL CORPORATION, STEUBENVILLE WORKS

The CHAIRMAN. Will the employees of the Wheeling Steel Corporation come forward, please.

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you the only one?

Mr. MITCHELL. No, sir; I have four with me.

The CHAIRMAN. Will you call them all, please. I understand you represent yourself, Guy E. Mitchell.

Mr. MITCHELL. Right.

The CHAIRMAN. And you are spokesman for the employee-representatives at the Steubenville works of the Wheeling Steel Corporation?

Mr. MITCHELL. Right.

The CHAIRMAN. And accompanying you is the general chairman, Edward Kirkpatrick?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And Don Starr?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. He is an employees' representative; William Evans, an employees' representative, and S. E. McCoy, substation operator and employees' representative?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You are to speak for the entire group?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. And your full name, you say, is Guy E. Mitchell?

Mr. MITCHELL. Right.

The CHAIRMAN. And you are by occupation a roller?

Mr. MITCHELL. A cold roller; yes.

The CHAIRMAN. How many employees are there in the Steubenville works of the Wheeling Steel Corporation?

Mr. MITCHELL. About 5,000 at the present time.

The CHAIRMAN. And what is the form of your employees' organization?

Mr. MITCHELL. How many representatives?

The CHAIRMAN. What is the form; what is it called? What is the name of your employees' organization?

Mr. MITCHELL. The representative plan.

The CHAIRMAN. You are called the "representative plan"?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. And how many of the employees belong to it?

Mr. MITCHELL. We have 25 representatives. All of our employees belong to it, because they are eligible to participate.

The CHAIRMAN. When did you have your last election?

Mr. MITCHELL. Last May.

The CHAIRMAN. And you and those who are here with you were elected in that election?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed with your statement.

STATEMENT OF GUY E. MITCHELL, EMPLOYEES' REPRESENTATIVE, STEUBENVILLE, OHIO

Mr. MITCHELL. The reason that I have come to Washington is to ask this committee to hear me, as I wish to give them some information which I believe they would be interested in.

I am here at my own request, for I have in the past been a member of several labor unions, and for the past 11 years I have been a member of the employees' representation plan. At the present time I am one of the employees' representatives of the new process department, which rolls auto-body sheets and makes sheets for other uses. I have been an employees' representatives for 7 years; I have served on the ways, rules, and means committee of the employees' representatives which had charge of the nomination and election of the employees' representatives of the Steubenville works.

The CHAIRMAN. How long has this organization been in existence?

Mr. MITCHELL. Since 1921 in our plant.

The CHAIRMAN. And you have been a representative during 7 of those years?

Mr. MITCHELL. During 7 of those years; yes, sir.

There are 5,000 men employed at this works, and we have 25 employees' representatives.

We held our nomination on May 28, 1934; and on this date there were about 3,745 men working and there were 3,468 ballots cast for a percentage of 92.6 percent of the men who were working. On June 1, 1934, we held our election of the men who were nominated. There were 4,077 men working, as business had picked up some; and there were 3,908 votes cast, or an average of 95.8 percent voting.

The employees' representation plan was started in 1921 and has been in operation continually since that time. We hold our meetings monthly. We have a chairman and a secretary, and we have 13 committees, such as rules, ways, and means committee, which has to do with the rules of the representation plan; and a committee on wages, piecework, and bonuses and tonnage schedule; a committee on practice methods in economy; a committee on health and work sanitation; pensions and relief; athletics and recreation; housing, domestic, economic, and living conditions; continuous employment; and conditions of industry.

We have these committees functioning, and they have handled 116 cases the past year that we have a record, of which more than 90 percent of these cases were settled in our favor; some were compromised, a few were withdrawn, and a few of these cases were denied. There are a great many cases that are handled directly between the representatives and their department foremen and superintendents which do not reach our meetings and of which there are no records. I am sure that any employees' representative will bear me out in this statement.

We employees of our plant feel that we are entirely satisfied under our present plan of representation, and we feel that the passage of the Wagner bill would deny us our selection of the representation plan which we choose to have.

We do not wish to have any collective-bargaining agency forced upon us, which we feel is not fitting for ourselves; and as we are entirely satisfied with our present plan of representation, which has been functioning satisfactorily for more than 14 years, we are opposed to accepting another agency in its place.

We feel that we employees ourselves should handle our own problems with our management, and we are opposed to having our present plan of representation declared illegal. We feel if the Wagner bill passes it will take our own personal liberty away from us.

Having been a member of labor unions in the past, I cannot see any benefit from them at this time, as we are working in harmony at our plant. If a labor union is forced upon us, it will cause dissension among our employees, which number approximately 5,000 at the present time. We wish to make a protest against the passing of the Wagner bill as it is drawn up at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Wagner would like to ask you some questions.

Senator WAGNER. To what provisions of the bill particularly do you object?

Mr. MITCHELL. The provision in your bill, as I see it, would force an agency upon us that would bring outsiders in to tell us whom we should elect and whom we should not elect.

Senator WAGNER. What provision of the bill do you refer to?

Mr. MITCHELL. Your National Labor Board.

Senator WAGNER. Well, what do you mean—what provisions of the bill do that?

Mr. MITCHELL. Your National Labor Board that your bill would designate.

Senator WAGNER. They can only act within the powers conferred upon them under this bill. I would like to have you point out to me the provision of the bill which does what you claim it does, in destroying the freedom of the employees.

Mr. MITCHELL. Your bill says that the National Labor Board will be appointed to supervise all elections, does it not?

Senator WAGNER. No; not unless there is a question as to who represents the workers. Then there may be, under the supervision of the Board, if a dispute arises between the workers and the management as to who represents the workers; and if the National Labor Board cannot determine that from an election that has been held, they may have an election under the supervision of the Government, where each man expresses his choice.

Mr. MITCHELL. We have that now.

Senator WAGNER. Well, all right then, this bill does not interfere with that. You said the passage of this bill would destroy your union.

Mr. MITCHELL. Absolutely. We have no union, Mr. Wagner.

Senator WAGNER. Or your organization. What provisions of the bill would do that? Who prepared this statement?

Mr. MITCHELL. Your bill declares our representation plan illegal.

Senator WAGNER. No; it does not do anything of the kind. What provision of the bill does that?

Mr. MITCHELL. As I get it, your bill would declare our plan illegal.

Senator WAGNER. Well, what provision of the bill?

Mr. MITCHELL. Because you call it a company union, and we have no company union.

Senator WAGNER. I am not talking about a company union at all. I am asking you what provision of this bill affects your organization? You do not know, do you? Who prepared this statement?

Mr. MITCHELL. I prepared that, myself.

Senator WAGNER. That is all your own language?

Mr. MITCHELL. Absolutely; yes, sir.

Senator WAGNER. Then upon what do you base your statement that this will destroy your organization—the passage of this bill?

Mr. MITCHELL. Because, as I understand and interpret your bill, it would declare our plan illegal.

Senator WAGNER. Well, where? What provision of the bill?

Mr. MITCHELL. Does it not do away with the so-called "company unions"?

Senator WAGNER. It does not say anything about a company union.

Mr. MITCHELL. No; because we have no company union.

Senator WAGNER. It simply attempts to preserve to the worker the freedom of choice, freedom from any pressure, economic or otherwise, of the employer, and if your plan is based upon the free choice of the worker, there is nothing in this bill that interferes with it.

Mr. MITCHELL. It always has been. Our plan always has been.

Senator WAGNER. I say, if it is based upon the free choice of the workers, then there is nothing in this bill that can interfere with it. If it does not represent the free choice of the workers, you admit it ought not to exist?

Mr. MITCHELL. Absolutely.

Senator WAGNER. Are you paid by the management?

Mr. MITCHELL. I am paid $6 per meeting.

Senator WAGNER. Well, whatever it is, you are being paid?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, sir.

Senator WAGNER. And under your constitution, does it limit the representatives to be elected to employees of the particular plant?

Mr. MITCHELL. No, sir; not necessarily; you can elect an outsider.

Senator WAGNER. You can elect an outsider?

Mr MITCHELL. Absolutely.

The CHAIRMAN. This bill makes illegal an organization of employees dominated by the employer, and I judge from what you say that you fear the board, to be set up under this bill, may call an organization like yours a "dominated" employees' organization.

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. That is your fear?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. As Senator Wagner has said, if your employees' organization is voluntary, free from control or influence or direction by the employers, there is nothing in this proposed legislation to interfere with that; and the Board that is set up would be performing an illegal act if it attempted to declare your organization illegal. That is my judgment, and it is your judgment, Senator Wagner?

Senator WAGNER. And if the Board is wrong, there is a review in court.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course, if your employers, directly or indirectly, in the elections seek to influence the employees; if your employers directly or indirectly seek to control by payments made to the representatives or favors extended to them, that would be called a "dominated" organization.

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. And that would be found illegal.

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. But I judge that your fear and that of others is that the Board might in its desire to give preference to trade unions seek to declare unions or organizations such as you have illegal?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. I think the committee will, in the drafting of this bill, if it is not already included, make it very clear that the organizations that are free from domination, referring now to employees' organizations, shall not be subjected to any such ruling by the Board that is set up here.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Chairman, as you realize, our plan did not jump up in the last 2 years. Our plan has been in force for some time.

The CHAIRMAN. I noticed that. That is why I asked you about that specially.

Mr. MITCHELL. We have worked in harmony all these years, and I will say that in our plant we have never had any trouble.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course, there is a suspicion attached to those organizations that have come into existence in the last 2 years, under the belief that it was an effort on the part of the employers to control the kind of organization the employees would have, and I personally feel, and I think Senator Wagner does also, that there is nothing objectionable to the employers asking their men to form an organization for collective-bargaining purposes, in view of the declaration in 7 (a). But this bill and the whole purpose of section 7 (a) is to permit the employees to be free, not to be compelled to have any kind of organization they do not want, and not to have thrust upon them any organization that their employers may prefer; that they should have absolute choice in the kind of organization; absolute choice in the election of their representatives; and that they should be obliged to confer with the representatives and not shut the door in their faces when they come with grievances to them.

Mr. MITCHELL. As you know, the employment in our plant is composed of a cosmopolitan population. I suppose that in the 5,000 men that we have on our pay roll you will find every known nationality on the globe.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course, the Government is not responsible for that.

Mr. MITCHELL. Absolutely not.

The CHAIRMAN. And if there are elements within that cosmopolitan group of employees who are disorderly and unreasonable, it is your employers' fault in hiring them.

Mr. MITCHELL. Certainly; I agree with you.

The CHAIRMAN. And in some instances it appeared before us that the employers have deliberately sought to employ people with different languages and different nationalities, with the idea they could be better controlled; but I think most of them have found that it was an unfortunate experiment. I do not suppose there is any group of workmen who are fairer or better for an employer to deal with than what we call the American stock, which has not inherited any foreign traditions or customs, which is filled with the real American spirit, and which desires without disturbances or without force to assert its rights with its employers; so that this cosmopolitan group of which you speak is not of our making.

Mr. MITCHELL. No. I agree with you. I agree with you.

The CHAIRMAN. I think we understand your position, and you simply want us to allow your men to go along and have the kind of organization they want.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. And you think, for your own purposes and uses, this plan is serving the purpose satisfactorily, and you do not want to be disturbed.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is it, absolutely; yes, sir.

Senator WAGNER. Have you a collective-bargaining agreement written out, with all of the terms of employment, the amount of wages to be paid, and all of that written out and signed by both sides?

Mr. MITCHELL. No; Senator Wagner.

Senator WAGNER. You have not?

Mr. MITCHELL. Our wages are based upon the different positions that the men hold.

Senator WAGNER. I understand that, but I am asking you whether you have any written agreement about that.

Mr. MITCHELL. No. If there is anything that comes up, that any man in the department feels that he is being slighted in any way, we take that up with the department head; and if he feels that the man is entitled to more money, he gets it.

Senator WAGNER. Supposing the workers whom you represent think they ought to receive an increase in salary or an improvement in some of their conditions; do they come to you?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, sir. We are the representative in their department.

Senator WAGNER. But supposing the workers generally in your plan feel that they ought to have better economic conditions, they ought to have an increase in wages; do they present their claims to you?

Mr. MITCHELL. They present the claims to the representative of their department.

Senator WAGNER. And then you get together?

Mr. MITCHELL. And that representative takes it to the superintendent of that department.

Senator WAGNER. Supposing there are three or four of you in the different departments, all wanting an increase in wages?

Mr. MITCHELL. We take it to our own individual superintendent. We have a superintendent for every department in our plant.

Senator WAGNER. Does he represent the management in that?

Mr. MITCHELL. No; he represents his own department, and we represent the men of that department.

Senator WAGNER. How do you get it before your employer?

Mr. MITCHELL. In case he turns it down, we take it to the management.

Senator WAGNER. Supposing the management turns it down?

Mr. MITCHELL. We take it to the president of the company.

Senator WAGNER. And supposing he turns it down?

Mr. MITCHELL. We have direct action, to go to the Secretary of Labor of the State.

Senator WAGNER. I see.

Mr. MITCHELL. And if they turn it down, we have direct action to come to the Secretary of Labor of the United States. That is in our bylaws.

Senator WAGNER. In your bylaws?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, sir.

Senator WAGNER. Supposing the men feel they are not being fairly treated by any of these parties, as to wages, what happens?

Mr. MITCHELL. What redress have they?

Senator WAGNER. How?

Mr. MITCHELL. What redress have they?

Senator WAGNER. I am asking you.

Mr. MITCHELL. They have gone to the highest tribunal in the United States, when they come to the Secretary of Labor, have they not?

Senator WAGNER. And if it is not adjusted there, then that is the end of it; is that right?

Mr. MITCHELL. They can strike, close the plant down—which is very unfortunate for any plant.

Senator WAGNER. Have you a fund with which to conduct a strike, if you had a strike?

Mr. MITCHELL. No, sir. Every man is on his own initiative.

Senator WAGNER. All right.

The CHAIRMAN. You have been elected and reelected seven times?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. How many times have these other men been elected?

Mr. MITCHELL. One of these men, 2 years; another, 6; another, 2; and this man here, I think, ever since the organization started.

The CHAIRMAN. I think it is fair to assume that you must be somewhat alert in protecting the rights of the employees, or they would not reelect you.

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, I will tell you, Mr. Chairman, we go along in harmony in our plant. I am not speaking of other plants, understand; I am speaking of our own plant, alone.

The CHAIRMAN. But there is an opportunity, if any one of your men is suspected of being an employer's man and lacks the necessary alertness in his efforts to protect the rights of the employees, to defeat his reelection?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The men can do it?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And would do it?

Mr. MITCHELL. Absolutely. There is no coercion in our elections whatsoever.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, the other gentlemen who accompany you, I assume, would express the same sentiments if called to the witness stand. You are in accord with the views expressed by your chairman? All right. We thank you all.

EMPLOYEE REPRESENTATIVES, SPANG CHALFANT & CO., INC., PITTSBURGH, PA.

The CHAIRMAN. Next on our list are the employee representatives of Spang Chalfant & Co., Inc., of Pittsburgh, Charles Davis and Max Mursch. Is this Mr. Davis?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Your full name?

Mr. DAVIS. Charles Davis.

The CHAIRMAN. You are by occupation a machinist?
Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. And employed at Etna, Pa., in the plant of Spang Chalfant & Co., Inc.?
Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. And you are one of the representatives and treasurer of the employees' representative organization?
Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. And you have been selected to speak for them?
Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. Accompanying you is Max Mursch?
Mr. MURSCH. Yes, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. You are a pipe welder?
Mr. MURSCH. Yes, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. You are also a representative?
Mr. MURSCH. Yes, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. How many representatives have you?
Mr. DAVIS. We have nine.
The CHAIRMAN. How many employees are there in your plant?
Mr. DAVIS. There are 1,200.
The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed.

STATEMENT OF CHARLES DAVIS, REPRESENTATIVE AND TREASURER OF THE EMPLOYEES' REPRESENTATIVES, ETNA, PA.

Mr. DAVIS. I have been sent to Washington with my fellow representative, Max Mursch, to present the objections of the employees of the Etna plant of Spang Chalfant & Co., Inc., to the Wagner bill, S. 1958.

Our present plan of employees' representation was put into effect in June 1933, when the first annual election was held to vote for the plan and elect representatives.

The CHAIRMAN. What year was that?

Mr. DAVIS. In 1933. The election was by secret ballot with no coercion whatever by the management. We have found the present plan to meet our requirements and have been accorded every courtesy and attention in every case brought before them for adjustment.

At our last annual election, in June 1934, 92 percent of the employees cast ballots, and had the whole force been at work we would no doubt have polled a larger vote.

We are paid a flat rate for the meetings we attend, through our treasury. A certain sum is contributed to the fund in our treasury by the company, monthly. The election expenses are paid from this fund also.

The CHAIRMAN. What is that?
Mr. DAVIS. The election expenses.
The CHAIRMAN. What is that fund? How much is contributed by the company each month?
Mr. DAVIS. The company contributes $25 each month.
The CHAIRMAN. Each month?
Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. So, in the course of a year they give you $300 for the expenses of the one election which you hold, and as compensation to be divided among the representatives?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the time that you lose from your work when you are participating in the business of collective bargaining deducted from your wages?

Mr. DAVIS. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You get that also, besides this $300?

Mr. DAVIS. No; it is not deducted. We do not get paid for that, only out of the treasury.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; I meant that.

Mr. DAVIS. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. So that if you are out for 2 or 3 hours at the end of the week, you have a deduction for the time you are out, but you get every month or every year a portion of this $300?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that the way you are paid?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir. We have a flat rate of $2 every meeting.

The CHAIRMAN. You get $2 every meeting?

Mr. DAVIS. We get $2 every meeting; yes, sir; once a month.

The CHAIRMAN. Once a month?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. So each of you get about $24 a year?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The meeting is at night not during the day time?

Mr. DAVIS. In the evenings, after working hours.

The CHAIRMAN. Do some of the men have to leave their work at night to attend these meetings?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. So some are on night shifts and have to leave their work?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Proceed.

Mr. DAVIS. If the balance in this fund is not sufficient for election expenses, when necessary, the company pays in the amount necessary.

We object to the interference from the outside coming in to run our affairs, as we feel we know best the conditions of our employment and can treat for our best interests for ourselves with our company management. We have had matters pertaining to wages, hours of employment, and plant working conditions up before our representatives committee, and each and everyone has been adjusted to our satisfaction.

Senator WAGNER. Did you prepare that statement yourself?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

Senator WAGNER. Are you being paid for coming here?

Mr. DAVIS. My expenses are paid down here; yes.

Senator WAGNER. By whom?

Mr. DAVIS. By the company. We feel that we were coming down here, and that the firm should defray our expenses.

Senator WAGNER. You think that the firm owes you your expenses for coming down here?

Mr. DAVIS. Well, in a way; yes.

Senator WAGNER. You think you are saying something for their benefit?

Mr. DAVIS. Well, no; not all for their benefit—for our own benefit.

Senator WAGNER. Well, you said you thought the company ought to pay you for coming down here.

Mr. DAVIS. Well, they should reimburse us for coming down here, because we could not pay our own way down.

Senator WAGNER. How?

Mr. DAVIS. We could not pay our own way down.

Senator WAGNER. What particular provisions of the bill do you oppose?

Mr. DAVIS. What we are opposed to is anybody coming in from the outside, trying to run our plant.

Senator WAGNER. What is there in this bill that forces somebody from the outside upon you?

Mr. DAVIS. The way we interpret some of the bill, it is that if the bill is passed through we believe that the company or outside union would be forced onto us.

Senator WAGNER. Well, how?

Mr. DAVIS. By election from the Labor Board.

Senator WAGNER. You mean that if all of their workers have a chance to express themselves free from any suggestion or anything from the employer, that they would be apt to elect an outside organization to represent them?

Mr. DAVIS. I do not think so.

Senator WAGNER. Then what is it that you fear?

Mr. DAVIS. Just as I say, we fear from the outside anybody being sent in, being forced onto us.

Senator WAGNER. There is nothing in this bill except to give the worker a free choice to vote as he wishes, for whatever method of representation he desires, in collective bargaining. Now, could you conscientiously object to that, to a worker having a free choice to vote for whomever he wants to vote for to represent him?

Mr. DAVIS. Well, in a way I would.

Senator WAGNER. You are opposed to that, are you?

Mr. DAVIS. I would not want anybody outside to come in and run my affairs in the shop.

Senator WAGNER. That is not what I am asking you. I am asking you whether you are opposed to the protection given to the worker, so that when he casts his ballot for a representative, it shall be his free choice.

Mr. DAVIS. That is what we have—his free choice.

Senator WAGNER. Well, if you have, there is nothing in this bill, I am saying, that interferes with that. I am trying to find out what particular provision of the bill you oppose.

Mr. DAVIS. One particular provision in it I believe is that the majority rule—that is, the 51 percent of the men at the mill vote for an outside labor union, then the other 49 are forced into it.

Senator WAGNER. Well, I do not know. Whoever told you there was any such provision in this bill has not given you an accurate statement. Where do you get your advice from? Who has given you advice as to what the bill means?

Mr. DAVIS. Nobody has been giving me any advice.

Senator WAGNER. Have you studied the bill carefully yourself?

Mr. DAVIS. I have looked through the bill, but I have not studied it really thoroughly, but I just picked out the point in the bill.

Senator WAGNER. I thought so. Well, what particular provision do you mean?

Mr. DAVIS. I would not just remember what it was.

Senator WAGNER. Would you know if I gave you the bill?

Mr. DAVIS. Oh, I probably would know some of it; probably I would.

Senator WAGNER. Let us have the bill, because I want to see where that is.

Mr. DAVIS (referring to S. 1958). I never saw the bill put up in this form before. The way I got my information was through the papers.

Senator WAGNER. Oh, through the newspapers?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

Senator WAGNER. Well, is that always accurate, you think?

Mr. DAVIS. Supposed to be.

Senator WAGNER. It depends on who writes the story, does it not, somewhat?

Mr. DAVIS. I guess it does.

Senator WAGNER. I mean the editorial. I am not speaking of the news items. You cannot find it, can you, off-hand?

Mr. DAVIS. No; I cannot, just now.

Senator WAGNER. Well, if you find it at any other time later, will you communicate with me?

Mr. DAVIS. Surely.

The CHAIRMAN. And the other witness I suppose desires to confirm the opinions expressed by the witness who is on the stand now?

Mr. MURSCH. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. And both may be excused.

EMPLOYEE REPRESENTATIVES, AMERICAN ROLLING MILL CO., BUTLER PLANT, BUTLER, PA.

The CHAIRMAN. The representatives of the employees of the American Rolling Mill Co., the Butler plant, at Butler, Pa., will come forward, please. Will you find chairs, gentlemen.

Mr. Colley, what is your full name?

Mr. COLLEY. Robert F. Colley.

The CHAIRMAN. Where do you reside?

Mr. COLLEY. Butler, Pa.

The CHAIRMAN. What is your position?

Mr. COLLEY. A roller.

The CHAIRMAN. With the Butler plant?

Mr. COLLEY. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you a representative of the management or of the employees?

Mr. COLLEY. I am a representative of the employees.

The CHAIRMAN. And you desire to speak for them?

Mr. COLLEY. I desire to speak for them.

The CHAIRMAN. And accompanying you there are the following: Michael Enright, vice chairman; R. M. Miller, secretary; F. E. Davis, clerk; M. L. Spinneweber; S. R. Zeigler; Raymond Keefer; J. C. Martin; William Schuck; and Maurice Fewkes.

You apparently all represent different trades or different department of work in this Butler plant.

Mr. COLLEY. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. Roller, time-study man, checker, millwright, machinist, crane operator, clerk, heater, and electrician; and you are chairman of the representatives, and are all of these elected representatives of the employees?

Mr. COLLEY. They are.

The CHAIRMAN. How many have you altogether?

Mr. COLLEY. We have 63.

The CHAIRMAN. And these represent those 63?

Mr. COLLEY. No; no. They are the selection of the 63 men.

The CHAIRMAN. To appear here?

Mr. COLLEY. To appear here before your committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you a statement you desire to submit to the committee?

Mr. COLLEY. I have.

The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed to present it.

STATEMENT OF ROBERT F. COLLEY, EXECUTIVE CHAIRMAN OF THE EMPLOYEE REPRESENTATIVES OF THE BUTLER, PA., WORKS OF THE AMERICAN ROLLING MILL CO.

Mr. COLLEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, my name is Robert F. Colley. I am executive chairman of the employee representatives of the Butler, Pa., works of the American Rolling Mill Co. In our plant we have approximately 2,000 men who are represented, for the purposes of collective bargaining, by 21 committees of 3 men each.

We are appearing before you today as the result of a resolution passed by these 63 men on March 21, 1935, directing that a delegation appear before your committee to present the views of our organization on the National Labor Relations Act.

We are opposed to this bill for many reasons. We believe that this legislation, if passed, would deprive us of what we consider to be our rights in dealing with our employer as we see fit. For many years before, and since the N. I. R. A. we have enjoyed collective bargaining through employee representation. By this means we long ago learned the advantages to the working men to be able to deal with our management in the spirit of friendship and good will, not influenced by any third party who would not understand our mutual interests.

We are convinced, through rulings already made by the present National Labor Board, that this bill would eventually result in outlawing our present plan of employee representation, which we employees wrote and in which we have absolute confidence. We believe that the very fact that we employees and the management are in such close harmony on matters of mutual concern that any labor board will be influenced to believe that we are company dominated. This, of course, would outlaw us.

We fear the possibility of the "closed shop" which is definitely anticipated and provided for in this bill. Our organization as a whole positively objects to this provision. Many of us in our younger days have had the experience of being directed by paid executives of national labor unions. We have been called out on strikes when we wanted to work; have had our hard-earned funds misappropriated and have been threatened and coerced by the very people who posed as our friends. This sort of tyranny will never occur when we are allowed to deal directly with sane management.

In our company and many others with which I am acquainted, we workmen and our families are provided with such benefits as group life insurance, wage incentives, sick-and-death benefits, free medical service, parks and playgrounds, and, above everything else, the good will and respect of our supervision and management. Every one of these benefits are over and above a fair and considerate wage and represent the kind of thing that makes life worth living for the laboring man. These things have come about simply because management and men have been able to consult together, unhindered by some third party whose stock in trade is to make trouble.

The framers of this legislation either do not understand this or do not want to understand it. Certainly they have had no practical experience in modern industry. We suspect that their real interest is to unionize our plants, which the vast majority of American workmen have rejected for the past 30 years.

This act puts the Federal Government's stamp of approval on the right to strike. We have no particular quarrel with this viewpoint only as strikes affect us as members of the general public. They cost the working man money the same as anyone else. The passage of this bill will result in a great increase in strikes.

We also seriously object to organized labor's coercive tactics now being used on Congress through the threat of widespread strikes if this bill is not passed.

Let me point out from personal experience that the tactics being used by the American Federation of Labor to secure the passage of this measure are exactly the same ones used against the individual to get him into the union and to control him after he is in.

As an example of the ability of labor unions to manage their own affairs, look at the internal strife now prevailing in the Amalgamated Association of Iron, Steel, and Tin Workers. Is it any wonder that the vast majority of steel workers do not want to be represented by this organization? And if it is so necessary that the thousands of workers in industry be governed by this act, why is not it also applied to the employees of the Government and of labor unions?

In the final analysis, what we workers and our families pray for is recovery, and not so much of reform, and we need it now. We want work and plenty of it, and to be allowed to perform it under the best possible conditions. We believe our present form of employee representation is the best possible method of securing these conditions and we arrive at this conclusion after having tried both methods. We can't get the best there is to be had out of life if we go about our work with a chip on our shoulder. Employee representation is the modern method of collective bargaining. It is sound because it is based on the theory of mutual interest between management and men.

We firmly believe that the day this bill becomes the law of the land, if it does, that day will be the beginning of far-reaching conflict. It is within the powers of this committee to avoid that, and we strenuously oppose being legislated into trouble.

Senator WAGNER. Are your expenses paid for coming down here?

Mr. COLLEY. They are.

Senator WAGNER. By the employer?

Mr. COLLEY. They are.

Senator WAGNER. And are you paid for representing the workers?

Mr. COLLEY. I am not, other than what is provided in our plan—the time necessarily lost. If I have work to go to and I am working at this employee representation I get paid, but if my time lapses——

Senator WAGNER. You get paid, not by the men you represent but by the management with whom you are to negotiate for the men, is that right?

Mr. COLLEY. Well, now, when you put the question that way——

Senator WAGNER. All right, I will withdraw that question. You are paid for this time which you devote to representing the workers by the management?

Mr. COLLEY. Yes.

Senator WAGNER. That is what I want to know.

Mr. COLLEY. Well, there is nothing wrong about that that we can find.

Senator WAGNER. All right, I am just asking you the fact; I am not characterizing it as either right or wrong. I am just asking you the fact whether that is so or not.

Under your plan which you have, the workers under your constitution cannot vote for an outside person or organization to represent them?

Mr. COLLEY. Oh, yes.

Senator WAGNER. Can they?

Mr. COLLEY. Yes.

Senator WAGNER. They have the right?

Mr. COLLEY. They have the right. It is not written in there, but I have told them at the general meetings, at the last meeting.

Senator WAGNER. Is that your constitution?

Mr. COLLEY. This is.

Senator WAGNER. May I see that?

Mr. COLLEY. At the last general meeting we had, at the election in December of last year, I told them at that time that it was up to them to decide to take that clause out of there, and they did not want it taken out, and they said, "This is our form of collective bargaining—leave it in." And I made it plain to them at that time, if those men wanted to vote for Mike Tighe we could not stop them; we could not stop him from being elected, and we would have to seat them; that section 7(a) is also in there, and that any man that they would vote for would have to be seated regardless of whether he was a member there or not. Of course, the bylaws, there, or the rules, are specific that a man should be an employee for 1 year, but we are not holding them to that.

Senator WAGNER. That is, however, what the constitution provides?

Mr. COLLEY. That is what the constitution says. It is within the power of this body to change it, but they have not changed it, and I have told them that it should be changed, but they seemed to think not.

Senator WAGNER. Does not the management have to agree to a change?

Mr. COLLEY. Certainly. We have got to deal with them.

Senator WAGNER. I mean, before you can make this change.

Mr. COLLEY. No, no; they have got nothing to do with that.

Senator WAGNER. They have not? You have a provision in here that your present plan shall remain in effect during the term of the National Industrial Recovery Act, "and thereafter may be terminated by the management or by a majority of the employees upon 3 months' notice"; is that right?

Mr. COLLEY. That is right.

Senator WAGNER. So that when the National Recovery Act terminates, your organization terminates; is that right?

Mr. COLLEY. No. No; we raised that question with the management before ever we came. There was some question by the men on the committee in regard to that one clause. Now, we have had this form of employee representation in our plants since the American Rolling Mill took them over, and the American Rolling Mill Co. has carried employee representatives since 1904, and we have reason to believe that they will continue to carry them after that.

Senator WAGNER. Mr. Witness, these outside considerations do not interest me for the moment. I am thinking of the constitution which binds your organization. I am asking you a very simple question, and you can answer it either "yes" or "no." Is it true that under the constitution under which you are operating provides as I have indicated? I will read it, that is the simplest way, so that we will both be right.

Mr. COLLEY. I know what is in there, there is no use reading it, and we all know it is there.

Senator WAGNER. All right. Then it is only for the period of the National Recovery Act?

Mr. COLLEY. What led you to believe, Senator Wagner, that at the termination of the N. R. A., if the company has not served notice on us, that as soon as that is done you are done with us?

Senator WAGNER. I am just reading:

> This plan shall remain in effect during the term of the National Industrial Recovery Act and thereafter may be terminated either by the management or by a majority of the employees upon 3 months' notice to the other.

Mr. COLLEY. That is right.

Senator WAGNER. So that if the management wants to terminate this plan they can upon 3 months' notice after the Recovery Act terminates.

Mr. COLLEY. That is right.

Senator WAGNER. That is, after June 16, 1935.

Mr. COLLEY. I understand what you mean. Assuming that they do terminate it, we have got 64 men there, and if the company wants to terminate it we can go ahead and reorganize and go out on our own and collect dues among the men and form our own independent union. There is nothing to stop us from doing that.

Senator WAGNER. But what I wanted to bring out, if you do not mind, was that your organization exists really at the will of the company, of the management. Am I wrong about that?

Mr. COLLEY. Well, they encouraged us to have it, from the time they took over the plant, and they want employee representation. We do not deny that.

Senator WAGNER. Exactly. That is what I wanted to have you state.

Mr. COLLEY. They seem to think that it is the modern method of dealing with men.

Senator WAGNER. Yes.

Mr. COLLEY. They have the right to have the man's viewpoint.

Senator WAGNER. Yes.

Mr. COLLEY. And as long as they have no objection to dealing with us this way, and we are satisfied with this plan, why not go on?

Senator WAGNER. I understand; I have heard you say that, of course, but it was suggested by the company, and did the company draft this constitution?

Mr. COLLEY. No.

Senator WAGNER. Who drafted it?

Mr. COLLEY. We, the employees, drafted that. Now, maybe all of that is patterned after the old constitution, but the way we got about to draft that was when the men all got together, they decided to let every man in the mill have a part in it, and they put up a box in the clock house. Any man that had any suggestions whatever in the plant put his suggestions in that box, and we got together and picked them out and went over them, and picked out what we thought would be beneficial to our organization, and those that were not, it was voted on to cast them in the discard, and the plan was given to every employee for 6 months before he was asked to vote whether it was all right or whether it was not.

Senator WAGNER. Where did he vote? In the plant?

Mr. COLLEY. He did, by a secret vote, Senator.

Senator WAGNER. Let me ask you why, if you wanted to have an effective organization to represent the workers, why did you put a provision in your own constitution that the management might dissolve your organization at any time?

Mr. COLLEY. I do not quite see the point in asking that question, Senator. I have always been raised to believe that we ought to give the other man the same rights that we ask for ourselves, and that is the particular reason for having that in there.

Senator WAGNER. You mean it is your view that the management should have control over the workers' organization?

Mr. COLLEY. Oh, no; no.

Senator WAGNER. But do they not, under this constitution?

Mr. COLLEY. Certainly they have it under that constitution.

Senator WAGNER. Do they decide whether you can continue or not?

Mr. COLLEY. But we have there the right to remove that.

Senator WAGNER. I know you have, but suppose you wanted to continue it?

Mr. COLLEY. All right, we will continue it.

Senator WAGNER. No; the management will say to you, "No; we choose to terminate it."

Mr. COLLEY. Well, we can still continue it. We can force it.

Senator WAGNER. You can?

Mr. COLLEY. What is there to stop us from forcing it?

Senator WAGNER. That is all right. How are you going to force it?

Mr. COLLEY. We can go clean through an arbitration, and if we can do nothing there, we can stop. We have every bit as much power as any other organization.

Senator WAGNER. All right, that is fine. Tell me what provision of the bill here destroys your organization?

Mr. COLLEY. It is sort of confusing, Senator. You know I am only a working man, not an attorney, and maybe I misunderstand some of these clauses.

Senator WAGNER. Did you draft this statement you made?

Mr. COLLEY. Yes; that one I just read?

Senator WAGNER. Well, you are a very intelligent person, because that is a very able paper.

Mr. COLLEY. Now, the men particularly raised this question, when we raised this matter of our closed shop. Now, maybe I am wrong in looking at this section. This is section 8, paragraphs 3 and 4. As we read it, as we workingmen understand it—now, I may be wrong—it definitely gives the majority of the men in the plant, 51 percent of the men in the plant who belong to an outside organization, or as you call it "labor union", the right to close that shop; if the management will agree to it, the 49 percent of us would be in that, on those recommendations, and we would fall by their decision.

Senator WAGNER. Well, do you not think the management can do that today, if they want to?

Mr. COLLEY. Not very well.

Senator WAGNER. Have you not a closed shop, in a way, here; I mean, certainly so far as representation is concerned? You are limited under this constitution to those who are employed by the management. You do not permit an outsider to represent the workers, under your constitution?

Mr. COLLEY. No; any outsider can represent us at all that can get in there and get votes, and there is nothing to stop him, but they have never made any effort to do that.

Senator WAGNER. What State are you from?

Mr. COLLEY. Pennsylvania.

Senator WAGNER. In Pennsylvania closed shops are legal, are they not?

Mr. COLLEY. That is right.

Senator WAGNER. Therefore under the Pennsylvania statute today your management can make an agreement with the majority of your workers now for a closed shop?

Mr. COLLEY. Well, we think that a little encouragement on the part of the National Government would bring about a lot more labor organizers into our group, to try to do the same thing as was repeated in 1919. We see no sense in it.

Senator WAGNER. They cannot do anything here except by a majority of your workers, the men that elected you, voting upon it.

Mr. COLLEY. Right.

Senator WAGNER. Therefore, you have majority rule now in your plant?

Mr. COLLEY. That is right.

Senator WAGNER. You represent the majority?

Mr. COLLEY. That is right.

Senator WAGNER. Now, there is not anything there that cannot be done today in your State, because the management must first agree to it. In effect, it is a limitation, and then it must be agreed to by a majority of your workers. Today, in your State, your management could enter into a closed-shop agreement without the consent of the majority of your workers. This is a greater protection than you have today in the law, because now, before that closed-shop agreement can be forced upon you, a majority of the men you represent must agree to it, in addition to the management, which is not the case now in Pennsylvania, because the management can agree with one leader, with you, for a closed shop.

Mr. COLLEY. Well, that may all be true.

Senator WAGNER. So that this is restrictive. This is in favor of the workers, so that it cannot be imposed upon them except a majority agree to it; and it protects the employer, because there is no closed shop unless he says yes.

Mr. COLLEY. All right.

Senator WAGNER. It is an absolute agreement.

Mr. COLLEY. Could I ask you a question, Senator?

Senator WAGNER. Yes.

Mr. COLLEY. Well, if this is such a good piece of cake, why is it that in your definitions, here, we do not want to hand it out to the civil-service workers and the railway labor men?

Senator WAGNER. I will give you an answer to that.

Mr. COLLEY. I would like to have it.

Senator WAGNER. I will give you an answer.

Mr. COLLEY. Just the reason, if you know.

Senator WAGNER. Will you wait a minute?

Mr. COLLEY. Yes, sir.

Senator WAGNER. I will give you an answer.

Mr. COLLEY. All right.

Senator WAGNER. And I think it will convince you. Do you know why we exclude the railway employees?

Mr. COLLEY. Well, I would like to know, Senator, because these men are asking me.

Senator WAGNER. Because they have got this very bill that I am trying to pass to protect other workers. The Railway Labor Act that we passed last year by a unanimous vote of both Houses, has exactly the protection against the domination of the workers that we have in this bill, almost word for word; and the reason we excluded it is because they had protection already.

Now, does that answer your question?

Mr. COLLEY. Well, in a way; yes.

Senator WAGNER. Well, in the way I have said.

Mr. COLLEY. Then why not eliminate it from this bill, because, in a way, this is excluded, because the men right away see they are excluded. If this is taken out, it is the same thing they have, as you say, that we already have.

Senator WAGNER. The representatives of the railway workers have come here favoring this legislation, but the reason that they are not included here is because they have already got the protection that I am seeking to give to other workers, simply that they may be free men.

Mr. COLLEY. Then I do not see why you should have even put that in there. Why do you not bring them under this clause and be done with it?

Senator WAGNER. Because they have got it already, word for word. They have got this very thing.

Mr. COLLEY. I still cannot see it.

Senator WAGNER. Well, of course, if you cannot see it, I cannot do anything about it.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you think, Senator Wagner, that a closed-shop agreement that exists now, where there has not been a vote of the majority of the employees, would be dissolved by the passage of this act?

Senator WAGNER. I do not think so. If it is legal in the States, it would not be dissolved.

The CHAIRMAN. I thought that this provision we had been discussing provided the method for establishing closed shops, where a majority of the employees and where the employer decided to do it.

Senator WAGNER. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. But I did not understand that it prevented an employer, where only a few of his employees wanted a closed shop, from making such an agreement.

Senator WAGNER. Well, so far as this legislation is effective, it protects the workers in that the closed-shop agreement cannot be made unless the majority of the workers agree to it; but so far as agreements now in existence are concerned, there is no legislation we can pass to impair the application of those contracts.

Mr. COLLEY. Well, what is the minority group of the workers going to do if this legislation passes?

Senator WAGNER. They approve this legislation. I mean, that is the answer. Let them take care of themselves. They feel that this is for their protection, so they are for it, and I do not think they would care to have you represent them very much.

Mr. COLLEY. Well, we have been in existence there for a long time, and there is no labor trouble. There are no union men there.

Senator WAGNER. All right. Now, what I ask you is what particular provision of this bill in any way is going to abolish your organization?

Mr. COLLEY. I have pointed out to you. As I told you before, I am not an attorney; I cannot get all this out. I read it.

Senator WAGNER. Who told you that it would destroy your organization?

Mr. COLLEY. The body of men we gathered together.

Senator WAGNER. How?

Mr. COLLEY. The body of men that I represent, 63, and they all expressed their viewpoints. I am only conveying to you the viewpoint of those men.

Senator WAGNER. That is all right, and I admire you for it, but have I not a right to know?

Mr. COLLEY. Sure you have a right to know.

Senator WAGNER. Have I not a right to know what particular provision it is in this bill that is going to destroy your organization?

Mr. COLLEY. Well, we will assume that we call this "unit", this term of "units." I do not know where it is in here. I do not have it marked.

Senator WAGNER. In the event of an election?

Mr. COLLEY. In the event of an election.

Senator WAGNER. The Board could determine.

Mr. COLLEY. It gives the Labor Board the power to determine what a "unit" is. Now, we have got a representation of 3 men out of 28 in our transportation department. Maybe we do not understand this the way it is written here [reading]:

> The Board shall decide whether in order to effectuate the policy of this act the unit appropriate for the purpose of collective bargaining shall be the employer unit, craft unit, plant unit, or other unit.

We may be wrong, but the way we have termed that now is that if one of these men out of that unit that we have now decided to call on the Labor Board, the Labor Board will grant a vote or just do anything they can to carry on, and then one branch of our company will be under a union.

All right—every day somebody comes along with some little petty thing and writes in to the Labor Board, and we have another vote the next day, and maybe the next week another vote, until you would be tired of it.

Senator WAGNER. As a matter of fact it does not happen that way.

Mr. COLLEY. There is nothing to stop it from happening.

Senator WAGNER. How is that?

Mr. COLLEY. I do not think there is anything to stop it from happening.

Senator WAGNER. The Labor Board has had the power of election, so far, that has been denied the workers, or at least the management has refused to permit elections to be held in some instances.

Mr. COLLEY. I understand that that has happened in some of the plants, but it has never happened at our plant. I am expressing the viewpoint of the men at our plant.

Mr. WAGNER. Exactly. Now, somebody must decide. Supposing there is a dispute; supposing that among your men there is a dispute now as to who represents them—an illegitimate dispute, I am speaking of—so that an election must be held to determine as to who the workers want to represent them. As it usually happens, the management says, "These men that say they represent the workers do not represent the workers. We deny that they represent a majority of the workers." Then you have got a stalemate in the negotiation unless you ascertain in some way who represents the workers; so what you do then is, you have an election, an open, fair, square election, free from domination by any employer or any other influence of any kind which has an economic pressure, the loss of a job, you know—that is always a great handle to have—"your job goes if you do not do what I say."

Then we have an election to decide who represents the workers. How is the election to be held? Somebody must decide whether the workers in all three plants vote as one, or whether each plant votes separately, or whether there are different crafts which do not relate to one another, where the workers in one craft do not know the problems of the workers in the other craft. In that case it may be stated, "Let those crafts of the workers in the particular craft vote for their representative and then they meet the workers."

Somebody must decide it, and that is given as a governmental function to decide. In your case undoubtedly in the first place, as you say, there is no question about who represents the workers, because you say you have had an election. That has determined the question.

Mr. COLLEY. They can have an election every month, themselves, if they want to, according to their bylaws.

Senator WAGNER. Oh, no. Well, now, exactly—then, there is nothing here to interfere with that. This is only where there is a dispute as to who does represent the workers. How else can you determine it except by an election, if there is a dispute?

Mr. COLLEY. No other way.

Senator WAGNER. Well, that is all there is to this.

Mr. COLLEY. Well, still and all, I am objecting to your bill, Senator.

Senator WAGNER. You want to stick to your story?

Mr. COLLEY. I am sticking to my story.

Senator WAGNER. That is it.

Mr. COLLEY. And I moderated it considerably from what they asked me to do. They said, "Throw the bill out as a whole", and I said, "I am not man enough to go down there and debate with Senator Wagner", so I cut it down as much as I could.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Caldwell.

STATEMENT OF ROBERT T. CALDWELL, ATTORNEY FOR THE AMERICAN ROLLING MILL CO.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Caldwell, do you represent the management?

Mr. CALDWELL. I am attorney for the company.

The CHAIRMAN. And these men are the employees? Would you like to be heard?

Mr. CALDWELL. Briefly.

The CHAIRMAN. Your full name is Robert T. Caldwell?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And you are an attorney for the management of the American Rolling Mill Co., in the Butler plant, at Butler, Pa?

Mr. CALDWELL. Not in the Butler plant, but for the company generally.

The CHAIRMAN. For the company generally?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. How many plants has the company?

Mr. CALDWELL. The company has plants at Ashland, Ky., Butler Pa., Middletown, Ohio, Zanesville, Ohio, and has recently acquired what I understand to be a controlling interest in a small plant at Kansas City. I am not positive whether that is a part of the corporation or controlled by the corporation.

The CHAIRMAN. You desire to call our attention to certain features of this bill?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You may do so.

Mr. CALDWELL. I would like if permitted to supplement some of the information that the employee representatives who have just been heard have put in the record. As stated by the gentleman who preceded me, this company had operated under a representation plan for a number of years. The Ashland plant, which is in my home town, was purchased by the Rolling Mill Co. in 1921. It was a steel plant that had failed, the precipitating cause of its failure being a protracted strike in a labor controversy, and following their purchase of the Ashland plant the employee representation plan which was in effect in its previous plants was also put into effect in Ashland.

When the Butler plant was purchased, I think in 1926, the status was, as Mr. Colley has told you, when the Recovery Act went into effect in 1933, all these plants were operating under the employee representation plan, which was then in existence, but as it had not been officially adopted in a manner which might have been considered complying with section 7 (a) the question was raised as to a formal adoption of it as a means of collective bargaining complying with the act of Congress, which had become a law; so before undertaking to adopt a plan in that manner it was discussed by the employee representatives then in office with representatives of the management and with the men, whether the plan as it then existed was adequate to comply with section 7 (a).

To permit the men to determine that for themselves, a "yes" and "no" vote by secret ballot was then taken in every plant upon the question, "Do you consider the present employee representation plan satisfactory to operate under the provision of section 7 (a)?" I think that was the language of the ballot, but at least that was the substance, and the men conducted an election themselves on the question that I have stated, and reported to the management what the result of the vote was.

They reported that 60 percent of our employees considered that plan as it then stood as inadequate to comply with N. R. A., and 40 percent considered that it was adequate. Then the plan was revised in the manner stated by Mr. Colley, who told you how the men went about making suggestions for changes, but when the plan was revised as he has stated, the employee representatives who were holding over from the previous year's election, requested that the new plan as revised by them be submitted to a secret ballot, "yes" and "no" voting, to see whether the employees desired to accept it, and that election was conducted by the men, and the results reported to our company. They reported that 93 percent of the employees working for the plants on the day of the election voted on whether or not to adopt this present plan, a copy of which has been handed to Senator Wagner, and reported that of the 93 percent of the employees voting by secret ballot, 90 percent favored adopting it as a means of representation under 7 (a), 10 percent of those voting, in the aggregate, opposed adopting it, and pursuant to that vote the plan has been in operation and the representatives have been elected under it.

Without reviewing the details of it which have been discussed by the Senator and Mr. Colley, I wish to call attention to one point, that while these men are representatives of the employees, having been elected by secret ballot for 1-year terms, there is a provision in the plan that permits the employee desiring to do so to be represented otherwise than through these representatives. It is not a compulsory majority-rule plan for that reason.

Turning to page 14 of the plan, section 8, entitled "Procedure for Adjustments", it says:

> Any matter which in the opinion of any employee or employees—which would include any minority group—

> requires adjustment, and which such employee has not been able to adjust with his foreman or supervisor, may be taken up either in person or through any employee representative of his department.

So that under the plan of those employees who desire to permit the representatives to negotiate for them, do so, but the minority is not compelled to proceed in that manner, and in active operation of the plan, both methods have been observed. Individual employees and groups of employees have come outside the representatives and negotiated direct in certain instances.

The last election which was held under this plan and for which I have the figures shows that in December 1934 our elections, being held in that month, there were in the Ashland, Butler, Middletown, and Zanesville plants, in the general offices, a total of 7,939 employees eligible to vote. No officer or foreman or supervisory employee is permitted to vote, and on the day of the election, of those 7,939 men on the pay roll entitled to vote, 719 were not at the plant during the 3 shifts that the polls were kept open, so that there were present at the plant during the 3 shifts on election day, 1934, 7,220 employees entitled to vote. Of that number, 7,159, or 98.7 percent came to the polls which were being conducted by their fellow employees and voted in the election of these representatives.

The plan in substance provides that the employee representatives groups meet themselves to discuss the matters which they consider necessary to be considered, at any time, and when those groups meet no representative of the management is present. Of the group which represent three turns, the men who are on turn and thereby would lose time by meeting, their time continues and they are paid. The men who are not on turn and do not lose actual wages are not paid.

The joint meetings are held monthly unless special meetings are requested more frequently, and at those joint meetings these representatives present any matter that they desire.

I have the records here for the Ashland division, showing the proceedings of this representative plan during the fiscal year ending July 1, 1934. I am advised by representatives of the general management present that the aggregate results for the other plants are practically the same as these, the variation is slight. I have a table. I desire first to file this table showing the result of this election.

The CHAIRMAN. That may be done.

(The table presented by Mr. Caldwell is as follows:)

Report on election of employee representatives, December 1934

[Prepared by Personal Service Staff Jan. 3, 1935]

Division	Number of employees eligible	Number of ballots cast	Percent of employees eligible to vote	Number of good ballots	Number of defective ballots	Number of blank ballots	Number of employees eligible who were absent	Percent employees eligible and present who voted
Ashland	2,462	2,231	90.6	2,212	14	5	185	97.8
Butler	1,531	1,386	90.5	1,376	0	10	145	99.3
Middletown	3,013	2,801	93.0	2,783	14	4	197	99.3
Zanesville	687	509	74.1	492	3	14	178	97.2
General office	246	232	94.3	232	0	0	14	100.0
Total	7,939	7,159	90.2	----------	31	33	719	98.7

Mr. CALDWELL. This second tabulation is entitled "Operation of Employee Representation Plan for Fiscal Year Ending July 1, 1934, Ashland Division." Total requests presented to management by employee representatives, 1,128. Requests granted by management, 1,050 or 93.5 percent. Requests refused by management, 31, or 3 percent. Requests compromised, 7. Requests withdrawn, 15. Requests pending July 1, 25; total, 1,128.

Subdivided as to the nature of their requests, those involving safety, including methods and equipment, 600; working conditions other than safety, 218; wages, 91; discharges and reemployments, 34; miscellaneous, including medical, sanitation, association, and others, 185; total, 1,128.

The committee will observe that out of 91 requests for wage increases, 218 requests for improvements in working conditions, 34 requests for reinstatement of discharged employees, or a total of something over 300 questions involving those usually resulting in labor trouble, they, along with the other requests aggregating 1,100, involved only 31 refusals. The figures I am quoting here are for the Ashland plant, but they are in line with the request of the country.

The text of the bill, which has been the subject of some discussion with the previous witnesses, contains some points of which I would like not so much to express an opinion but to ask of the committee information, because it may be that I and other attorneys representing employers misunderstand some of the potentialities of this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Wagner or the members of the committee will be pleased to answer any questions.

Mr. CALDWELL. The understanding is prevalent among lawyers of the country that the theory is being proceeded on in Federal legislation of this kind that where a statute contains in the body some provision which may excite question as to its constitutionality or as to its legality, that the declaration of policy set forth in the title of the bill or in the preamble to the bill is given consideration by the courts construing it. Is that correct, Senator Wagner?

Senator WAGNER. Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL. Then I take it that section 1 of this bill, entitled "Declaration of Policy," is to be given the greatest weight in construing what can be done under the particular sections. That is true, is it?

In the second section of the declaration of policy the following is stated:

> It is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States to remove obstructions to the free flow of commerce and to provide for the general welfare by encouraging the practice of collective bargaining, and by protecting the exercise by the worker of full freedom of association, self-organization, and recognition of representatives of his own choosing, for the purpose of negotiating the terms and conditions of his employment or other mutual aid or protection.

Do I correctly understand that that language speaks for itself and that the purpose of the bill is to give the employee, in selecting his representatives, full, absolute freedom of choice? Does that protect him against any form of coercion?

I pass the question. I simply would like to put it in the record.

Senator WAGNER. It gives him absolute freedom from economic coercion from his employer, because this is really not the affair of the employer.

Mr. CALDWELL. Then the language quoted in the preamble is actually more restricted than it reads, is that correct?

The CHAIRMAN. You mean broader than it reads?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. You mean broader than the bill itself?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. In other words, you think the language in the preamble would indicate that the purpose of the bill was to prevent any interference with freedom of choice on the part of fellow employee as well as employer?

Mr. CALDWELL. I take it, Senator, that to grant a man full freedom to do something, he must not be coerced by anyone. I think that is the logical interpretation of that language, but I do not want to delay the hearing. I simply raised the question.

The CHAIRMAN. You would think that the words "freedom of association and self-organization and designation of representatives of their own choosing" with full freedom should be modified in view of the later language in the bill, by the words, "by his employer"? You do not favor that?

Mr. CALDWELL. No.

The CHAIRMAN. But in fact you think that language would embrace objections and interference with his full freedom by employees?

Mr. CALDWELL. I think that the title is correct insofar as my opinion might be of any value, and that every employee is entitled to full freedom in the selection of his representatives primarily because section 7 (a) says so in the act of Congress, and I think this act ought to say so, and ought to so provide.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course, the bill does not make it an unfair practice to be interfered with or coerced by an employer.

Mr. CALDWELL. The body of the bill? The technical occasion for raising that question, Senator—I believe all the gentlemen present are lawyers—is this, that in the so-called "Shurtleff case", decided by the Supreme Court——

Senator WAGNER. In what case?

Mr. CALDWELL. Shurtleff against the United States, President McKinley, under an act creating the Board of Appraisers, and which said that the President may remove an appointee from that Board for specified causes, neglect of duty, inefficiency, or malfeasance in office—I think those are the ones—removed Mr. Shurtleff without cause, and on his suit for reinstatement the court held that constitutionally the fact that those causes were specified in the bill did not exclude other causes not specified, and that he might remove him without complying with those particular causes.

Now, applying that to this bill you specially provide in the body that an employer must not coerce, but you do not provide that a union can coerce, just as you do not provide that the President could not remove without cause.

Senator WAGNER. Coerce whom?

Mr. CALDWELL. The employee in the selection of his representatives.

Senator WAGNER. One employee coercing another employee, is that what you have in mind?

Mr. CALDWELL. I think, Senator, that you perhaps did not follow my previous sentence.

Senator WAGNER. I did not; I am sorry.

Mr. CALDWELL. But what I mean is this: I am raising here a technical legal question.

Senator WAGNER. Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL. But I take this place to raise it, that there is a legal possibility that if the preamble to your act declares a policy and says a man must have full freedom of choice, and then in the body of the bill you enumerate one class of coercion that you save him from expressly—that is, employer coercion—but say nothing about coercion by third parties, and say nothing to modify that bill to apply to everything, you might have a legal question here as to whether it would not be the duty of the Board to enforce compliance with the title in administering the act and grant him full freedom. Now, that is a question that does arise under those decisions, but that could be taken care of by amendment.

Now, the next question that occurs to me is this: This is at least understood by the public to be a bill to regulate labor disputes, which implies a dispute between an employer and his employees.

The CHAIRMAN. No; the purpose of this bill, if I may state it, Senator Wagner——

Senator WAGNER. Yes, surely.

The CHAIRMAN. Is to provide the machinery for freedom of action on the part of the employees to arrive at a stage for collective bargaining with their employers. It does not enter the domain of collective bargaining. It does say that certain acts upon the part of the employer which would prevent the organization of a union or non-union among the employees or the interference with the individual in selecting what kind of an organization he wants to become a member of, or interferes with his voting, is an unfair practice, in all those steps that employees may choose to take leading up to the point of arranging for collective bargaining with their employer.

Mr. CALDWELL. Thank you; and in order that I may be perfectly clear in understanding the Senator, section 9 of Definitions says that a "labor dispute" of which the Board may have jurisdiction may arise "regardless of whether the disputants stand in the proximate relation of employer and employee." That is on page 4, lines 19 and 20 of the bill.

The question I was raising, Senator, was that, as I understand that bill, the disputants who can invoke the action of this Labor Board do not have to stand in the relation of employer and employee; so that if in a particular company's plant not a single employee of the company wanted to have a controversy with that employer, and not a single employee in that plant protested any action to be taken, an outside agitator—if you may call him such—or third party—it sounds better—can go to that employer without the consent or procurement of any employee he has, make a demand upon him, be refused, and go to the Board and say, "I have a dispute with this company." Is that the correct effect of that section?

The CHAIRMAN. That subject matter gave us a great deal of trouble last year—the very question you have raised. Let me ask you first a question: Does the phrase "labor dispute" appear in any other part of the bill except arbitration provisions?

Mr. CALDWELL. I would not like to answer that off-hand, Senator. I would like to check back.

The CHAIRMAN. That is voluntary. If it appeared under the provisions of the bill dealing with unfair practices, I agree with you that it would be unfortunate and improper for some outsider, some busybody, some social worker in the town, to claim that sanitary conditions were not proper in the factory and be able to make a complaint and call this Board's attention to conditions that were satisfactory to the employees but were not satisfactory to outsiders. Of course, it does not seem that a sensible board would pay much attention to such complaints, but anyway I think the point is well made that provisions should be made to limit the issuing and making of complaints in labor disputes to persons who are connected with the plant. I think that is also Senator Wagner's view of it.

Senator WAGNER. I will not agree to that limitation. You are restricting the workers' rights there.

The CHAIRMAN. Except if the employees are members of a national union, I suppose Senator Wagner would claim the right of officers of the national union who were outside of the employees to to make that complaint; but such an organization as we have had before us today—you certainly would not want this bill to reach the stage where an officer of a national—of the Amalgamated Union, or the American Federation of Labor, or the Trainmen's Union, or the Bricklayers' Union could make a complaint.

Mr. CALDWELL. If they have no members in the plant.

Senator WAGNER. Well, of course, if their complaint is unfounded, the Board will soon ascertain that fact, and that will be the end of it, but to restrict this I do not believe is proper. This is not a new principle. The Norris-LaGuardia Act has exactly this same provision in it; and if you eliminate that you are going to put in the very thing which some of the employers have put into the constitution, that you cannot select anybody to represent the worker except somebody that is employed there.

The CHAIRMAN. We are not talking about that now. We are talking about lodging complaints. Am I correct, Mr. Caldwell?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. We are talking about who shall lodge complaints.

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, I have an industry, and I have employees. Now, you are raising the question of whether this language permits some outsider in the community—some minister or some other person or some woman's organization, or some labor organization, other other than the one in the establishment—can lodge a complaint.

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes; if no employee in the plant participates. That is my limitation. I said, of course, that if even a very small group of men in the plant belongs to a labor union or have another connection, they have the right to make a complaint, regardless of how few they are, if they have a controversy with the employer, and the Board would certainly be entitled to hear the few as well as the many; but the question I am raising under this language is that whether—no employee being dissatisfied, no employee complaining—whether a third party could come in and say "I will create a controversy in this plant, whether there is one here or not."

Senator WAGNER. Of course, it comes back to the old question which is at the bottom of it. I do not say this of your representative plan, but of most representative plans, that you want to retain the economic advantage which you have—where an employee has any complaint to make, he is at once discharged, and rather than lose his job he is not going to make a complaint. Now, do you want to leave workers of that kind absolutely powerless to belong to an outside organization, and there is an individual who may lodge that complaint without running the risk. The complaint may be well founded, without the individual running the risk of being notified the next day that his job is at an end.

Now, as a matter of being practical, at least, we are conjuring up a lot of situations that never arise actually because the Labor Board, as any board, would be sensible enough to sense whether or not there was a real basis for the complaint or whether there was not.

The CHAIRMAN. Just a moment. There is a provision in this bill that any one employee who is discharged for belonging to a labor organization——

Mr. CALDWELL. I was just going to quote that.

The CHAIRMAN. Has a grievance, and can accuse his employer of an unfair labor practice. Now, the point you make is whether that man himself could make that complaint, or some of his fellow employees, rather than an outsider; that he should not go down to his clergyman or to the owner of the drug store to write the complaint for him; it must be somebody in the plant; an employee must make the complaint. That is it?

Mr. CALDWELL. Now, I am approaching this primarily, Senator Wagner, from the standpoint of orderly and lawful administration of an act of Congress.

Senator WAGNER. That is what I want. I will go the limit with you.

Mr. CALDWELL. As a lawyer, I do not think we can ignore all established principles of procedure. There is no reason why this bill should go off on a tangent from the established procedure that we people in America are used to; and I cannot see how, where parties have no controversy themselves and neither party wants to litigate, why a third party should be legally authorized to come in and make them litigate, which is the effect of that provision.

Senator WAGNER. You are raising the whole question of secondary boycott. I am very glad, as far as I am concerned, to have your views on that.

Mr. CALDWELL. I am appreciating the information that I am receiving.

Now, section 8, defining unfair labor practice by the employer, correlates with section 10, for the definition of unfair labor practices; so that from the procedural standpoint the Board, under section 10, can hear a complaint, and make a finding of fact that this particular employer has been guilty of the unfair labor practices enumerated in section 8, and make certain orders, upon which its finding may be appealed to the circuit court of appeals; but on reaching the circuit court of appeals its finding of fact is final and not reviewable, basing my inquiry on the Supreme Court's decisions construing the Interstate Commerce Act and the Federal Trade Commission Act, from which these procedural sections are practically copied. You gentlemen are familiar with the limitations on review; but substantially, even though the Board does not follow the weight of the evidence, even though the Supreme Court, as it has said in some cases reviewing those commissions—

We think this decision is wrong; we have no power to reverse an administrative agency except to see whether they proceeded according to the rules, whether they went through the form of a hearing, and not the merit of the decision.

So that that is decided, Senator Wagner, on the Interstate Commerce Act, in the case of Illinois Central against the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Union Pacific against the Interstate Commerce Commission, and is decided with reference to the Federal Trade Commission, in the Eastman Kodak case and others with which you are familiar; so that I take it that the appealing employer here will have no more chance of a review than the appealing respondents in those cases, because the language under which he appeals is the same; and if so, then any decision that this Board makes is binding on the courts so far as the facts are concerned, regardless of unfairness; so that the danger then lies in the fact that if the administrative board, who are subject to no review by the courts as to their findings of facts and orders pursuant to those findings, should make what otherwise might be considered an unfair decision, the person affected would have no recourse.

Now, bearing that in mind, I ask the Senator to read with me section 8 as to "unfair labor practices."

It shall be an unfair labor practice for an employee—

(1) To interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in section 7.

This, I take it, is the "company union" section, if there is one——

To dominate——

Senator WAGNER. Of course, you use the words "company union." I used the expression "company-dominated unions." There are a number of unions, company unions, that are perfectly legitimate. I know some of them that are perfectly legitimate—some of them—and who genuinely represent the workers, but you know a great many that do not.

Mr. CALDWELL. We flatter ourselves that we have one at our company, but others might be different——

(2) To dominate or interfere with the formation or administration of any labor organization—— which would conclude a representative plan, of course——

or contribute financial or other suport to it——

stopping in the reading of the section at that point. The words "financial or other support" would include even moral support. It would include doing anything that enabled the plan to function. Now, these plans that have been described to you here today provided that the company pay these men in some instances for their time in attending meetings, whether they were on turn or not. Others provided that they paid them, and ours provides when they meet, even though they are not meeting with the management—and the most effective meetings that these men have are those that are not with the management—so that under that section the words "material support" would render unlawful every plan that has appeared before the Board this morning, every group of employees that came here this morning and testified to facts which would enable this Board to outlaw those plans as they now exist.

Now, in addition, the words "other support" than material necessarily means moral support of any kind, so that, Senator Wagner, this is the thing I fear will interfere with the employee representation plans, that if the Board, who can say that a fact is a fact and cannot be reviewed in saying so, considers that your company is rendering moral support to a representation plan, even though it not be financial support, they can order you to dissolve that plan and you have no appeal.

I think that that language is entirely too broad, coupled with the unreviewable fact-finding power of the commission, and I think it will be a fruitful source of controversy between the Board and the parties affected.

Senator WAGNER. You think it is a little indefinite?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes, sir. I think it should be made more specific. I am not saying it could not be made properly specific, and I credit entire frankness, Senator Wagner, to your statement that the bill is not intended to outlaw a proper company union.

Senator WAGNER. Not if it is the will of the workers.

Mr. CALDWELL. So that you and I are not necessarily at odds on the purpose of it.

Senator WAGNER. No.

Mr. CALDWELL. But I do believe that that language is too broad, coupled with the language of section 10, and should be amended.

Senator WAGNER. I was interested, however, in your statement in which you said that under the plans, if you stopped these contributions to the workers, to pay them even in addition to actual time lost, that the plan itself will crumble?

Mr. CALDWELL. No; I did not use that statement.

Senator WAGNER. Well, not "crumble"——

Mr. CALDWELL. No, sir.

Senator WAGNER. But you said it would be "outlawed."

Mr. CALDWELL. Well, whatever I said then, I will say now that as those plans stand today they do not comply with this section, do they?

Senator WAGNER. No; not on the financial support only.

Mr. CALDWELL. Then am I correct in saying that if they do not comply with this section, the present plant could be enjoined by this Board?

Senator WAGNER. If it is simply modified so as to limit the contributions by the management to the organization?

Mr. CALDWELL. Do you not think then that in an important matter like this, to all these workmen and companies, that if the proper jurisdiction of the Board is to modify a plan instead of abolishing it, that your law ought to say so?

Senator WAGNER. Well, personally you approve of all of these financial contributions by employers to employees? Perhaps I should not ask that. I withdraw the question.

Mr. CALDWELL. Senator, if I may be permitted to make a remark that is not facetious, I am attempting to attend strictly to my own business, representing my own company, and whatever I say about the practices of my company in no sense implies a reflection on the practices of other gentlemen in other companies. I state it as a fact that our company had adopted that policy of not paying the employee representatives who were not on turn. I do not imply that to pay them would in any sense be subject to criticism.

The CHAIRMAN. Will you let us have your suggestions as to an amendment that would change that language and restrict it?

Mr. CALDWELL. Might I have the opportunity after leaving the stand?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly; at any time.

Mr. CALDWELL. I will hurry through, Senators. This question of minority rule and closed shop is a matter that I, as an attorney, should not presume to speak on. You have before you here the men and the employers, and I think that is hardly proper for me to go into.

Senator WAGNER. Before you get away from that section, of course, there is this provision, that an employer shall not be prohibited from so permitting the employees to confer with him during working hours without loss of time or pay.

Mr. CALDWELL. That is, with him, Senator?

Senator WAGNER. How is that?

Mr. CALDWELL. That would not permit them to meet alone? The words "with him" prevent the men from meeting alone.

Senator WAGNER. You think there ought to be included the provision that if he confers with either employer or employee——

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes, sir: in the discharge of his duties as a representative, of course, because in most of these plants I think it is a fact—in our own I know it is a fact—that the actual procedure is that the employee representatives meet alone, sometimes, frequently because they come to the management with a considered proposal, and this language would prevent them from conferring with each other as they should do before they undertake to present a plan to the employer. I think in the interests of the efficiency of operation it should be permitted.

Senator WAGNER. I did not say I was agreeing with it; but I was wondering what it was you were suggesting ought to be added there.

Mr. CALDWELL. I think the words " with him ", which limit the allowance of time to a conference in which the management participated should extend to any conference that that employee holds with either the management or the men whom he represents, because he has to confer with those whom he represents before he can intelligently approach the management.

The CHAIRMAN. That difficulty could be corrected.

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. By inserting, after the words " with him ", " or by themselves as representatives of the employees during working hours without loss of time or pay."

Mr. CALDWELL. Any appropriate language, Senator, would reach my objection.

The CHAIRMAN. I think that point is well made.

Mr. CALDWELL. Hurrying on, Senator, to section 9 (c)——

Senator WAGNER. Mr. Caldwell, before you get away from this—you do not mind my interrupting you, do you?

Mr. CALDWELL. No, sir; I appreciate it.

Senator WAGNER. This court-review proposition, of course, you recognize that in all of the public-utility laws of the States there is a similar provision—that is, that the facts found by the commission are binding upon the court, and also the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Federal Trade Commission, and now the communications bill which we passed last year, have identical provisions—that so far as the facts are concerned they are binding upon the court—but that does not prevent the court from an examination of the evidence; and if the court finds that there is no evidence to sustain the conclusions of the particular commission they still can set it aside.

Mr. CALDWELL. That is true, and I am not questioning either the legality or the propriety of those provisions, because you have to make some provision that will make for administrative efficiency in the transaction of the Government's business, but I say, Senator, that in view of the fact that those provisions did not permit the court to review the administrative commission's finding of fact, then the jurisdiction of that unreviewable commission ought to be definitely fixed; and in the Federal Trade Commission, if you recall, there is a specific authorization of the Federal Trade Commission to prohibit unfair trade practices. There is no indefinite situation, as in section 8. In the Interstate Commerce Commission, they have the authority that is provided in that statute, with which you are familiar, including reparations, and in that connection also there appears to be a question of constitutionality involved in this section. The Interstate Commerce Commission can give relief other than reparations upon a finding of fact which cannot be reviewed by the court. The Federal Trade Commission can enjoin unfair trade practices upon a finding of fact which cannot be reviewed by the court, but when the Interstate Commerce Commission grants a reparation the law provides that that finding is prima facie only and may be reviewed in the courts, because the seventh amendment to the Federal Constitution forbids the recovery of damages without trial, so that in the Supreme Court case which passed on that point they held there that where reparation is ordered by the Commission there must be a de novo trial in a constitutional court because of the seventh amendment to the Constitution, and in the Interstate Commerce Commission reparations are obtained by trial in court, and the Federal Trade Commission makes no reparation, but in this bill this Labor Board, which is a statutory commission, is attempted to be invested with the power to make reparations. That, I think is wholly unconstitutional under those decisions.

In subsection (c) of section 9 it is provided here that the board, whenever it considers an occasion justifies it, may order an election, but if that election is held by the board there is no provision for how long the thing determined by that election shall continue. Now, ordinarily when a law provides that something shall be done it says how long that status shall remain when it is done, and it seems, both as a lawyer and from the practical standpoint, that for the board's protection and the men's protection and the company's protection, that when you have an election it ought to settle something, and it ought to be provided that for some specified time that election shall remain in effect because otherwise the losing group who have been there will come back maybe next week or next month and want the board to have another election because they think they can win it, and I think from the standpoint of orderly procedure and from relieving the board from a situation of that kind, that when the board does hold an election it ought to settle something for some time.

Senator WAGNER. Have you got something in mind?

Mr. CALDWELL. Most of the employee plans and most of the union contracts are by the year, are they not, Senator?

Senator WAGNER. Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL. Are not the contracts with the mine workers by the year, and the steel workers?

Senator WAGNER. They were for five years, I think, the mine workers, but I think the last one was for one year only.

Mr. CALDWELL. That is my understanding.

Senator WAGNER. But you are right about it; the general rule is a year.

Mr. CALDWELL. Taking that as indicative of what is proper from the business standpoint, I think that when the board settles something by election it ought to be just like these union contracts; it is for a specific time.

Another thing there that I question is that the board may permit the employees to select their representatives by a secret ballot but does not have to grant them that privilege. I believe, gentlemen, that the only fair way for an employee to select his representatives without coercion is to do it by ballot, because any election held publicly, just as Senator Wagner called Mr. Colley's attention, the employee knows he is voting, the union knows he is voting, and if it is public they know how he voted. I do not think that is fair to the men. I think the Government elections ought to give the men the right of voting by secret election the same as any other election.

Senator WAGNER. The elections which the Government has held always have been by secret ballot.

Mr. CALDWELL. And I think the law should perpetuate that practice.

Senator WAGNER. There was one conducted under my supervision, among the United Mine Workers, in which 15,000 workers voted without a single disturbance. That was a fine record.

Mr. CALDWELL. And that was by secret ballot.

Senator WAGNER. Absolutely.

Mr. CALDWELL. And does the Senator agree with me that the secret ballot is the right thing for the workers?

Senator WAGNER. Yes; absolutely.

Mr. CALDWELL. Well, then, it ought to be in the law.

In the prevention of unfair labor practices, section 10 (c), from the procedural standpoint in which I am particularly interested as an attorney, the law provides that your hearings may be had anywhere in the United States, and this law provides, unlike the previous so-called "Wagner bills", that the hearing may be had anywhere in the United States about 3 days' notice, and makes no provision for continuance, and does not require reasonable notice.

Now, I answer in advance of your comment, Senator, that the Board is not going to be unreasonable, but where you are imposing powers which you give this Board, you ought to limit them in an orderly fashion, and I think that the same provision that exists in the Interstate Commerce Act for reasonable notice, or the provision in the Federal Trade Commission Act, which requires 30 days' notice, which is of course reasonable, should be followed, that you should not permit anybody to put a man on trial anywhere in the United States on 30 days' notice.

Senator WAGNER. Mr. Caldwell, could you think of this side of it? My experience has been, my very brief experience in actually attempting to compose industrial differences, that the quicker you intercede the more likely you are to compose the differences, and that if you delay it for 30 days, particularly if there is a strike imminent, gradually this hatred grows, and at the end of 30 days you have such feeling on both sides that you have a much more difficult task than if you had handled the thing expeditiously, and prevent terrific waste, which all strikes are.

Mr. CALDWELL. I am not advocating the Federal Trade Commission's 30-day rule. I do believe, however, that the law should provide reasonable notice, because in the first instance under the Constitution due process of law would provide that, and certainly there should be no objection to giving a man that which you know he is entitled to under the Constitution. The other thing that troubled me is this, in that same paragraph, in those acts that I have been discussing, which proceed somewhat similar to this, they provide that anyone who wishes to may intervene in the proceedings. Now, by intervening, the legal effect of that is that if you come into proceeding and introduce proof you subject yourself to the jurisdiction of the party before whom you are appearing and offering proof, so that having admitted you into the proceeding, allowed you to intervene, allowed you to introduce witnesses, you should necessarily subject yourself to the jurisdiction of the body before whom you have proceeded.

Now, those acts provide that a third party can intervene. That has a legal significance, but this act would provide that in the discretion of the member, agent, or agency conducted the hearing, or the Board, any other person may be allowed to appear in such proceedings to present testimony. They are not required to intervene, and therefore are not bound by the order, and therefore most lawyers who are familiar with the provision would object on purely legal grounds to permitting a person to have the advantage of coming into a trial, offering evidence by witnesses, and still not subjecting himself to the jurisdiction of the court or the body before whom he was appearing. So I think there that the provision of the Federal Trade Commission Act, that any third party who desires to intervene in the hearing should do so, but he should not be permitted the privileges of the court and the right to introduce testimony unless he is willing to intervene and subject himself to the jurisdiction of the Board, according to the judgment rendered on the evidence which he has introduced.

The next subsection that I would like to ask the committee's opinion on, (d), is this:

Subsection (c) provides that you shall notify the parties, and they appear and have a hearing, and in that hearing others have to come.

Now, as section (d) reads, this might happen, after this hearing under section (c) was over.

> The testimony taken by such member, agent, or agency, or the Board, shall be reduced to writing and filed with the Board. Thereafter, in its discretion, the Board may itself take further testimony and/or hear argument.

Now, that does not entitle either party to notice or presence at the taking of that further testimony by the Board, and of course from a constitutional standpoint the objection to that is obvious. There should be no testimony taken by the Board except upon notice to both parties, in the presence of both parties, or an opportunity to be present, and that language does not guarantee an opportunity to be heard.

The same section provides, there, that after hearing the evidence the Board may order the party to cease and desist from such unfair labor practice, and to take such affirmative action, including restitution, as will effectuate the policies of this act. The provision for restitution I consider unconstitutional for the reasons stated, and the provision that in addition to a jurisdiction to do a specific thing, you may require them to do anything else that you want them to do that you think is in accordance with the purpose of the act, is so vague and indefinite that, judging by previous court decisions as to statutes being void for indefiniteness, I am not sure that that section is specific enough. I think that the thing that the Board can do should in some degree be definite so that man who does not want to violate the law will be advised.

Senator WAGNER. It deals only with unfair labor practices.

Mr. CALDWELL. I think, there, though, that the relief that you may administer is indefinite. In other words, you can tell him to desist from an unfair labor practice. That is specific and clearly constitutional, and that is your jurisdiction under the first section, but it says in addition, after telling him to desist from an unfair labor practice, you may tell him to take such affirmative action as the Board may think proper. Well, now, that takes in the universe, the Board can tell him to do anything. They can tell him to desist from this unfair practice, and in addition to take such affirmative action as the Board thinks will effectuate the act. I think that is entirely too indefinite and very dangerous.

Then one other question and I am through. And one of the practical problems that is confronting lawyers for employers considering this bill is, who are subject to it. In other words, no company wants to violate a law it is subject to, nor do they want to submit to a law that they are not subject to and have no connection with, and the definition of subsection (8), apparently limiting the jurisdiction of the Board, is as follows:

> The term "affecting commerce" means in commerce, or burdening or affecting commerce, or obstructing the free flow of commerce, or having led or tending to lead to a labor dispute that might burden or affect commerce or obstruct the free flow of commerce.

Judging by the decisions of the Supreme Court to date, like the Bedford Stone Cutters case, the Coronado Mining case, the Herkett & Meisel case, and the others with which you gentlemen are familiar, that definition of the Board's jurisdiction under a Federal act, things that might happen, which if it did happen might affect interstate commerce, and thereby bring it under the commerce clause of the Constitution, appears to me to be beyond the scope of any Supreme Court decision to this time, up to this date, and will certainly cause the jurisdiction of the Board to be challenged in a number of cases. During the last week I heard Mr. Richberg testifying before the Finance Committee, in which he stated—quoting him substantially—that one of the difficulties that the N. R. A. has encountered in administration was the uncertainty of its jurisdiction, that certain employers claimed they were not under the act, Congress had no power to regulate them, and as I understood his testimony he thought that there should be a definite rule laid down by which the Government and the party affected could determine with some certainty whether your business in your plant is under the act or whether it is not. Well, under this definition where you have one speculation or possibility pyramided on another speculation or possibility, how is an employer who wants to obey the law, if he is under it, and does not want to concede the jurisdiction of the Board if he is not under it—how is he going to determine in a doubtful case whether his company is under it, except with a lawsuit?

Senator WAGNER. I think that you and I would agree that a condition which may lead, unless something is done at once to alleviate it, to an industrial warfare, would to the extent of that industrial warfare interfere with interstate commerce or tend at least to dry up the wells of commerce. That is something that has been asserted by the court in several cases, that it does not have to be an actuality in interstate commerce, as you know. I mean, I do not think you and I have a difference on that.

Mr. CALDWELL. I doubt if we could extend this record by the technical discussion of the law question, but I would answer you this way, Senator, that necessarily these employers and the attorneys advising them have to rely upon specific decisions of the Supreme Court as closely as they can. That is the only way that we can know what the law is, and rather than discuss an abstract theory I would have to refer to the specific cases in point and try to follow them. Now, under the Herkett & Meisel case, for example, just without imposing too much on your time, in that plant there was a strike, and that prevented the plant from making trunks. Ninety percent of their trunks were shipped out of Missouri when they were made, and the strike to the extent of 90 percent of their business directly stopped that flow of interstate commerce, but the Supreme Court held that even that did not come within the commerce clause of the Constitution. In the Coronado Mine case, that you recall, district 21 in Arkansas had a strike that tied up a number of coal mines, and they held there that that did not come within the commerce clause, although the effect of that strike was to stop the product of several mines.

Then, in the Bedford Stone Cutters case, on the other side, where they did hold that the commerce clause applied, there was no strike between the men in Colorado who were objecting to using this stone, but there was a controversy between the stonecutters and the plant in Indiana that would not join the union, and the purpose of the strike, the purpose of the controversy there, the boycott, not a strike, was to prevent the employers of these men from buying in interstate commerce that uncut stone.

If you will read the Bedford Stone Cutters decision, the Herkett & Meisel case, and the Coronado case, the thing is clear as I understand it, that a controversy in a plant which prevents the manufacture of goods in that plant or the running of coal in that mine, is not within the commerce law, but a conspiracy and boycott, the direct purpose of which is to restrain interstate commerce, is within the commerce clause.

Now, this is going to be applied to people like Herkett & Meisel and the Coronado Mining Co. It is going to be applied to controversies in their plant which stop their mining or manufacture, and answering your question, I cannot agree that under those decisions, either of them, or any decision that I know of, has gone as far as this definition.

Senator WAGNER. Of course, the courts in all of these cases where they are called upon to construe a statute passed by Congress, as reported, relied a good deal upon the declaration of the facts which Congress has found as the basis for the legislation. I do not know of a single case—perhaps you do—where a Congressional act was set aside as being unauthorized under the Interstate Commerce clause, where Congress in its declaration of policy has found the particular acts prohibited would, if not prohibited, affect or burden interstate commerce, so that the declaration of Congress is very persuasive as to whether the matter does affect interstate commerce.

Mr. CALDWELL. Has Congress, prior to the last 2 years, undertaken to take in the territory that you are taking in now?

Senator WAGNER. Each time, they take in a little more territory, because our problems are becoming different. We have got to deal with them differently. I think at least our Supreme Court will be persuaded that economic problems cannot very well be dealt with except on a national scale and by some national plan, and that is because of changed economic conditions. We have got to recognize that. We have got to go forward. But am I right about the statement I made?

Mr. CALDWELL. The first statement?

Senator WAGNER. Do you know of any case?

Mr. CALDWELL. I will not undertake to cite one from the chair. I am not absolutely sure that I would agree with you. If I can, I should like to refer to the cases. I cannot cite one at this time.

Senator WAGNER. That is my recollection. I am not sure either, and I know that you are a very good lawyer. I can see that. I thought you might be able to tell me.

Mr. CALDWELL. I do not want to claim more than I know, but in conclusion, gentlemen, while the question of national policy that Senator Wagner has just announced is a matter before you, the employer is simply a business man who is operating under the law as it now is, and he can only at his own risk proceed upon what appears to be the law, and not what he thinks will be the law when the Supreme Court decides differently.

Senator WAGNER. That is correct.

Mr. CALDWELL. And in view of the existing law, under the existing conditions, we think this definition is too broad and goes beyond the scope of interstate commerce as up to this time announced by the Supreme Court, and not as it may be announced in the future, because we do not profess to know what that will be.

Senator WAGNER. Mr. Caldwell, are you acquainted with the Appalachian case? You undoubtedly know the Appalachian case.

Mr. CALDWELL. The Appalachian Coal case?

Senator WAGNER. Yes, sir.

Mr. CALDWELL. I was familiar with it.

Senator WAGNER. If I may ask you a personal question, what would have been your prediction as to how the court would decide that case before it was actually decided by the United States Supreme Court?

Mr. CALDWELL. I would rather you would ask me about the gold-clause case.

Senator WAGNER. I do not want to ask it if it is embarrassing, and yet I think the decision was right. I agree with the decision.

Mr. CALDWELL. As a lawyer, I have always tried to follow the existing cases and form my opinions on them, and not speculate on what the next one will be, and all I could have said in response to that would have been to have told you that I knew of no case before that in which the court went that far. Did you know that?

Senator WAGNER. No; we just moved forward on that.

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes.

Senator WAGNER. That was an economic policy, that was all.

Mr. CALDWELL. I am not questioning the necessity of doing that.

Senator WAGNER. Do you know why the provision was put into this constitution, if you are acquainted at all with it, "This plan shall remain effective only during the National Recovery Act"?

Mr. CALDWELL. Is there such a provision? Will you please cite the page?

Senator WAGNER. I will read it. That will be the better way:

> This plan shall remain in effect during the term of the National Industrial Recovery Act and thereafter may be terminated either by the management or by a majority of the employees upon 3 months' notice to the other.

Mr. CALDWELL. No, sir; I cannot answer why any of these sections were put in here, because the plan was drawn in the manner that has been told you, but if I correctly understand that section it means that the plan must continue so long as the N. R. A. exists.

It is drawn apparently to comply with the N. R. A., and that, after the N. R. A. ceases to exist, if it should cease, that it will go on, as you might call it, a tenancy-at-will, until one side or the other wishes to withdraw. Does that mean that they must abandon it as soon as the N. R. A. is over?

Senator WAGNER. No; but it means the management may dissolve an organization that we are told was organized by the workers themselves for the purpose of bargaining collectively.

Mr. CALDWELL. As I say, I could not tell what was in the minds of the men at the time. I do not know.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you.

Mr. CALDWELL. I would like to be permitted, Senator, to cite some of the cases that I referred to.

The CHAIRMAN. We should be pleased to have any suggestions you choose to send to the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The employees of Jones & Laughlin Steel Corporation. Are you present? Please stand.

The employees of the American Sheet & Tin Plate Co., Vandergrift Works, and the employees of the Carnegie Steel Co., Youngstown district. Will they stand?

Also the Acme Steel Co. employees.

Now, gentlemen, our time is so late, we have consumed so much time with this hearing today that we cannot remain in session longer. If anyone wishes to file a statement with us, we shall be glad to have it. Otherwise, you will have to return tomorrow morning. Which do you prefer to do? You may confer among yourselves.

Mr. HADDEN. Mr. Chairman, as chairman of the employee representatives of the Vandergrift Works of the American Sheet & Tin Plate Co., located at Vandergrift, Pa., we prefer to file our statement with the committee at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. You are Mr. W. B. Hadden, and you are chairman of the employees' representatives, from the organization of representatives?

Mr. HADDEN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And your plant is a subsidiary of the United States Steel Corporation?

Mr. HADDEN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well, sir. File your statement. I understand that represents not only your own views, but the views of those who are here accompanying you, namely, A. W. Craig, Thomas A. Grogan, H. P. Fresch, and William W. Young, all of whom are representatives of employees in this plant?

Mr. HADDEN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. All right. That statement may be filed with the committee.

(Mr. Hadden subsequently withdrew his statement, stating that he desired to present it orally tomorrow morning.)

Mr. HAHT. Mr. Chairman, we desire to return in the morning.

The CHAIRMAN. Your name is Louis E. Haht, general chairman of the employee representatives in the plant of the Acme Steel Co., located where?

Mr. HAHT. Chicago, Ill.

The CHAIRMAN. And accompanying you is Mr. Walter Erxleben, who is chairman of the rules committee of that organization?

Mr. HAHT. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. And you are asking to file a statement with the committee?

Mr. HAHT. We wish to return in the morning, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. You wish to return in the morning? All right. You may do so.

Now, the Carnegie Steel Co. Have you reached a decision? The spokesman is Earl W. Jenkins.

Mr. JENKINS. I wish to return in the morning.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, how about the Jones & Laughlin Steel Corporation?

Mr. WESTLAKE. We prefer to return in the morning.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well. You may do so.

We will adjourn until 10 o'clock tomorrow morning.

(The hour of 5 o'clock having arrived, the committee adjourned until tomorrow, Wednesday, March 27, 1935, at 10 a. m.)

NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 27, 1935

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION AND LABOR,
Washington, D. C.

The committee met, pursuant to adjournment at 10 a. m., in room 318, Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C., Senator David I. Walsh (presiding).

Present: Senator Walsh (chairman).

Also present: Senators Wagner and McCarran.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order.

Will the representatives of the American Sheet & Tin Plate Co. please come forward. Who is the spokesman for this group?

Mr. HADDEN. I am.

The CHAIRMAN. You will all please come forward and be seated.

STATEMENT OF WILLIAM B. HADDEN, REPRESENTING DEPARTMENT EMPLOYEES OF THE VANDERGRIFT WORKS OF THE AMERICAN SHEET & TIN PLATE CO.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Hadden, will you please give your full name for the record?

Mr. HADDEN. My name is William B. Hadden.

The CHAIRMAN. Where do you reside?

Mr. HADDEN. Vandergrift, Pa.

The CHAIRMAN. You are employed in what capacity?

Mr. HADDEN. Crane operator in the open hearth department of the American Sheet & Tin Plate Co.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the name of the particular plant at which you work?

Mr. HADDEN. The Vandergrift Works.

The CHAIRMAN. You were here yesterday?

Mr. HADDEN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You thought you would present your statement for the record without appearing in person yesterday, I believe.

Mr. HADDEN. We did not know how long we would be here.

The CHAIRMAN. And then you decided to present the statement in person today?

Mr. HADDEN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you a statement to make to the committee at this time?

Mr. HADDEN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Who are the others accompanying you? Will you please give their names for the record?

Mr. HADDEN. Harry P. Fresch.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Fresch, are you one of the representatives of the employees' organization at this plant?

Mr. FRESCH. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And what is your name, sir?

Mr. YOUNG. W. W. Young.

The CHAIRMAN. You are one of the representatives of the employees' organization at this plant also?

Mr. YOUNG. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And what is the name of the next gentleman, please?

Mr. GROGON. T. A. Grogon.

The CHAIRMAN. You are also one of the representatives of the employees' association at this plant?

Mr. GROGON. Yes, sir; I am.

The CHAIRMAN. And what is the name of the next gentleman?

Mr. CRAIG. E. W. Craig.

The CHAIRMAN. You are also one of the representatives of this same employees' association?

Mr. CRAIG. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Hadden, how many representatives are there altogether at this plant?

Mr. HADDEN. Approximately 3,200.

The CHAIRMAN. When did you have your last election?

Mr. HADDEN. June 1934.

The CHAIRMAN. How many votes were cast?

Mr. HADDEN. I have the percentage of the employees voting, and it is embodied in my statement.

The CHAIRMAN. You may then proceed with your statement.

Mr. HADDEN. I have been employed at the Vandergrift Works of the American Sheet & Tin Plate Co., Vandergrift, Pa., for 18 years. I am an ingot stripper crane operator in the open hearth department.

In June 1933 I was elected an employee representative from my department and later elected chairman by the representatives and have served in these capacities since that time, being reelected on June 1934. We have 3,200 employees in our plant.

At our last election 90.8 percent voted for representatives, as compared with 82.4 percent at the election in 1933; this shows the growing popularity of the representative plan. Our elections are by secret ballot and the plant is divided into voting districts according to our operating departments, with some smaller departments being combined. The elections are held exclusively under the supervision of the representatives with no interference from the management.

We have had splendid success with our representative plan.

We have discussed and settled with our management approximately 500 requests, and 65 percent have been settled in favor of the employees, and of the remainder 17 percent were not granted and the balance compromised or withdrawn. The representatives have had no complaints from our fellow workmen as to the methods of conducting the elections, and the vast majority are pleased with our collective bargaining results.

As chairman of our representatives, and speaking for them, I want to go on record with your committee as opposed to the Wagner labor relations act. We are opposed to any legislation that would effect the fine cooperation we have with our employers, and we believe this bill would stir up conflict in industry.

While forbidding coercion or intimidation by employers, and rightly so, it offers nothing to prevent labor organizations, their agents, or members exercising these very methods against employees. We resent the authority which would be granted the Board under this act to dictate or interfere in setting up new voting districts or calling for elections at its will. Our plan permits a recall of an unsatisfactory representative by two-thirds of his constituents. Our management has at all times been willing to confer with any individual or group on any subject arising out of their employment, and this privilege would be endangered by the adoption of this bill.

For some time past at our representatives' meetings we have invited fellow employees to attend in order to discuss problems concerning their working conditions and the operating practices with the result that our product is better, and this has resulted in increased business for our plant and better earnings for our employees.

In conclusion as workers we are keenly interested in promoting harmony in our business and increased operations of our plant and can see nothing helpful in the adoption of this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the representatives from the Jones and Laughlin Steel Corporation please come forward and be seated. Who is the spokesman for this group of employees?

Mr. WESTLAKE. I am.

The CHAIRMAN. Will you give your full name for the record?

Mr. WESTLAKE. My full name is William Westlake.

STATEMENT OF WILLIAM WESTLAKE, CHAIRMAN OF EMPLOYEES' REPRESENTATIVE PLAN OF THE JONES & LAUGHLIN STEEL CORPORATION, ALIQUIPPA, PA.

The CHAIRMAN. Where do you reside, Mr. Westlake?

Mr. WESTLAKE. I reside in Aliquippa, Pa.

The CHAIRMAN. You are an employee of what industrial plant?

Mr. WESTLAKE. I am employed by the Jones and Laughlin Steel Corporation.

The CHAIRMAN. In what capacity are you employed?

Mr. WESTLAKE. Bricklayer.

The CHAIRMAN. You are also chairman of the employees' representation organization?

Mr. WESTLAKE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. How long have you been chairman of this organization?

Mr. WESTLAKE. Twenty-one months, during the duration of the organization.

The CHAIRMAN. And these gentlemen here with you are also representatives of that organization?

Mr. WESTLAKE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. May we have their names for the record? What is your name, please?

Mr. ARBUCKLE. James B. Arbuckle.

The CHAIRMAN. You are one of the representatives of the employees?

Mr. ARBUCKLE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And what is your name, please?

Mr. JOHNSON. Samuel I. Johnson.

The CHAIRMAN. You are also a member of the board of representatives of the employees?

Mr. JOHNSON. I am, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And what is the name of this next gentleman?

Mr. GRIMM. F. I. Grimm.

The CHAIRMAN. You are also a representative of the employees?

Mr. GRIMM. Yes, sir; I am.

The CHAIRMAN. And the name of the next gentleman?

Mr. MCCLURG. A. E. McClurg.

The CHAIRMAN. You are also a representative of the employees?

Mr. MCCLURG. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Westlake, how many representatives has your organization?

Mr. WESTLAKE. We have 36.

The CHAIRMAN. How many employees are there in the plant?

Mr. WESTLAKE. Approximately 10,000.

The CHAIRMAN. Does your statement tell how many voted in these elections?

Mr. WESTLAKE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed with your statement.

Mr. WESTLAKE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, my name is William Westlake and I am chairman of employees' representation plan of the Jones and Laughlin Steel Corporation, Aliquippa, Pa. I am employed as a bricklayer and have worked in their plant since December 1909. Our employees' representation plan was inaugurated in June 1933, and I was elected as chairman of that body at that time and in June 1934 I was reelected. I appreciate this opportunity to appear before you and I hope that I may be able to express the sentiments of my fellow workmen who have appointed me to be their spokesman.

At our last election held in June 1934, out of an eligible voting list of 9,540, there were 9,048 votes cast in the primaries and 9,293 in the general eltcion. At the primaries there were 378 blank ballots cast and at the general election, 247 blank ballots. There were 2 votes cast for outside organizations at the primaries and 4 at the general election. Every precaution was taken to insure an honest election and no representative was allowed to serve on the election board in his or her own division.

The representatives have made a splendid record, as the following figures will show—

Disposition of cases:	Percent
Granted, 280	60.2
Explained or compromised, 35	7.5
Denied, 150	32.3

In addition to this number, many cases were settled by the representatives before reaching the management's representative's office. There are 88 unsettled cases now under consideration, making a grand total of 553 cases submitted for consideration during a period of 21 months.

Several months ago the Amalgamated Association filed charges of discrimination and coercion against the Jones & Laughlin Steel Corporation. This case was heard by the National Labor Board,

Judge Stacey presiding. The Board rendered their decision exonerating the Jones & Laughlin Steel Corporation. Not one of the large number of Amalgamated witnesses said a word against our so-called "company union."

One of the cases settled by one of our representatives resulted in an increase of pay involving 8 or 10 motor inspectors, one of whom was the president and another the treasurer of the Aliquippa Lodge of the Amalgamated Association. Up until the present time, neither one of these men has refused to accept the raise in wages.

Our opponents claim that representatives are unable to successfully handle grievances, owing to their inexperience. Under the employees' representation plan, the representatives are chosen to represent the men with whom they work. By daily contact with the men and an inside knowledge of the working conditions in that department, it is my opinion that such a representative is naturally in a better position to successfully handle their problems than an outsider who may be unacquainted with the conditions under which these men work.

I am satisfied that our representatives are doing a good job, even though they are not receiving a fat salary. The only reward they receive is their regular rate of pay when doing work in connection with the plan. While outside organizations are concerned only with rates of pay, working hours and collection of dues, the representative of our plant have not only aided in the adjustment of rates of pay and working hours, they have also settled cases involving sanitation, safety, and working conditions. We have been instrumental in having bus rates and house rents reduced. Would an outside organization consider these matters worthy of their consideration? I do not think so. The harmonious relations existing between the representatives has resulted in convincing their fellow workmen that the organization will grow in effectiveness as the agency for adjusting their grievances.

A local lodge of the Amalgamated was instituted in Aliquippa last year, but their charter has been revoked by President Tighe because of some infraction of the rules. President Tighe sent one of the officers of the Amalgamated to Aliquippa to assist in the organization of a lodge, but he was withdrawn when the Pittsburgh papers published a story showing that he had been guilty of a criminal assault on his 10-year-old stepdaughter. Two weeks ago one of their members was found guilty of felonious assault and battery in the Beaver Court, after he had stabbed one of our employees because he refused to join the Amalgamated. It is not surprising that our workmen have shown their preference to our plan.

The present membership of the Federation of Labor is approximately 3,000,000, which is less than 10 percent of the industrial workers of this country. If, after all their years of existence, they have been able to convince only one-tenth of the workers of the United States that the American Federation of Labor was the most efficient agent for the adjustment of their working problems, would it be fair to pass the Wagner bill and thus give them an unfair advantage? It is for you to decide.

I thank you.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the employee representatives of the Carnegie Steel Co., please come forward?

STATEMENT OF EARL W. JENKINS, CHAIRMAN OF EMPLOYEES REPRESENTATIVES OF CARNEGIE STEEL CO.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Jenkins, you are spokesman for this group?

Mr. JENKINS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The others who accompany you are William Carney, who is a representative?

Mr. JENKINS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And William Mohler who is also a representative of the employees association?

Mr. JENKINS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And also Joseph M. Sanders who is also a representative of this same organization?

Mr. JENKINS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And Earl W. Hall, who is a representative and secretary of the employee association?

Mr. JENKINS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, Mr. Jenkins, in what plant are you employed?

Mr. JENKINS. The Carnegie Steel Co., Youngstown, Ohio.

The CHAIRMAN. That is a subsidiary of the United States Steel Corporation?

Mr. JENKINS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Your particular position is what?

Mr. JENKINS. Railroad brakeman.

The CHAIRMAN. You are chairman of the board of representatives of the employees in their organization in that plant?

Mr. JENKINS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. How many employee representatives are there in the plant?

Mr. JENKINS. Twenty.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you a statement you would like to present to the committee?

Mr. JENKINS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed.

Mr. JENKINS. I have been in the employ of the Carnegie Steel Co. for 24 years. I am now a railroad brakeman in the transportation department, having served as a representative and as general chairman since the inception of the representation plan in June 1933.

In the Youngstown district 82 percent of the employees participated in the election of 1933, and in the election of 1934 the employees gave a vote of confidence in the plan when 91 percent participated.

The employee representatives have never received a request for the withdrawal of any representative as the plan provides for, and each employee has the right to speak for himself or to choose any one to represent him, without any majority dominating him, a right that every workman is entitled to, and the passage of the Wagner bill would certainly take that right away, which would further complicate the harmonious industrial relation which each workman wants.

As soon as an employee feels that he has a grievance he takes it up with his representatives and he in turn with the management, where it is quickly taken care of. In 19 months there has been 308 major cases, and as many more of a minor nature. There have been 65 percent settled in favor of the employees, and there are 6,200 employees in the Youngstown district and 20 representatives. However, this number of representatives will be increased at the next election.

The employees' representative plan has been successful in bringing the employees and the management closer together, and the Wagner bill assumes there is a conflict between the workmen and the management that does not actually exist.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the representatives of the Acme Steel Co. please come forward? Who will be spokesman for this group?

Mr. HAHT. I will, Mr. Chairman.

STATEMENT OF LOUIS E. HAHT, CHAIRMAN OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE EMPLOYEES REPRESENTATIVE PLAN, ACME STEEL CO. CHICAGO, ILL.

The CHAIRMAN. Will you state your full name for the record?

Mr. HAHT. Louis E. Haht.

The CHAIRMAN. You are chairman of the employees' representative plan of the Acme Steel Co.?

Mr. HAHT. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Where is that plant located?

Mr. HAHT. Chicago, Ill.

The CHAIRMAN. Accompanying you is Mr. Walter Erxleben?

Mr. HAHT. He is here.

The CHAIRMAN. He is chairman of the rules committee and one of the representatives?

Mr. HAHT. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed to present your statement, Mr. Haht.

Mr. HAHT. The purpose of the employees' representation plan is to provide a plan of representation which gives an opportunity for employees to have a voice with the management in considering jointly all matters pertaining to industrial relations—to establish a mutually satisfactory way of settling any differences which may arise between employees and management, including wages, shop rules, working conditions, safety, recreation, methods of economy or similar matters; to provide a means of friendly cooperation between employees and management on the basis of mutual confidence and understanding.

This plan of representation does in no way discriminate against any employee because of race, sex, or creed, or conflict with his or her right to belong to or not to belong to any lawful society, fraternity, or organization.

In our last election of candidates for representation, held February 7, 1935, 190 men, which is approximately 20 percent of the eligible votes, submitted their names as possible candidates, showing their willingness to serve as representatives.

The record of our plan during the 13 months that it has been operating is as follows:

CLASSIFICATION AND DISPOSITION OF REQUESTS MADE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Granted in full.—Wages, 9; working conditions, 14; discharges, 2; vacations, none; demotions, none; miscellaneous, none; total of dispositions, 25.

Refused.—Wages, 3; working conditions, 1; discharges, none; vacations, 1; demotions, 1; miscellaneous, none; total of dispositions, 6.

Compromised.—Wages, 3; working conditions, none; discharges, none; vacations, 1; demotions, none; miscellaneous, 1; total of dispositions, 5.

Withdrawn.—Wages, none; working conditions, none; discharges, 1; vacations, none; demotions, none; miscellaneous, none; total of dispositions, 1.

Total of classification.—Wages, 15; working conditions, 15; discharges, 3; vacations, 2; demotions, 1; miscellaneous, 1; total of dispositions, 37.

Dated March 23, 1935.

This record proves that we actually have collective bargaining. At the present time we are receiving from 97 percent to 103 percent of the 1929 wage scale. There is a friendly feeling between the employees and the management.

We feel that if the Wagner labor disputes bill is passed, it would cripple our organization and destroy the good feeling that now exists between the employees and the management.

Under our representation plan the employees can amend its bylaws and have done so, and they can terminate it if they wish.

The CHAIRMAN. How many candidates did you say there were in the last election?

Mr. HAHT. One hundred and ninety.

The CHAIRMAN. How many were to be chosen?

Mr. HAHT. Eleven.

The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed.

Mr. HAHT. We believe the record of our plant since it has been in effect proves we actually have collective bargaining at the present time. We are receiving from 97 to 103 percent of the 1929 wage scale, and there is a friendly feeling between employees and management. We feel if the Wagner wage disputes bill is passed it will cripple our organization and destroy the good feelings that now exist between the employees and the management.

Under our plan the employees can amend their bylaws and have done so, and they can terminate the plan if they wish.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you, Mr. Haht. This closes the testimony from the employees of the various steel companies which have been represented here. I would like to say in this connection that personally I have been very much impressed with the appearance, the sincerity, and intelligence displayed by the men who have represented the employees at these hearings. All of this is aside from the fact we may differ in our views, but I think the committee has been impressed with the intelligent type of American workmen who are capable of appearing before such a committee and stating their views.

Mr. Harriman, if you will please come forward the committee will be glad to hear from you.

STATEMENT OF HENRY I. HARRIMAN, PRESIDENT OF THE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF THE UNITED STATES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

The CHAIRMAN. Will you give your full name for the record?

Mr. HARRIMAN. Henry I. Harriman.

The CHAIRMAN. You are appearing here in what official capacity?

Mr. HARRIMAN. On behalf of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. You are president of that organization?

Mr. HARRIMAN. I am.

The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed, Mr. Harriman.

Mr. HARRIMAN. My statement will be brief, Mr. Chairman.

The bill before you is one of great importance. If enacted in its present form, it will have far-reaching effect and, in my opinion, will increase industrial discord and prolong the depression.

The bill is in many respects similar to the Wagner labor disputes bill of last year. That measure was finally dropped in favor of Public Resolution No. 44, to further effectuate the policy of the National Industrial Recovery Act. Under the provisions of that resolution the President was empowered to establish a board or boards, authorized and directed to investigate issues, facts, practices, or activities of employers or employees in controversies arising under section 7 (a), and such board was further authorized, when in the public interest, to issue orders for election, by secret ballot, of representatives of employees for collective bargaining. That resolution is in effect an amendment to the Industrial Recovery Act, with the basic principles of which I am thoroughly in accord.

My first and primary objection to the proposed bill, Senate 1958, is that it is unnecessary. All needed investigations and orders to insure fair collective bargaining can be made and issued under the powers conferred by last year's resolution.

You are now considering an extension of the National Recovery Act for the remainder of the emergency, and I hope that with certain essential amendments you will pass it. Such an extension of the N. R. A., plus the resolution of last year, will give ample opportunity to further study the problems of industrial self-government without the enactment of the new measure now proposed.

I have very definite objections to some of the provisions in the pending bill, the most important of which I will briefly enumerate.

In section 8 it says,

it shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees, or to interfere with fair collective bargaining.

Why should unfair labor practices be limited to the employer? I grant that the right of collective bargaining without coercion is a proper right of every employee, but he should be free not only from the coercion of his employer but from the coercion of the flying squadron, the racketeer, and others who would interfere with the real independence of the employee in selecting his agent for collective bargaining. My objection is not to the broadness but rather to the narrowness of the definition of an unfair labor practice. I would go much further than the bill goes and protect the employee from all forms of coercion; and whatever the history of the past may have been, I do not believe that for the last year the chief agency of coercion has been the employer.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course, the proponents of this bill make this distinction between coercion on the part of the employer and coercion on the part of the employee. They say that coercion on the part of the employer can be followed up by dismissal, that he has a hidden economic pressure power which he can apply if his coercion does not operate well, while in coercion of one employee against another, or an outsider against the employee, there is no such economic power.

An employer upon whom coercion is about to be exercised knows it will not interfere with his job, will not interfere with his livelihood; it may be uncomfortable to him, but he has a criminal remedy and can have the party who seeks to coerce him arrested and punished under the criminal law.

I thought you might be interested in knowing that distinction that is made, but perhaps you are familiar with it anyway.

Mr. HARRIMAN. I am familiar with it, and there is some force to it, as I shall say later.

I feel, after further experimentation and experience, it may be wise to create a labor court with a labor code, and definite rules binding upon both employers and employees, but I do not think we have quite experience enough for that.

The point you raise, it seems to me, is amply covered by the provisions of the resolution of last year under which we are now operating with reasonable success.

The CHAIRMAN. I was only attempting to give the explanation that the proponents of this bill give for not including as an unfair labor practice coercion on the part of one employee or outsiders against an employer. That coercion is criminal and punishable. The employee has no way of enforcing his coercion through economic pressure, while the employer has.

Mr. HARRIMAN. Even though we grant there may be greater economic pressure from the employer, we all have to admit that in the textile strike last year, for instance, great pressure was exerted in a very unfair way be the flying squadron, and through intimidating forces of other kind.

Now, why not prohibit them both, if you are going to have such a bill? One may be more important than the other, but we do not refuse to consider a law against one kind because there is another one greater. We do not refuse to pass laws against stealing because we do pass laws against murder.

The CHAIRMAN. In other words, it could be contended that certain labor agitation and coercion can amount to economic pressure on the employee who wants to work, by preventing him from working.

Mr. HARRIMAN. To the greatest degree, and the resort to the courts is so tedious, and the disputes are so hard to prove, that it is non-effective until the strike is over.

The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed.

Mr. HARRIMAN. Again I object to the creation of a National Labor Relations Board. If we are to have legislation, let us create a National Labor Relations Court, which hears in orderly fashion disputes between employer and employee, and in relation with such a court let us have a definite labor code, binding both upon employer and employee. The pending bill gives broad powers of investigation without waiting for complaint. That, in my judgment, is a mistake. A court hears complaints and evidence in connection therewith. It is practically impossible for an investigating board to give fair and impartial decisions. There is a function for a judge. There is also a function for a prosecutor, but they should not be united in one person if fair decisions are to be given.

Under the terms of the bill the new board would have power to supersede all of the special boards which have, from time to time, been created by the President in connection with industrial disputes. There is every evidence that these special boards have worked reasonably well, and that they have been particularly skillful in handling the exact matter under consideration. I should dislike to see the automobile board, or the newspaper board, or other special bodies dealing with industrial disputes in particular trades abolished.

The bill endeavors to set up the principle of majority rule, and says, in effect, that if 51 percent of a group of employees vote for certain representatives to deal in collective bargaining, the other 49 percent are thereby disfranchised. That is, in my judgment, un-American and unethical. There is a vast difference between a political right and the right to bargain for work, and they should never be confused. A man should have the right to bargain individually or collectively, as he may chose, and if several agencies are named for collective bargaining, certainly the employer should have the privilege of conferring with all of them. I recognize that eventually one agreement must be reached, but in arriving at a conclusion, there is is no apparent reason why each of the representatives chosen by employees should not have participation in accordance with the degree of his own representation.

I further doubt the propriety of giving to any board the right to determine the unit for collective bargaining. Under this authority the board might create as a unit for collective bargaining the shoe manufacturers of New England and of Missouri as a single unit, and, by a majority vote, force upon one section labor conditions that were not prevalent or desired by that section. In a given industry in a certain city, 60 percent of an industry might have open shop and 40 percent closed shop, or vice versa. There might be a dispute in one group and no dispute in the other. But if all should be combined in a single unit by order of the Labor Board, the range of a dispute might be much widened and conditions forced upon certain employees which they do not desire.

If my theory is correct that when a new labor dispute body is created it should be a court, then its function should be to hear parties to a dispute, and not to create disputes or bring to trial people who are satisfied with existing conditions.

Under the powers of investigation granted in the bill substantially every record of every employer in the United States could be open to the whims of roving investigators. This would be an invasion of personal rights, for which I think there is no constitutional warrant.

I have only touched upon a few of the most important of my objections to the pending bill, and I will not take your time to discuss other and less important features. I feel that we have not as yet had sufficient practical experience to determine whether the Federal Government can legally and should enter into the realm of industrial labor disputes, or whether these matters should be left to the State. Possibly our experience will show that a divided responsibility between these two agencies is wise. Possibly it will demonstrate the wisdom of continuing the policy of the past and of leaving such responsibilities to the States. We are now in a condition of flux. We are learning by actual experience. We should have important court decisions which will clarify many disputed constitutional aspects of the recovery act and its legal authority over productive industry.

If the Supreme Court reverses its decision in Hammer v. Dagenhart and decides that production is a part of commerce and that the Federal authority can regulate the conditions of production, and if our practical experience shall show that such a course is wise, then let us with due care create a labor disputes court with a carefully worked out labor code that will set up principles fair to employer and employee which such courts can adjudicate. Pending such legal decisions and such further experience, I submit that it is unwise to plunge further into the morass of doubtful legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. At this point in the record I have been asked to have presented statement of the Philadelphia Chamber of Commerce.

(The statment is as follows:)

STATEMENT OF THE PHILADELPHIA CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF PHILADELPHIA, PA.

PHILADELPHIA CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
Philadelphia, March 22, 1935.

MR. HENRY I. HARRIMAN,
President, Chamber of Commerce of the U. S. A.,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. HARRIMAN: In connection with the Wagner disputes bill, we telegraphed Senator David I. Walsh asking that a committee of the Philadelphia Chamber of Commerce be heard with the opponents of the bill. However, in his reply he stated that the prolonged hearings last year and other hearings now on important measures would prevent the committee from hearing us separately. He advised that they would be pleased to print brief from us in the records.

* * * * * * *

We would appreciate it, therefore, if you would submit the enclosed statement for the record as coming from the Philadelphia Chamber of Commerce.

Very truly yours,

GEORGE W. ELLIOTT,
General Secretary.

MUTUALITY OF INTEREST

No one can be long and intimately concerned with the problems of relief unemployment, and of reemployment, management, and recovery without regarding sound industrial relations as a cornerstone of sure progress. Under the abnormal stresses and strains put on our system nowadays by sudden economic and political changes, there is no substitute for mutual confidence and understanding between workers and management where they meet, on the job. The welfare of both participants, as well as of the public, is to be promoted by increasing both the fact and the consciousness of that mutuality of interest in the direct, peaceful, and continuous development of the employment relationship in order that it may afford a constantly increasing service to all concerned.

Moreover, the very progress we have made on this basis of free and direct dealing, vouchsafed by our form of government, has made us perhaps the greatest of all industrial nations, but we must remember that in its nature this complicated industrial system is characterized by a degree of interdependence and delicate interadjustment which in the common interest must be maintained. By the same token, preservation and improvement of the system depend upon maintaining therein a degree of flexibility that will accommodate all the varying attitudes, abilities, and capacities of individuals to the economic machine, and correspondingly, the machine to changing conditions. This type and form of political and economic government is the one which we, as a people, chose and hold above all others, and fundamentally it is based upon mutuality of interest and complete freedom of individual choice.

THE FUTILITY OF FORCE

Conversely, this basic mutuality of interest and freedom of individual choice are incompatible with, if they are not destroyed by, any philosophy of human or economic relations which would substitute force for understanding, rigidity for flexibility, revolution for evolution, or compulsion for mediation. Thus, only those laws stay long on our statute books or remain effective which recognize that fundamental popular will or choice which is the source of all democratic sanction. If it is said that, with us, a law is unconstitutional, it is only another way of saying that it is unworkable and inconsistent with those principles of mutual interest and free individual choice upon which our whole structure of self-government is based.

THE WAGNER LABOR DISPUTES BILLS OF 1934–35

Because the Wagner labor disputes bill of 1934 (S. 2926), in our thoughtful opinion, overlooked the aforesaid facts and contained many consequent defects, the Philadelphia Chamber of Commerce opposed it. The reasons for that opposition are contained in the accompanying booklet[1] which is made a part of this statement. Specifically, we opposed that legislation because, in the face of our concepts of sound fundamentals, the bill proposed, among other things:

1. A national labor board with jurisdiction not only almost exclusive of appeal to our established courts, but with totally unprecedented powers in respect to the laws of evidence, the summoning of parties, the requisitioning of records, the holding of plant elections, the trial of causes, and the enforcement of decisions.

2. Placing all and many serious restraints on one party (the employer), thus virtually straitjacketing him, while

3. Placing no restraints upon organized labor while encouraging it to organize without restraint, without regard for its lack of legal or financial responsibility, without regard for the record or competence of its leadership, without regard for the right of individual workers to a free choice, and without regard for the social, economic, or political significance of the overriding monopoly and excesses it would stimulate.

4. Illegalization of the company unit relationship, and where a majority of workers were organized in an outside union, illegalization of direct dealing in any matter of wages, hours, or labor disputes, notwithstanding the basic fact that such relationships, properly and naturally motivated, constitute the very foundation and essence of sound and friendly industrial progress.

For such reasons, the Philadelphia Chamber of Commerce opposed the Wagner labor disputes bill of 1934, and, insofar as they apply to the pending proposal, it reaffirms that opposition now.

A new Wagner bill (S. 1958) is now proposed which, in further violation of what we hold to be sound, acceptable, and workable under our social and economic system, outdoes even its predecessor in certain respects, among which are the following:

1. It would expand the scope and power of the National Labor Relations Board by—

(a) Extending its jurisdiction to all employments (excepting agriculture, domestic service, railroads, governments, families, and curiously, labor organizations) regardless of size or codes, and to all disputes or imminent disputes which may affect interstate commerce, even indirectly.

(b) Making it (the Labor Board) an independent agency in the Executive branch of the Federal Government, and exclusive and supreme over any other means of adjustment or prevention, except that—

(1) United States district courts, solely at the request of the Board, "may institute proceedings to prevent and restrain any unfair practices", and

(2) The circuit court of appeals may impeach the Board's decision but only on the law, not on the evidence, even though such evidence be only rumor or hearsay. Note section 10 (c) which provides "the rules of evidence prevailing in courts of law or equity shall not be controlling."

Nor would an appeal operate as a stay on the Board's order unless specifically ordered by the court.

though they have been secured by the government under assurance of nondisclosure.

"2." In the zeal of its proponents to promote collective bargaining, the bill would establish the principle of majority rule within any unit chosen by the Board; would legalize the closed unit, thus forcing all employees to join the labor organization of the majority or lose their jobs; would extend all rights of collective bargaining to an organized minority group or groups pending the selection of majority representatives—thus acting as a one-way valve for labor organization while corresponding employer rights are significantly omitted. The pending bill further goes out of its way to encourage agitation by recognizing disputants within its jurisdiction or protection, regardless of whether they stand in the proximate relation of employer and employee; and like its 1934 predecessor, it continues to regard as an employee a person who voluntarily and without notice chooses to forfeit that standing by striking.

3. Finally, instead of safeguarding their fundamental rights, the bill goes far to deny to workers and employers alike free choice without coercion from any source; while protecting the right to strike, it completely avoids protecting the peaceful worker's right to work; and in deference to the agitator and racketeer as well as the paid organizer, it carefully ignores the principle that equal responsibility and accountability are prerequisite to fair dealing.

Because the pending Wagner labor disputes bill of 1934 thus identifies itself with a philosophy of arbitrary force, and thereby indicts itself as inconsistent with the basic considerations of free choice, initiative, and fairness which alone make for peaceful and permanent solutions under our system, we hold that it has no place in our system.

COMPULSION V. MEDIATION

With international relations again reminding us of the futility of force, it is at least strange to see brought forward, under high sponsorship, this attempt at compulsion which can only defeat or postpone the industrial peace and prosperity we all so earnestly desire. That both the past and present chairmen of the National Labor Relations Board acknowledge the essential unenforceability in industrial relations of even the degree of judge-made law we now have, only emphasizes our own conviction that the real solution is not to be found in any higher degree of compulsion.

It is a commonplace of regional labor board experience, moreover, that the effectiveness of those boards as mediators waned from the day of the ruling that they should be looked to for binding decisions. And this sag in effectiveness was experienced when the boards are empowered to deal only with the fractional number of cases that are provable under section 7 (a). It therefore seems all too clear that the proposed extension of the Board's compulsory jurisdiction to practically all industrial labor disputes may be expected increasingly to develop demands and crises beyond the power of any such machinery to handle when we consider the present state of our national thought, social organization, and economic condition. Anyone conversant with labor relations knows only too well that, whether weak or strong, no participant to a labor dispute long abides by compulsory outside methods or awards, for such arrangements in their essential character have no natural relation to the job that serves both participants. As for the compulsory bargaining which the bill mainly seeks to achieve, it is, in fact, a flat contradiction of terms. Note the wise observation of the United States Coal Commission of 1923,[2] that compulsion in this field of industrial relations "even though it should by chance bridge over some serious conflicts, would give rise to the almost overwhelming difficulty of obtaining by force effective service from men who do not want to work or effective management from men who do not want to operate."

No! Industrial peace and constructive solutions do not lie up the compulsory road. The farther we try to go in that direction, the more resistance we will encounter, and we will eventually run up against a dead end.

What road, then, shall we take? If the answer is really wanted, we believe it can be found no farther away than in the experience of the Philadelphia Regional Labor Board, whose panel system of mediating those disputes that could not be settled on the job has been repeatedly called one of the great contributions of the country's recent labor experience. The Philadelphia idea was simply this: That sound and lasting solutions are most surely to be found in that community of interest developed by continuing and intimate negotiation in terms of the common job that serves the interests of all concerned.

In other words, we repeat our conviction that under our system there is no substitute for mutual confidence and understanding between workers and management where they meet, on the job, and that this relationship can only be worked out successfully, case by case, with the assistance of a mediating body when agreement otherwise seems impossible.

In contrast, by its own terms, the proposed Wagner bill would only wedge apart the mutual interests of employer and employee at that very point. It would encourage that outside leadership which all too often has no proper relation to or knowledge of the task. It would tend through this artificial organization to substitute conflict for cooperation; and it might confidenly be expected to provoke this result on a scale which would disrupt the operation of the industrial machine, increase unemployment, and so defeat the peace and prosperity that we seek.

In other words, we hold that the pending Wagner bill would undermine the very cornerstone of sound industrial relations by substituting force for free action, rigidity for flexibility, revolution for evolution, and compulsion for mediation. The Philadelphia Chamber of Commerce, therefore, opposes and protests the bill as undesirable, un-American, and unworkable.

The CHAIRMAN. Is Mr. A. L. Viles present; please come forward, Mr. Viles?

Mr. VILES. Mr. Chairman, if we may have your permission, Mr. P. W. Litchfield, president of the Goodyear Tire & Rubber Manufacturing Co., will make the presentation on behalf of the rubber industry and the Rubber Manufacturers Association.

The CHAIRMAN. That may be done.

STATEMENT OF P. W. LITCHFIELD, PRESIDENT OF THE GOODYEAR TIRE & RUBBER CO., AKRON, OHIO, AND REPRESENTING THE RUBBER MANUFACTURERS ASSOCIATION

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Litchfield, your full name is P. W. Litchfield?

Mr. LITCHFIELD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You are appearing before this committee in behalf of the Rubber Manufacturers Association?

Mr. LITCHFIELD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What is your own personal occupation?

Mr. LITCHFIELD. President of the Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co.

The CHAIRMAN. The Rubber Manufacturers Association consists of how many members?

Mr. VILES. Approximately 150.

The CHAIRMAN. They represent the owners of rubber manufacturing plants in all parts of the country?

Mr. VILES. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. And you are presenting their views to this committee, Mr. Litchfield?

Mr. LITCHFIELD. Yes, sir; I am presenting the views of the Rubber Manufacturers Association to this committee.

The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed.

Mr. LITCHFIELD. The rubber industry herewith presents its views concerning the proposals contained in S. 1958. As this statement of views will be confined entirely to a discussion of the principles underlying the provsions of the bill, it is unnecessary to comment upon its detailed provisions.

The premise upon which the bill is constructed seems to presuppose the existence of an unalterable, antagonistic attitude between employer and employee which cannot be changed, compromised, or abated in any manner except through the agency of the Federal Government.

We cannot agree that this premise is sound or that it can be substantiated by actual conditions prevailing in the industries of this country.

The bill also seems to assume the existence of a power which we believe the Federal Government does not possess.

Under the broad provisions of the bill all employer-employee relations, even to the minutest detail, would be placed completely under the jurisdiction of agencies created by the Federal Government, subject to any rules or regulations such agencies might prescribe. We question the authority of the Federal Government to assume jurisdiction over questions of this character. Also, we question the practicability of the proposals even though there were no question concerning the assumption of jurisdiction by the Government.

Purely from the standpoint of practicality alone, we believe that if the Government should attempt to regulate through the agencies proposed and through the issuance of inflexible rules and regulations, followed by judicial decisions, all the varied questions of employer-employee relations that constantly arise, the results would inevitably be a confused and chaotic situation in such relations in all types and sizes of establishments that would be unprecedented in the industrial history of the country.

A law such as proposed would be welcomed by irresponsible persons who would seize the opportunity, under the law's provisions, to parade as responsible representatives of labor and foment discord between employers and employees for their own benefit and profit, with consequent damage to the public interest.

The bill seems to be based entirely upon a number of assumptions which do not have a foundation in fact. The primary ones are discussed below:

1. The provisions of the bill seem to assume the existence of an eternal conflict between employers and employees. Because of the suppositions upon which it appears to be based it logically follows that the bill would restrict the normal relationships existing between employers and employees which have been evolved through experience and constant development during many years and which are so essential for the maintenance of peace in industry. As a substitute for the present relations, the bill would open the door for agitators who would be afforded an opportunity of using the suggested powers of the Federal Government to give color to the asserted existence of situations requiring correction which, in a majority of cases, are in fact nonexistent.

2. The bill presupposes that better working conditions for employees would result from its enactment, otherwise it would not be offered for adoption. We disagree with such an assumption because the bill is in no way designed to create better working conditions, not will it control or eliminate the activities of the irresponsible professional agitator.

3. The bill provides for "collective bargaining" as it has come to be ordinarily understood through attempted definition by law. The most desirable relationship between employer and employee should not be on the basis of this form of collective bargaining, but rather on a cooperative basis, which can and has been worked out on the basis of mutual understanding between countless thousands of employers and employees in this country because both parties have been jointly interested in the welfare of the enterprise in which they are mutually engaged. No law can become a substitute for such mutually satisfactory relationships.

4. The bill seems to presuppose that the majority of employers are exploiting labor, or will do so whenever they are afforded such an opportunity. The actual conditions existing in industry as a whole do not substantiate such suppositions and present-day conditions in industry do not require the enactment of the suggested legislation that would place employer-employee relations in a straight-jacket.

5. The principles embodied in this bill seem to assume that the majority of employees desire their relationship with employers to be based upon conflict, instead of on cooperation.

This is not true of the majority of employees, but on the contrary, there is sufficient evidence to indicate that the vast majority of employees wish to continue the present friendly, cooperative relationship with employers through the various existing voluntary organizations, and that they are not seeking the aid of the Federal Government to establish new agencies to supersede the present ones for purposes of regulating relationships and agreements with employers. The rubber-tire manufacturing industry is operating on a higher average hourly rate than are most other industries. It has been operating on an 8-hour maximum work day for more than 15 years. These results were obtained by the close cooperation of employers and employees and not with the assistance of organized labor, or Federal Government supervision.

6. The bill is very specific as to the rights of dissatisfied employees and specifically prohibits employers from engaging in unfair labor practices, as defined. No thought has apparently been given to the rights of employers, or to their employees who may be dissociated from a particular complaint, or to the protection of employers and employees against the coercive or other unfair practices of other employees with whom they may be temporarily in disagreement.

We submit that, in all fairness an employee who desires to work should be protected in the exercise of that right without restraint, and an employer's right to conduct his business free from improper restraint or coercion should be adequately protected.

We urge the adoption of a report disapproving this measure.

The CHAIRMAN. I have a request signed by T. V. Conway and W. E. Ogren, representing the Association of Employees Long Lines Department, American Telephone & Telegraph Co., the communication reading as follows:

> We represent a group of people who desire to submit testimony before your committee in regard to the proposed National Labor Relations Act, and respectfully request that our names be placed on the calendar in order that we may be heard as opponents of the bill.

Are Mr. Conway and Mr. Ogren present?

Mr. CONWAY. Yes; we are present.

STATEMENTS OF T. V. CONWAY AND W. E. OGREN, REPRESENTING ASSOCIATION OF EMPLOYEES, LONG LINES DEPARTMENT, AMERICAN TELEPHONE & TELEGRAPH CO.

The CHAIRMAN. Where do you gentlemen live?

Mr. CONWAY. I live in Toledo, Ohio.

Mr. OGREN. I live in Chicago.

The CHAIRMAN. You have come all of the way here to appear here before this committee without having your names on the calendar.

Mr. CONWAY. Yes; we have.

The CHAIRMAN. Which one of you will speak?

Mr. CONWAY. I will speak, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. I believe you say you reside in Toledo, Ohio?

Mr. CONWAY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What is your occupation?

Mr. CONWAY. I am an employee of the American Telephone & Telegraph Co. in the plant department.

The CHAIRMAN. What position do you hold, Mr. Ogren?

Mr. OGREN. I am in the traffic department.

The CHAIRMAN. Of the American Telephone & Telegraph Co.?

Mr. OGREN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Do either of you represent any organization or association of employees?

Mr. OGREN. We represent an association of employees.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there an organization among the employees of the American Telephone & Telegraph Co.?

Mr. OGREN. In the long lines department of that company there is an association.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the department both of you gentlemen represent?

Mr. CONWAY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What kind of an organization is it?

Mr. CONWAY. It is an association of employees. The title is, Association of Employees, Long Lines Department, American Telephone & Telegraph Co.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you local units, or is it only a Nation-wide organization?

Mr. CONWAY. It is a Nation-wide organization wherever the company has offices. We have over 200 branches.

The CHAIRMAN. One of you gentlemen represent the Toledo branch and the other represents the Chicago branch?

Mr. CONWAY. I am here as chairman of the general executive board of the association of the employees, that being the highest body in our organization.

The CHAIRMAN. You represent all of these local units of the organization through the general board?

Mr. CONWAY. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. Of which you are chairman?

Mr. CONWAY. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. The other gentlemen is secretary?

Mr. OGREN. I am a member of the board.

The CHAIRMAN. How many members are there on the board?

Mr. CONWAY. There are eight members on the general executive board, which is the highest body.

The CHAIRMAN. How are you selected?

Mr. CONWAY. We are selected step by step, the organization starting at the bottom with the branches which connect to the higher bodies, termed the "district board" and the district board in turn elects divisional council, and so on to the top of the organization.

The CHAIRMAN. How many members are there in the entire organization?

Mr. CONWAY. Approximately 10,000.

The CHAIRMAN. And you have about 200 units?

Mr. CONWAY. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. Has the organization a constitution and bylaws?

Mr. CONWAY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What, briefly, do they provide for?

Mr. CONWAY. They provide the form of the organization and the methods of holding elections and designate the various bodies in the organization.

The CHAIRMAN. Do the members in the local unions pay dues?

Mr. CONWAY. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. How are they inducted into membership?

Mr. CONWAY. After they become employees of the American Telephone & Telegraph Co. in the long-lines department, if they so desire they may become members of this organization.

The CHAIRMAN. By filling out an application or just by participating in elections?

Mr. CONWAY. By filling out an application.

The CHAIRMAN. And that is passed upon by the officers of the local union?

Mr. CONWAY. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. And that makes them eligible to participate in elections?

Mr. CONWAY. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you have elections in the local unions?

Mr. CONWAY. There are elections in the local unions.

The CHAIRMAN. How often?

Mr. CONWAY. Once a year.

The CHAIRMAN. How long has this form of organization been in existence?

Mr. CONWAY. For 15 years; since 1919.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the voting in the elections secret?

Mr. CONWAY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Do the men have meeting places and quarters?

Mr. CONWAY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Where are they?

Mr. CONWAY. The meeting places and quarters in the local branches are in the buildings where we are employed usually; although if we wish to meet outside we can make arrangements to meet in other quarters.

The CHAIRMAN. But the practice has been to meet in the company quarters?

Mr. CONWAY. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. Do any of the officers or representatives of the employees, in any stage in their official position, receive any compensation from the American Telephone & Telegraph Co. or any of its subsidiaries?

Mr. CONWAY. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. How are you paid for the time and attention you give to this work?

Mr. CONWAY. No deductions are made from my regular salary while I am on association work.

The CHAIRMAN. That is true of the men in the local unions also?

Mr. CONWAY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Do they meet during working hours or at night?

Mr. CONWAY. Sometimes during working hours and sometimes at night, in accordance with whatever time the executive committee of the local body may call the meeting.

The CHAIRMAN. When they meet at night are they paid?

Mr. CONWAY. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Only when they are meeting during their own working hours for the purpose of this organization are they given any pay, and that is the amount they would have received if they were working?

Mr. CONWAY. That is correct; no deduction is made from salary if they meet during working hours.

The CHAIRMAN. Do your employers contribute in any other way or manner to your organization?

Mr. CONWAY. We negotiate—and when I say "we", I mean the hired body of our organization—with the management once each year on a budget. We negotiate for the amount of expenses we will need during the coming year, and after that budget has been negotiated the administration of the funds is vested entirely in the association of employees.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the budget for last year?

Mr. CONWAY. Last year the expenses ran approximately $72,000.

The CHAIRMAN. For the whole association?

Mr. CONWAY. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. Was that paid for by the company?

Mr. CONWAY. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. Was that paid in one lump sum to your treasury?

Mr. CONWAY. No; it was vouchered by the employees incurring the expenses, and the administration of the vouchering of these funds is in the hands of the chairmen of the various bodies.

The CHAIRMAN. That is a rather large sum of money; what was it used for?

Mr. CONWAY. Traveling expenses, expenses of meetings in the 200 branches, running the local branches, the hotel bills, and secretarial expense. We maintain a large secretarial headquarters in New York.

The CHAIRMAN. Where secretaries are hired, stationery used, and information sent out to the different members of the organization throughout the country?

Mr. CONWAY. That is correct. The secretary's office is under the supervision entirely of the organization of employees.

The CHAIRMAN. Could you furnish us a copy of the treasurer's report of the organization?

Mr. CONWAY. I don't know that I have one; but if I haven't it here, I will see it is furnished.

The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed with your statement, Mr. Conway.

Mr. CONWAY. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, we represent an organization of approximately 10,000 employees, known as the Association of Employees, Long Lines Department, American Telephone & Telegraph Co., and have been authorized to propose to this committee a change in paragraph 2, section 8, of the proposed bill, S. 1958.

It is not our desire as an organization of employees to oppose or to discuss any other provisions of this bill. Quite naturally, our individual members have varying opinions concerning each part of the bill; and it would be difficult to ascertain and present a majority opinion concerning each item, and particularly concerning any provision that may have political significance.

Concerning the discussion of the relative merits of company unions versus other unions, it is not our desire to oppose or criticize the so-called "regular union." We may say that the majority of our people believe that those organizations are not only desirable but quite necessary, in a large number of cases, to adequately safeguard labor. We do, however, believe that our organization meets our needs, and we do not wish to see enacted any legislation that would seriously interfere with our method of handling our problems.

We wish to outline the set-up and the history of the functioning of our organization in order to provide the background for our satisfaction with our present plan and to satisfy this committee that we are doing what is expected of a conscientious labor organization, which, as we see it, is to constantly improve our members' standard of living and, in doing so, exercise a real appreciation of our responsibilities affecting our industry and the industrial health and peace of the Nation.

The Association of Employees was formed December 31, 1919, by employee representatives chosen by the employees. Membership in the association has never been a condition of employment nor of participation in our pension and benefit plans.

It has been, from time to time, constitutionally developed and strengthened at our own initiative to more effectively serve the employees.

In order that insofar as possible our dissatisfactions may be settled at their source, our organization closely parallels the management organization. Local branches, our basic unit body, are established in the communities where our employees are located, higher bodies being successively district, division, department, and general boards. Officers are elected by each body.

Representatives are sent from each body to the next higher body, composed of such representatives, and are elected from and by the members of the body being represented. Management people, roughly defined as those having the right to hire and fire, are not permitted membership and may not attend or participate in the elections or business meeting of any bodies.

We have never known or heard of any attempt on the part of the management to influence any election of officers or representatives. We constantly use a provision made for carrying cases progressively to higher bodies when agreements satisfactory to employees are not reached with the management in lower bodies.

There are no restrictions within our own organization as to what type of question we may negotiate with the management nor has the management ever shown any reluctance to negotiate any type of case with us.

Association members are responsible only to the association for their acts in connection with the functioning of the association. Meetings are regularly scheduled, monthly for the branch executive committees and annually and semiannually for the higher bodies. Special meetings are called at the discretion of the association. The officers and representatives are excused without loss of pay to perform their association duties.

The association annually negotiates with the management a budget covering the succeeding year's association expenses and is responsible for the administration of the association's financial expenditures.

We believe that this organization can continue exactly as at present should this bill be passed as proposed with the exception of the proposed paragraph 2 of section 8. It is our conviction, based on our experience, that an employer can financially support an employee organization without violating any of the other provisions of this section. We therefore recommend that paragraph 2 of section 8 of this bill be changed to read as follows:

> To dominate or interfere with the formation or administration of any labor organization or to contribute financial or other material support to it by compensating anyone for services performed in behalf of any labor organization, or by any other means whatsoever, except that it shall not be an unfair labor practice for an employer or anyone acting in his interest to contribute such financial or material support provided that an agreement is made between the employer and the labor organization covering such material support by the employer for a definite period of not less than 1 year subsequent to the date of making the agreement.

We do not believe that the act of financial support has of itself any subversive effect on the functioning of any labor organization or on the members of such an organization. The controlling effect of such support could be brought to bear if the labor organization had to obtain their company's approval for expenditures on each action they desired to take as the need for such action presented itself. With a prior agreement covering expenditures, this controlling effect is eliminated to just the extent the labor organization feels is essential. By this I mean that under the other provisions of the bill and under section 7–A of the National Industrial Recovery Act the employees are free to organize as they choose and if they cannot obtain a financial support agreement suitable to their needs they may organize in any manner they desire.

For 15 years we have handled the problems of our members scattered in groups of various sizes throughout practically the whole of the United States. In this period we have constantly improved our standard of living, have settled our cases peacefully, and have been a real asset to ourselves, to the industry, and to the Nation. We know that we have the necessary ability within ourselves to handle our problems and have the intelligence to decide for ourselves the type of organization we want for collective bargaining. We have no feeling of asking for a paternalistic favor when negotiating our annual expense budget with the management and handle that detail with the same freedom as any other case furthering our interests.

Our record seems to justify, by those responsible for the guidance of our country, a careful consideration before eliminating such organizations as ours from their very evident field of usefulness and we ask a continuation of our right to make for ourselves those decisions affecting us as do those matters covered by this bill.

These statements are in intent and purpose the same as those made on April 4, 1934, by a representative of our organization who appeared before the United States Senate Committee on Education and Labor and submitted a statement of our views regarding the then proposed Wagner Labor Disputes Act, S. 2926.

Senator WAGNER. Under your constitution is a representative of the workers limited to one employed in the telephone company?

Mr. CONWAY. That is correct.

Senator WAGNER. Your workers could not, under the constitution, if they chose to, vote for anybody outside of anyone employed by the company?

Mr. CONWAY. Not as a representative; no.

Senator WAGNER. And your opinion is, that unless you are financed by the employer you cannot continue to exist?

Mr. CONWAY. That is not our opinion. If this bill should go through it is my opinion we would make every effort to form another organization along the same lines, probably self-supporting; that is, necessarily self-supporting if this bill went through.

Senator WAGNER. As I understood you, and I think you are correct in that, that outside of the restrictions of not aiding or supporting financially by the employer, there is nothing to restrict your organization?

Mr. CONWAY. That is correct.

Senator WAGNER. You know my views of workers who are financially supported by the very men they are required to negotiate with for their fellow workers. You gentlemen are representatives of the employees, and your expenses are paid by the company when you travel?

Mr. CONWAY. That is correct; they are a part of the budget we negotiate.

Senator WAGNER. When you travel do you get both your traveling expenses and also your wages?

Mr. CONWAY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there anything further?

Mr. CONWAY. I have nothing further to say, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Dunbar, if you will please come forward, the committee will be glad to hear you.

STATEMENT OF HOWARD W. DUNBAR, WORCESTER, MASS., REPRESENTING THE NORTON CO.

The CHAIRMAN. Your full name is Howard W. Dunbar?

Mr. DUNBAR. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Your residence is Worcester, Mass.?

Mr. DUNBAR. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You are appearing here as the representative of the Norton Co. of Worcester, Mass.?

Mr. DUNBAR. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What is your position with that company?

Mr. DUNBAR. I am manager of the machine division.

The CHAIRMAN. What product does the Norton Co. manufacture?

Mr. DUNBAR. The Norton Co. manufactures various products, but I am only concerned with grinding machinery.

The CHAIRMAN. You have a statement you wish to present to the committee?

Mr. DUNBAR. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed with that statement.

Mr. DUNBAR. I seek to be heard before your committee in opposition to the Wagner labor disputes bill, S. 1958, because I come from an industry whose history reveals the fact that relations between management and men have been cordial, pleasant, and enduring for many years. Through these years we can say we have been free from labor disputes and labor troubles. This condition exists because of the high plans and standards of ethics upon which our business is conducted, and without the intervention of company union, labor union, or any other form of organization. Our relationship with labor is good because we have paid good wages and been fair in our treatment of our men. I am not appearing before your committee to fight labor or the American Federation of Labor.

In our industry there is a fraternal background, due to the skill, refinement, and perfection with which our products are fabricated, which knits together the management and its skilled operators, who face the problems of their industry with steadfastness and determination, borne of the satisfaction which comes from having created something with which to serve industry. For machine tools, after all, are the master tools of industry, upon which the very existence of many other industries depends.

We have successfully adjusted ourselves to the National Recovery Act as reflected through the codes which regulate the conduct of our business today. And therefore the question arises: "Why disturb the fundamentals of N. R. A. which have now been mastered and are understood by industry? What emergency arises at this time that prompts the introduction of a bill such as the one before this committee"? The watchword of the administration is "Recovery". The passage of such needless legislation contributes nothing constructive to this program, but on the other hand I believe will retard recovery.

Section 7 (a) of the National Recovery Act permits collective bargaining. And if collective bargaining means anything, it starts on the premise that the individual workman shall have the right to select his own representative as he sees fit, from within or without the walls of the establishment in which he works. Many of the labor difficulties of the past have been in plants in which a small minority have attempted to impress their will not only on their employers but on their fellow workmen as well. To frequently this pressure is promoted from without and has come in the worst form of coercion.

Extension of this power from outside forces, as possible under the Wagner bill, would be resisted by many of the workmen within our plants, and would bring on more conflict, less production, higher cost, fewer orders, less employment—and what it equally important a lessened use of the products of our factories on the part of our customers.

The machine tool business is a highly technical and skilled process. One operation depends upon another, not only within the specific plant but in plants from which it gets its supplies, and in the plants of customers to whom it sells. One essential factor, therefore, in keeping production flowing, and consequently men employed, is that all processes within a plant and the plants of its vendors and its customers be sustained in every detail. The delay in the production of an apparently minor part, or interference with a seemingly unimportant process may tie up the entire train of production and throw a large number of men out of work.

To correlate properly these processes and keep production flowing is a function of management, and these processes cannot be kept going smoothly and efficiently unless management is completely in control of those whose duty it is to keep the production under way.

Dual responsibilities, such as would be brought into American industry if workmen were responsible first to an outside organization, and second to the firm employing them, would tie the employer's hands, and would bring about conditions under which it would be almost impossible to manufacture on the modern basis. This principle, although it may not be voiced by workmen in our shops, is well understood by them, and I believe it is for this reason that so many of our hardheaded thinking workmen desire not to be embroiled with an outside organization, whose interest is not to keep production flowing but rather to enhance its powers by increasing the membership, even to the point of the closed shop, which means absolute control.

It is my opinion that a closed shop in any American manufacturing industry would surely result in the same situation that now exists in the building industry, which is highly organized and from which we should take a lesson. In this industry exorbitant hourly wages and restricted output have held the cost of building construction to such a point that people are neither able nor willing to buy.

It seems to me the whole principle of fair contracts is disregarded in the Wagner labor disputes bill. The very essence of this act lies in the labor-relation restrictions imposed upon the employer, while it establishes no limit or control with respect to labor or the labor organizer. A performance contract of any kind, which has the effect of giving to one party an advantage over the other, has no equity and results disastrously. The party who is given the advantage in a contract wants to get everything out of it he possibly can. The other party, sensing the unfairness, uses every possible loophole to resist not only the letter of the contract but the spirit of it. The ultimate result of such an agreement is extreme confusion, conflict, and hard feelings. It is only through mutually fair agreements that progress for the benefit of both parties to the contract can be made.

The bill ignores the fundamentals of equal and legal rights and surely falls in the category of a lopsided measure. It legalizes the the closed shop, imposing by majority rule the will of the majority on the minority.

At this point I would like to expand on that thought.

The question might be asked, if I did not agree with the principle of majority rule, and I would like to answer that question in my own way, and say that I will not take too much of your time in that connection, because I have set down on paper my answer.

That answer is, I do believe in the majority rule. This is made as a general statement and depends on circumstances. As a citizen it is my civic right to exercise my power of vote as all citizens have this equal right to express their wish at will.

In the matter of civic affairs, national, State, township, government, clubs, association, and so on, the majority rule is quite properly the only basis for government within the limit of the constitution specifically arranged for the protection of the minority.

But when it comes down to a contractual right it is quite a different matter.

Terms of employment constitute a contract between the employer and the employee and fundamentally constitute individual relation between employer and employee governed by the terms of the contract, and whether written or oral it remains a contract, and the terms and rules are unstated or stated.

Would anyone in business or in personal affairs write a blank ticket and hand it over to someone else with authority to fix the terms of a business deal, particularly if that third party were to benefit by the manner in which the terms of agreement were fixed?

Senator WAGNER. I do not want to get into a controversy, because it does not do any good when we have opposite views on some things, but do you think an employer who employs 5,000 men, we will say, when one of those employees is dealing individually with the employer, is on an equality with the employer in bargaining power?

Mr. DUNBAR. I did not get the last part of your question.

Senator WAGNER. I say, take an instance where there are 5,000 employees in a particular plant, do you think 1 individual of the 5,000 in dealing with the employer for the value of his services is on a bargaining equality with the employer?

Mr. DUNBAR. I would like to answer that question in this way.

Senator WAGNER. Just a moment, whether you think one way or the other depends on whether we understand one another. If you think he has, then I can understand the rest of your testimony.

Mr. DUNBAR. To determine whether we understand one another, I would like to ask you a question.

Senator WAGNER. Do you want to answer my question first?

Mr. DUNBAR. My answer would depend a good deal on yours. Have you been the employer of a plant that had 5,000 operators?

Senator WAGNER. No, I have not.

Mr. DUNBAR. Then I would probably have to expand considerably on my answer, because I am an employer of several hundred operators. Not only am I an employer of several hundred operators, but I have earned the opportunity to occupy that position by having coming up through the shop.

My first job was in a plant where I ran a punch press. I traveled 7 miles in the morning to my work and returned 7 miles at night, in the summertime on a bicycle. I received 8 cents an hour and worked 60 hours a week. I went from that position to another, and to another position. This is some thirty-and-odd years ago, and in all of this time I have not been out of employment one day. I think I know the employee point of view, and also think I know the employer's point of view.

Senator WAGNER. I have been an employee; I have had that experience like yourself.

Mr. DUNBAR. Then you ought to know what I am talking about.

Senator WAGNER. Yes, I do; and that is the reason I asked this question.

Mr. DUNBAR. Now, I am not the owner of the business, but I am manager and receive a salary for my work, but I feel, as an employer with my responsibility for this division of the work, there is a duty toward the employee as well as a duty toward the management, and in my religion neither duty surmounts the other.

Any employee in our plant can come to me, to my office, sit down as he frequently does, and talk over his position, his personal affairs, his work, his case, or anything that is a part of his daily life. When that man sits down in a chair opposite my desk, he is on an equal footing with me. I put him there, and we discuss his problems as man to man.

Senator WAGNER. How many employees have you today?

Mr. DUNBAR. We employ in my division about 600 people, and my business is no different than the two hundred thirty-and-odd concerns in the machine-tool industry.

This fraternal background of which I speak is one in which the management and the skilled workers come together and in which they have a great interest in the performance of their business.

Senator WAGNER. I cannot see how this proposed legislation in any way interferes with the relationship of that kind, unless the time comes when those men working for you feel, for their own benefit, they had better organize themselves into a unit; then, if you attempt to interfere with their efforts to organize, or try to stop it or to set up an inside unit of your own, so that you may control the bargaining power, then, until that time, it never would interfere.

Then, if you should attempt to interfere with their organization, or attempted to set up an inside unit, this law would say that you cannot do that, you cannot interfere with the worker.

He has the same right to economic freedom as we say he has to political freedom, and if they choose to organize and bargain as a unit instead of individuals, you have no right to interfere with that.

However, I have not an answer from you on this question, and I will say there are many enlightened employers like you that this legislation is not intended for, and would not interfere with; but those employers who do not permit their workers to organize into an effective organization if they chose, are the ones it is intended for.

We all know all of the things that have been said about this bill, and I do not know any legislation about which there has been more false propaganda than about this bill.

There is not anything in the bill saying you must join some organization, but on the contrary it is to give the freedom to join any organization he may desire, or not to join if he does not care to. If he does desire to join an organization the employer has no right to interfere with his choice.

The real opposition here comes from the large employers who do not want any interference, and what I am trying to get from you, is this, do you think one of the 5,000 or 10,000 employees in a plant, particularly under conditions when there is great unemployment, may bargain for his services with an employer on an equality with the employer in bargaining with him for his services as an individual?

Mr. DUNBAR. I can't answer your question. I can imagine conditions in the plants where that individual would not be on an equality with his employer, but I am speaking for my plant, and I am speaking for the plants of the machine tool builders of this country, in which I believe they are on an equality.

If I might proceed on this point, this bill is undoubtedly very close to your heart, you probably presenting this with the same sincerity that I am opposing it. There is a need now, under 7 A of the National Recovery Act for an interpretation, and I think when you enact a bill in which you lay down the rules how both sides should play the game, it would be of a benefit.

I do not think you would like to see Yale and Harvard engage in a football duel in which the rules would say Yale could carry the ball and Harvard could not, and that the umpire might jump in any make a new rule any time he wanted to. That is an humble picture of my idea of this bill.

Senator WAGNER. This is simply a bill to protect the worker in his effort to organize. If he shall desire to organize. This bill is just to take care of him in that situation.

By the way, you may think this is a novel piece of legislation, and I notice very few employers know that there has been a declaration of this policy already in the congressional legislation. Last year we passed a bill for the railway employees which stated unfair labor practices that are enumerated here, except a little more drastically than my legislation does.

That measure has been effective for a year, and there has been no complaint from any employer except one or two that had a company-dominated union, which have been gradually eliminated.

The general effect of it, in my opinion, is that the rights of the worker are protected, because he has got rights we pretended to give him when we passed section 7 A, but with nothing to enforce those rights or to protect them, so that the worker feels that he has been deceived about it.

I do not think that you disagree that in the exercise of his rights as a free American citizen, he ought to be without protection if there is any interference with the exercise of any of those rights of freedom.

Mr. DUNBAR. In pursuing the thought in the last question I want to say that I am opposed to a bill that provides for the carrying out of collective bargaining, providing that bill states the rules by which each side shall play the game. That is a thoroughly American democratic doctrine.

Senator WAGNER. You mean there should be a provision in here that the employee shall not interfere with the employer in his efforts to organize his association?

Mr. DUNBAR. No, to put it in a very humble way, that the employee, if he does not like what is going on will not throw brickbats through the window in the plant. Or that when people are employed or engaged in building construction, that the hod carrier does not conveniently drop a hod of cement down the vent pipe on some plumber who does not happen to belong to a union.

Senator WAGNER. You have that on the statute books today.

Mr. DUNBAR. Let us have it in here, where we understand it.

Senator WAGNER. It exists today on the statute books. I recall myself, as a judge, issuing injunctions against violations and intimidations.

Mr. DUNBAR. Those things are always difficult to prove either in court or by discussion.

Senator WAGNER. But the right exists for the employer to go into court and prevent it.

Mr. DUNBAR. But those conditions do exist, nevertheless.

Senator WAGNER. Yes, and the judicial process is already established to prevent them, so that you do not have to have it enacted in this bill.

Mr. DUNBAR. Proceeding further with my statement, I would like to say that the penalties for violations of the terms and purposes of the bill are imposed on the employer, while no penalty for violation of the terms of the bill are imposed upon the employee or organization. And the newly created National Labor Relation Board is prosecutor, judge, and jury. The terms of violation are too vague to permit fair judgment by such a board, who has the power to interpret promotion or demotion, engagement or discharge as violations of the regulations under the act.

The history of our industry does not reveal the justification for such drastic measures as this proposed bill. You cannot legislate prosperity. The same economic laws which have steered our course to prosperity in the past are working today. Give business a chance to help show the way to recovery.

The bill provides that the board at its discretion may decline to interfere or intervene in any controversy. This would permit an unfriendly labor board, should such exist, to continually stir up strife between management and employees, unless they deal with each other in the exact manner that suited the fancy of the board.

I appear before your committee, coming from a machine tool concern up in New England, employing a few hundred people. But my business and factory is representative, and the problems are the same as in all other machine tool shops throughout our country, which number some 230 concerns, employing today some 20,000 people, and at the peak of production 41,000 employees. An industry who present an annual volume of business amounting to sixty millions, and who have a notorious reputation for small profits. Throughout this entire industry the feeling amongst the employees and the employers is fairly represented by the sentiment expressed in my opposition to the Wagner labor disputes bill.

That, of course, is qualified when all other agencies have been exhausted.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you represent the other industries?

Mr. DUNBAR. The president of the National Machine Tool Association asked me to appear here.

The CHAIRMAN. So that you are really expressing the sentiment of the association?

Mr. DUNBAR. Yes, I am really expressing the sentiment of the association.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Dunbar, I thank you for appearing before the committee at this time.

Senator WAGNER. May I ask just one more question. You say the president of the association asked you to come here; was it just the president's wish or was it discussed at a full meeting?

Mr. DUNBAR. It was not an action of the members of the association, but may I add, I have talked in the course of the last month with practically all of the machine tool manufacturers and builders of this country, at various regional meetings, and I have naturally talked a great deal on this subject.

I thank you, Mr. Chairman, for the privilege of appearing before you.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Whipp, if you will come forward we will be glad to hear you.

STATEMENT OF WENDELL E. WHIPP, REPRESENTING THE MONARCH MACHINE TOOL CO., SYDNEY, OHIO

The CHAIRMAN. Your full name is Wendell E. Whipp?

Mr. WHIPP. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You are connected with what company?

Mr. WHIPP. The Monarch Machine Tool Co., Sydney, Ohio.

The CHAIRMAN. How many employees do you have?

Mr. WHIPP. We have about 165 at the present time.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the maximum personnel?

Mr. WHIPP. About 325.

The CHAIRMAN. It seems to me from what you state and what the last witness stated, that the industry is only running about 50 percent to 60 percent capacity.

Mr. WHIPP. That is right, just about 50 percent capacity now.

The CHAIRMAN. You want to make a statement before the committee?

Mr. WHIPP. Yes, Mr. Chairman, I would like to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed.

Mr. WHIPP. I am appearing before your committee as a representative of the smaller type of manufacturing enterprise. The company I happen to head now employs 165 men. At the peak of production in 1929 we employed 325 men. We manufacture machine tools, which are referred to as the "basic tools of industry." Our industry as a whole dropped in 1932 in production to a point less than 8 percent of the 1926 average for the industry. We are now operating at about 50 percent of the 1926 average. The industry is still in the red but with average hourly wage rates as high and in many cases higher than the 1929 average.

My principal interest in the bill under discussion is not particularly as it may affect our relations with our own people but more particularly as it may and likely will affect our customers, who are all types and sizes of manufacturing plants throughout the country. When our customers are enjoying peaceful and harmonious labor relations they are in a better mood to buy our improved machines. In order to provide steady, profitable employment to our men, we and they are vitally interested in the elimination of labor disputes in industry and in the building up of a better feeling of real copartnership between labor, capital, and management.

Not being versed in the law I cannot comment on the legal phases nor the constitutionality of the proposed measure. But I do shudder at the unfairness of many of the provisions of this bill to that vast majority of employers of labor, whose labor record is clean and where relationship with labor has always been on a 50–50 basis of fair dealing and mutual good will. The provisions of this bill are all one-sided. One would think in reading section 5 of the act relating to unfair labor practice that organized labor had always been without fault in its dealings with employers and that employers were the only parties to the contract that could do wrong. Take the matter of coercion, which in itself is subject to such a wide variation of opinion as to what is and what is not coercion, is barred to the employer; while any amount of coercion can be used by his own employees, both within his plant and by outside labor or any other influence or organization. And the employer is powerless to defend or protect his interest, and in such a circumstance would be without standing on his appeal to the Labor Board proposed to be set up under this bill.

Senator WAGNER. How does this proposed legislation interfere with that relation?

Mr. WHIPP. There are many ways where it might.

Senator WAGNER. May I pursue that somewhat at this time?

Mr. WHIPP. Yes, sir.

Senator WAGNER. Do you believe that workers, if they desire to, should have the right to organize?

Mr. WHIPP. I certainly do.

Senator WAGNER. Do you feel they should have a right to organize without interference by the employers?

Mr. WHIPP. I do. They now have that right under the N. R. A.

Senator WAGNER. You think they have that right, but it has been shown in many cases that they have not been permitted to exercise that right. If you believe that, I do not know what portion of this bill you disapprove, because all that this bill does is simply to say that the workers shall be free in their efforts to organize, if they so desire to organize, for the purpose of bargaining collectively without interference by the employer, either dominating it or interfering with its administration.

Mr. WHIPP. There are a few features of this bill I do not think are quite fair to the class of employer whom I represent. I have gone over your bill, and I have made just a few little marks here, particularly in section 8, in the matter of coercion that is permitted to employees and outside labor organizations but absolutely denied to the manufacturer.

Senator WAGNER. Denied to the manufacturer?

Mr. WHIPP. Yes.

Senator WAGNER. I know that that statement is made over and over again, and certainly a lawyer cannot make it sincerely, because the employer has the right to go into court now wherever there is any effort at intimidation or acts of violence, or threatened violence, or threatened irreparable injury. The law is there today where it can be availed of and injunctions issued to restrain all of those acts. The law exists today, so far as preventing the act you speak of is concerned.

But we are dealing here only with the rights of workers to organize, and I thought from the answer you made to my question we were in accord on that proposition.

Mr. WHIPP. I think we are, because I certainly think the workers who want to organize should be perfectly free to choose how they want to be represented, and I do touch on that further along in my brief statement.

Senator WAGNER. All right; that is all I desired to ask you.

Mr. WHIPP. I continue. The record shows that most labor disturbances during the past couple of years have been in plants in which a very small minority of the workers attemped through coercion to enforce their will not only on their employers but on their fellow workmen as well. Frequently this pressure has all been initiated and promoted from without and has taken the worst form of coercion. The bill makes no provision for the protection of an employee against coercion or intimidation by outside labor representatives or fellow employees to join a labor organization, to go on strike, or take other similar action against his will. Extension of this power of coercion as granted under this proposed act will without doubt be resented by many workmen in plants and would induce more conflict, less production, higher costs, less orders, less employment. and tend to lower our standard of living.

The feeling of antagonism between employer and employee that formerly existed in this country has lessened to a most noticeable extent in recent years and especially so during this depression. A genuine feeling of community of interest between employer and employee exists today as never before in this country. Employees are keenly interested in the success of the plant in which they work.

They know that a prosperous, successful plant can and usually does pay higher wages, provide more continuous employment, and give better working conditions than the less prosperous employer. The good employers—and there are more of us good than bad—know that our businesses are never prosperous unless labor is fully employed and highly paid. It seems highly essential that present relations between the good employer and his employees should not be thrown out of balance but should be surrounded by conditions that would encourage mutual understanding and respect to grow.

The very title of this bill, The Labor Disputes Bill, together with most of its provisions, would seem to endanger the growth of this mutual understanding and, in fact, be an entering wedge that would likely widen the present narrow gap between employer and employee.

Senator WAGNER. You say this relationship is going to be disturbed, and I would like to know how.

Mr. WHIPP. I just wish you might know the conditions, the relationship that exists in many small plants, and let us keep in mind there are more plants represented by our type in this country than there are those employing from 10,000 to 15,000 people.

Senator WAGNER. What I am asking is, what is there in this bill that interferes with this relationship?

Mr. WHIPP. I am just getting to that fact. I can well imagine in a group of workers such as we have today, numbering 165, there may be one or two agitators, because going back to Biblical times, when 12 men were gotten together, 1 of them was a Judas; and it is quite likely that in any organization, no matter how close the relationship may be between employers and employees, there may be one or two men easily led who might listen to an outside labor organizer, who will say: "Now, I will tell you how we can do this job; here is the kind of complaint we can register against your company; and we can get this thing organized and we will turn this complaint over to the Labor Relations Board." Then they can get the headlines on the front pages of the paper of the agitation, and the agitation spreads to the employees in the shops; the men may being to talk, and then a conflict commences. That is what we want to avoid.

Senator WAGNER. If those workers are not in sympathy with those efforts to organize, all you do is to have your election and determine whether or not they want an organization, or whether they want any representatives, or whether they want collective bargaining; and if your workers say "no" that is the end of it; and then you have a finding by a governmental agency that they do not desire to have an organization, or that they want a certain type of representation. With that, you have an official sanction of that, and the trouble is over.

Do you think that we, in America, can prevent men from talking to one another?

Mr. WHIPP. Of course, you do not want to do that.

Senator WAGNER. Yes; but some judges think that. I was down in Pennsylvania about 5 years ago during the coal strike which was a very serious thing, and there a judge issued an injunction preventing the striking workers from talking or singing religious hymns, and also attempted to restrain the members of a labor organization from feeding these men.

That did not sound like an American edict to me, so we cannot go to the extent of preventing men from talking to others about the kind of organization they desire, because that would be interfering with the freedom of speech.

There is nothing in this proposed legislation that disturbs your relation in the slightest, with your employees, if you say when they desire to organize they should have the right to organize.

Mr. WHIPP. Yes; but we do not like to see outside unions come in to disturb our present very agreeable relations with our workers.

Senator WAGNER. They can do that now, they can talk to your workers now.

Mr. WHIPP. Yes; it it true they can, but there is no labor board such as this sets up.

Senator WAGNER. You will have the protection of having a governmental agency determine the questions for you as to whether the workers really want to organize.

Mr. WHIPP. Of course if we were sure under your bill that the caliber of men always sitting on the Labor Board would be men of your high caliber, it would be a different question.

Senator WAGNER. You have got to rely on the President of the United States that he will put men on there of high character, and there are certainly three men of high character on there now. Mr. Biddle is one of the most eminent lawyers of the country. Everyone knows Mr. Millis, connected with the Chicago University, and I think the chairman of this committee will vouch for Mr. Smith on that Board, who is from Massachusetts.

Mr. WHIPP. And further, of course, under the provisions of the bill the Board may have a political nature, a political character that might be changed from one administration to the other.

Senator WAGNER. No; it cannot, because we are making fixed terms for the individuals, and for the very purpose of keeping it out of any political influence. That is the reason I am advocating an independent board, because I want to make it as just a judicial body as possible, to be free from political influence.

Mr. WHIPP. If it could be a board built up to the standard of our wonderful Supreme Court in this country. I think industry would welcome it.

Senator WAGNER. You have other boards, the Federal Trade Commission, and others, and nobody can suggest that political influence can be used in any of those boards in any way. Those men are conscientious men, and they want to perform their duty for the welfare of the public. But of course our trouble, and that goes to you and to me, is that when one of the boards decides against us, we do not think as much of them as we did when they decided with us.

I was a judge, you know, and I know that when I decided a case in favor of one attorney's plan, I was a great judge, but the other fellow did not think the same way.

I think that is an apprehension that would go against our whole structure of government. If we cannot trust the men that we put in public office to administer our public welfare, then the whole structure will crumble.

Mr. WHIPP. Of course in all likelihood a lot of grievances that might be started in the effort to unionize industry, might come before one of the smaller subsidiary boards to be set up under the bill, and they would not be of the high caliber as the men with respect to whom you spoke.

Senator WAGNER. That may be quite true, but I think unless we can trust those we have to administer our public welfare, the whole structure will, of course, crumble.

Mr. WHIPP. Contractual relations must be fair to both parties to the contract if peace and progress are to result. The whole tenor of this bill is manifestly unfair to both the good employer and to the worker who wants to be free to deal directly with his employer or to have a free hand in choosing his own representative to speak for him. The "majority rule" and the "closed shop" provisions of this bill take the free right of choice from the workers and impose an intolerable condition on the good employer.

It would seem that in most labor disturbances in the past couple of years the main point at issue has been, Who shall speak for labor? There are in this country about 22 millions of people gainfully employed, not including farmers, servants, professional people, or individuals in business for themselves.

The National Industrial Recovery Act, which I should like to see extended for another year in substantially its present form, gives each worker his constitutional right to speak for himself, or to choose freely a representative to speak for him. It gives him the freedom of choice as to whether he shall or shall not join a labor union.

These rights are set forth in section 7–A of the N. I. R. A. From the wording of the law, it would seem clear that each worker is guaranteed the right to decide for himself who will speak for him, and this right has on more than one occasion been reaffirmed by the President. The Wagner bill proposes to take this right of free choice away from him.

As we read our daily papers, we frequently read headlines such as "Labor demands 30-hour week", "Labor at odds with the President on Automobile Code", or "Labor favors unemployment insurance." All of this leads us to ask, Who is labor? Who attempts to speak for the 22,000,000 workers in this country?

In attempting to answer this question, let us consider the make-up of this army of 22,000,000 gainfully employed persons referred to above. Of this 22,000,000, according to the official report made in August 1934, 2,823,750 are members of the American Federation of Labor. Before Congress and the President and the employers of this country, the A. F. of L. claims to speak for labor, although its membership constitutes only 12.8 percent of America's workers.

In spite of the invitation of the National Recovery Act to workers to organize, there seems to be relatively little disposition on the part of the vast majority of American workers to affiliate themselves with the A. F. of L., if we are to judge by the fact that such a small proportion are members after approximately 50 years of existence.

The present National Industrial Recovery Act can be amended and extended to provide fairness to both employers and employees and to include a National Labor Relations Board with reasonable powers to function under the present Department of Labor where it belongs.

I feel that it should be the policy of the Government to protect men in their right to work, and to refrain from any policies which tend to force men into labor organizations.

The Wagner labor bill is too dangerous to industrial progress in this country and should not be favorably reported from this committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Ellard, will you please come forward, and the committee will be glad to hear you.

STATEMENT OF HARVEY G. ELLARD, REPRESENTING THE INSTITUTE OF AMERICAN MEAT PACKERS, CHICAGO, ILL.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Ellard, your full name is Harvey G. Ellard?

Mr. ELLARD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Your residence is in Chicago, Ill.?

Mr. ELLARD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. In what capacity do you appear before this committee?

Mr. ELLARD. As the representative of the Institute of American Meat Packers.

The CHAIRMAN. What is your occupation?

Mr. ELLARD. I am employed by Armour & Co. as director of personnel.

The CHAIRMAN. You are appearing in a representative capacity for Armour & Co. and others?

Mr. ELLARD. I am appearing before you in behalf of the Institute of American Meat Packers.

The CHAIRMAN. How many members are there in that organization?

Mr. ELLARD. Approximately 300, being about 85 percent of the meat-packing industry, and employing some 200,000 employees.

The CHAIRMAN. Are the employees in those meat-packing industries organized?

Mr. ELLARD. No, sir; not in trade unions. But they are organized in a general collective way through plans of employee representation, and have been so since 1921.

The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed with your statement.

Mr. ELLARD. I am appearing before this committee on behalf of the Institute of American Meat Packers, an organization composed of some 300 meat-packing companies operating throughout the United States, and representing over 85 percent of the business of the meat-packing industry. Normally the industry employs approximately 200,000 people. Cooperating with me is a committee from the industry composed of the following persons:

Mr. F. L. Badgley, Swift & Co.; Mr. James B. Rooney, Wilson & Co.; Mr. Thomas Creigh, Cudahy Packing Co.; Mr. Ewing Sinclair, Kingam & Co.; and Mr. A. D. Donnell, Rath Packing Co.

The Institute of American Meat Packers has authorized this committee to appear before you and present the views of the industry with regard to Senate bill 1958. In order to save the time of your commitee and to avoid unnecessary repetition, I have been asked to act as spokesman and make one presentation instead of having each member of our committee address you.

In order that the attitude of the meat-packing industry be not misunderstood, I desire to say at the outset that it is not opposed to the principle which seeks to guarantee employees a free choice in the selection of their representatives for collective bargaining. The bill under discussion, S. 1958, however, goes much farther than this, and is decidedly objectionable to the industry I represent.

1. THE SO-CALLED "COMPANY UNIONS"

Employee representation plans have been the subject of so much public and private discussion since the enactment of section 7–A of the N. I. R. A. that the effect of S. 1958 on such plans will be considered first.

Paragraph (2) of section 8 makes it unfair labor practice for an employer to dominate or interfere with the formation or administration of any labor organization or contribute financial or other support to it. While the bill does not in terms prohibit employee representation plans or so-called "company unions", the effect of the provision mentioned is an indirect prohibition. Literally, it would prevent an employer from furnishing a room or other place on his premises where the employees might meet, or from permitting such employees to meet during working hours without loss of time and pay.

The term "company union" is not a proper name for the plans of employee representation in the meat-packing industry. It is a term which has been loosely applied to them by persons whose interests run counter to the success of employee representation plans. Proponents of this bill define the term "company union" to mean a union of employees within a company, initiated by the company, controlled and dominated by the company, and imposed upon the employees without their being given an opportunity to accept or reject. If that is a true definition of the term, we say that there is absolutely no similarity between this type of organization and the plans of employee representation that exist in the packing industry.

Notwithstanding statements to the contrary, I should like to make clear that employees of those companies having conference boards or assemblies do consider and pass upon questions of hours, wages, and working conditions in their conference boards or assemblies. Naturally, since such matters are usually disposed of for comparatively long terms, they do not come up for discussion at every meeting of the conference board or assembly. On the other hand, they, like many other matters, may come up for discussion at any time, according to the wishes of the employees or management.

In addition, many other matters, such as vacations, group health and life insurance, mutual benefit associations, pensions, retirements, thrift and savings plans, credit union, and health and safety are constantly being taken up. The questions brought up and ironed out in the conference board meetings are very numerous. As every employer of labor knows, it is frequently the little things which create friction in the ranks of employees. Representatives of the employers, sitting around the conference table with representatives of the employees who actually work in the plant and are familiar with the cause of the complaint are in a much better position to devise a plan to correct such matters than anyone else.

These matters, along with wages and hours, all of which are of mutual interest to both employer and employee, are constantly arising in every plant and factory. These conference boards provide a means for satisfactorily ironing out the differences of opinion which cause them. It, therefore, seems most unreasonable to by statute prohibit an employer from furnishing his employees a place to meet or to prohibit them to meet during working hours without loss of time or pay when the purpose of such meetings is for the mutual benefit of employee and employer.

The employee representation plans in the meat-packing industry were not brought about by the N. R. A. They were not hastily conceived to counteract the aggressive action of trade unions following the passage of the N. I. R. A. Employee representation plans have existed in the meat-packing industry rather generally since 1921. These plans have not been company controlled, nor company dominated, as charged by the proponents of this bill, and during the past 14 years have served as successful mediums for collective bargaining and for cooperative relationships between the workers and management in this great industry.

These plans empower the conference boards or assemblies to negotiate matters affecting wages and hours of labor, and the fact that the meat-packing industry has been singularly free from labor disputes and labor difficulties during the past 14 years proves that such plans have served effectively in preserving harmonious relations between the workers and management. During this period wages in the industry have been both raised and lowered, and hours and conditions of employment have been adjusted to meet changing conditions. These changes have all been made through the medium of employee representation.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you later discuss what financial aid, if any, the packers give these organizations of employees?

Mr. ELLARD. I can answer that now. They pay the time of the men so employed; they furnish them a room in which to meet; they furnish secretarial help in the taking and transcribing of minutes of the meeting.

Senator WAGNER. Are you going to discuss the constitution?

Mr. ELLARD. I have not prepared to, but I would be glad to take that up now, if you wish.

Senator WAGNER. I was only going to ask one or two questions. You are familiar with their constitution?

Mr. ELLARD. Quite.

Senator WAGNER. I thought so. Do you limit representation to employees?

Mr. ELLARD. Yes; within the company.

Senator WAGNER. Thank you, that is all.

Mr. ELLARD. Except for a short time during the war period, when commodity prices were much greater than now, the hourly wage rates paid employees in this industry are now higher than ever before. These high hourly wages are reflected in average weekly earnings which the United States Bureau of Labor Statistics reports are now larger than the average of all manufacturing industries and were larger during the depression period. Employees have obtained these benefits without drain on their income because of dues or assessments for the operation of the representation plans. In view of the splendid record of industrial peace enjoyed by the meat-packing industry, it would regret the statutory abolition of the agency which has been responsible for this peace, particularly at the present time when a healthy recovery from the depression is so dependent upon the uninterrupted employment of workers. It feels that special consideration should be given to the fact that, over a long period of years, the principle of collective bargaining has been successfully worked out through employee representation plans, rather than that such plans should be, in effect, outlawed.

A somewhat similar bill to the one under discussion was made the subject of a report of the Senate Committee on Education and Labor of the Seventy-third Congress. In that report the committee stated that it had considered with great care a proposed unfair labor practice which prohibited an employer from initiating, participating in, supervising, or influencing the formation, constituton, bylaws, other governing rules, operations, policies, or elections of any labor organization.

The committee also considered the evidence presented, tending to show how employers had dominated labor organizations of their own employees. The committee stated that—> these abuses did not seem so general that the Government should forbid employers to indulge in the normal relations and innocent communications which are part of all friendly relations between employer and employee; * * * that the object of the third unfair labor practice was to remove from the industrial scene unfair pressure, not fair discussion, * * * that the committee was not persuaded that in all cases an employer should be forbidden to pay the representatives of employees their regular wages if they confer together or with employers during working hours.

2. SELECTION OF REPRESENTATIVES

The meat-packing industry has no desire to register a protest against the principle which seeks to guarantee the free choice of employees in the selection of their representatives for collective bargaining. It feels, however, that the choice should be wholly free, without coercion from any source. Employees can be interfered with and coerced by outsiders just as well as by employers.

Employees in the meat-packing industry are not coerced or influenced in their selection of representatives under the employee representation plans. The interest of employees in these plans is manifested by the fact that a very large percentage of them cast their votes at the regular elections. Information collected by the Institute of American Meat Packers shows that the percentage of employees voting for representatives at elections held under such plans averages above 90 percent in the plants included in the reports.

They appoint their own tellers, watchers, and judges of election. They set up places of voting where an employee marks his own ballot in secret. They count and tabulate the votes and declare the names of those elected. The management has absolutely no voice whatever in the selection of these representatives, and the question of whether an employee votes or not is also a matter of free choice with him. Judge Nields found the same thing to be true in the celebrated Weirton Steel Co. case, and this situation prevails in every industry where employee representation plans, with which I am familiar, are in force. Certainly it is the case in the meat-packing industry.

Under our plans of employee representation, the employees have the right and the privilege of meeting privately, apart from management representatives, forming their own opinions, and fixing their own policies.

I feel that right to meet privately and separately would, under section 8, paragraph 2, of the proposed bill, be prohibited, because it would prohibit the management from paying them while they were meeting together.

They are not denied the right and the privilege of employment of consultants or advisers and are not dominated or controlled in the way which the proponents of this legislation would have the committee believe.

The avowed purpose of this bill, as stated by its proponents, is to destroy these employee representation plans. Before a law is enacted which will eliminate so valuable an agency as employee representation and one which has had such general acceptance among the workers in the packing industry, it should be given the most thoughtful consideration.

Senator WAGNER. What do you base that upon, because we limit the financing of these plans?

Mr. ELLARD. No; I base it on a number of things, a number of general observations. I heard a most elegant speech by you reported in the news wires in which you said you were going to get rid of these fake unions, with direct reference to plans of employee representation.

Senator WAGNER. I did not, I do not think, use the word "fake."

Mr. ELLARD. That is the way I heard it.

Senator WAGNER. Company-dominated, was it not?

Mr. ELLARD. The word "fake" sticks in my mind. That is the way I remember it.

Senator WAGNER. You are not in favor of a fake union, are you?

Mr. ELLARD. No.

Senator WAGNER. That is all I said I was going to get rid of, fake unions.

Mr. ELLARD. The difficulty is the association of that term with the plans of employee representation, and that has been done by so many other people who have been back of this type of legislation, that the association is there in the mind of many of us.

Senator WAGNER. What do you mean by this type of legislation? This is new, except for the Railway Labor Act of last year.

Mr. ELLARD. Yes; but this is the third attempt to pass this sort of bill.

Senator WAGNER. You know the Railway Employees Act was passed by the unanimous vote of both Houses of Congress last year, applying to all railway employees.

Mr. ELLARD. I realize that, and all railway employees are unionized in a national union.

Senator WAGNER. There are some employee plans which have been established, though they are not in any way dominated by the employer, and they exist now.

Mr. ELLARD. I am interested to hear that. I had the rather definite impression that there were types of employee representation which ran collateral with these national unions in certain railroads, but that all railroad employees were organized in national unions.

Senator WAGNER. I think you are mistaken as to that. There are some that were company unions, I have been told by one of the mediators, that have transformed themselves into a union not financed by the railway company, and they have legitimatized themselves to that extent.

Mr. ELLARD. I wanted to talk to you first a little bit further. The reason why I have the feeling, and my group have the feeling, that this legislation is aimed to kill employee-representation plans is based on a recent article or I might say the answer grows out of a recent article in this month's American Magazine, being an interview of William Green, of the American Federation of Labor, where he was asked what he would do where the employees voted for a plan of employee representation. Mr. Green said he would have to accept that temporarily until he could get a proper educational influence upon those employees to convince them they were wrong.

A further matter that bears on my opinion is that the gentlemen who are now the members of the National Labor Board, and its chairman, have been testifying before your committee and have indicated clearly they believe the only basis of collective bargaining is through the national union.

That is my answer to the question why I feel that the avowed purpose of this legislation is to outlaw and get rid of employee-representation plans.

Senator WAGNER. Many of the employee-representation plans I believe you will admit are dominated by the employer.

Mr. ELLARD. I have yet to see one that was successful at all where there was any domination by the employer. The employees soon sense that fact and it is withdrawn.

I was greatly interested in reading the testimony of Mr. Garrison and the questions by Senator La Follette, which indicate the form of thinking of those men on this bill, and they being proponents of this bill lead us to oppose it vigorously because that is the type of economic freedom that would be imposed upon us, if that is the philosophy back of this bill.

The bill, as drawn, seems to be founded on the philosophy that the interests of the employees and management are hostile and diverse. This is not the fact, and should not be the theory of any legislation. The interests of employers and employees are mutual, and legislation should be framed with the idea of promoting that mutuality of interest, rather than destroying it.

It seems to us that the general provisions of the bill are inconsistent with the declaration of policy in section 1, i. e., that equality of bargaining power between employers and employees is not attained when the organization of employers in the corporate and other forms of ownership association is not balanced by the free exercise by employees of the right to bargain collectively, through representatives of their own choosing. For instance, paragraph (a) of section 9 provides that representatives designated or selected for the purpose of collective bargaining by the majority of the employees in a unit appropriate for such purposes shall be the exclusive representatives of all the employees in such unit, for the purposes of collective bargaining in respect to rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, or other conditions of employment. There cannot be free choice of representatives when representatives selected by a majority are the exclusive representatives of the minority. The proviso to this paragraph permitting any individual employee or group of employees to present grievances to their employer through representatives of their own choosing is not sufficient to overcome the effect of the exclusive agency given to the representatives of the majority with respect to wages, hours of employment, or other conditions of employment.

Senator WAGNER. May I ask a question there?

Mr. ELLARD. Certainly.

Senator WAGNER. Have you a written collective-bargaining agreement with your employees?

Mr. ELLARD. There is no written collective bargaining agreement. The minutes of these meetings became the basis of agreement.

Senator WAGNER. I understand that, but you have no written agreement which guarantees to workers certain wages, certain hours of employment, and other conditions of employment, the kind of collective bargaining agreement that is usually made with outside organizations—you know the type I mean.

Mr. ELLARD. Yes.

Senator WAGNER. You have no such contract?

Mr. ELLARD. No; we have no such contract. The agreement is between the management and workers, and becomes an agreement until it is changed.

Senator WAGNER. Your rate of wages may be modified at any time by the management?

Mr. ELLARD. No, sir; only by agreement with the employees. There is no set period. It might be changed from month to month, and frequently in the last year we have made changes, in fact three changes upward in wages.

Senator WAGNER. Do these representatives speak for all of the employees in your dealings?

Mr. ELLARD. Yes, sir.

Senator WAGNER. And they are elected by a majority?

Mr. ELLARD. Yes; in the precinct in which they serve. However, the minority still has a perfect right to appear and present their side of every case if they so desire, or they may select an outside organization to represent them if they wish, and there has been dealing with that sort of organization.

Senator WAGNER. Of course that is dividing the force?

Mr. ELLARD. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. There are some groups of employees who prefer not to have a written contract for wages, wanting to hold themselves in position to take the higher wages without any contract at any time.

Mr. ELLARD. It seems so. We have one contract with an outside organization, our relationship with that group having been very pleasant, that it made from year to year. Those employees under that contract suffered by having a contract through the entire year when wages in the rest of the plant were adjusted for other employees in the representation plan.

Moreover, except possibly in a factory which was wholly union or wholly nonunion, there would be a constant controversy over the question of whether or not one group or the other represented the majority. Practically all of the labor troubles during the past 2 years have been in connection with this question of majority representation.

No such question can possibly arise under any of the plans of employee representation with which I am familiar because they do not undertake to make the representatives selected under such plans the exclusive bargaining agents for the employee.

3. UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

Section 8 of the bill lists four unfair labor practices. It will be noted that these so-called "unfair labor practices" all relate to acts by the employer. In other words, unfair labor practices can only result from acts of the employer. Unquestionably, employment creates mutual obligations and liabilities, and it seems very strange indeed that only one party of such relationship can be guilty of an unfair practice arising out of that relationship. Paragraph (9) of section 2 makes a labor dispute include any controversy, regardless of whether the disputants stand in the proximate relationship of employer and employee. Yet this bill provides no restraint upon third parties who disturb the employer and employee relationship, although such third parties have it within their power to create the labor dispute and bring about the very things for which an employer may be condemned under this bill.

In section 2, paragraph (3), it is stated that the term "employee" shall include any individual whose work has ceased as a consequence of, or in connection with, any current labor dispute or because of any unfair labor practice, and who has not obtained any other regular and substantially equivalent employment * * *.

This is something new and novel in legislation. It has always been the law, so far as I know, that when a person leaves the employment of another, his employment terminates. It would certainly be contrary to general principles to say that employment continues when the employee volutarily throws down his tools, walks out of the factory where he is employed, and refuses to do any further work or be subject to the control or directions of the employer.

Senator WAGNER. There is a very high authority that a striker is still an employee?

Mr. ELLARD. Yes, I so understand.

Senator WAGNER. I mean legal authority.

Mr. ELLARD. That is right, but this goes further and says a person who is away from his employment by reason of any unfair labor practice maintains his status as an employee, and that is the difference I see in this proposition.

In that connection, what is the status of an employee, do you mean an employee for the purpose of this job, or do you mean an employee with all of the implications and responsibilities that go with an employee.

We are opening up a wide field of implications when we say an employee retains that status when he is away from his work.

The CHAIRMAN. I think it is meant to include an employee who is discharged for being a member of a union that his employer does not approve of.

Mr. ELLARD. I do not understand that.

The CHAIRMAN. I think the difference is meant to include such a workman as an employee who is discharged for being a member of a union that his employer does not approve of.

Mr. ELLARD. It might mean any person who feels he has been discriminated against in any way.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; who is discharged for improper conduct or for waste or for malicious interference with the process of the business.

Mr. ELLARD. For any reason he alleges is an unfair labor practice.

Senator WAGNER. The unfair labor practices are enumerated, and if he leaves because these practices have been indulged in, he is justified, isn't he—I mean, he has a right to establish that fact, and if he cannot establish the fact, he ceases to be an employee because he left without justification.

Mr. ELLARD. During the time that fact is being established this bill holds him in the status of an employee, and what does that mean? It means that the employer is liable to him for workman's compensation, and there are several of these things we cannot understand.

Senator WAGNER. These things are established for themselves.

Mr. ELLARD. Still the language is broad enough to do that.

The section mentioned is not limited to those whose work has ceased as a consequence of current labor dispute but include those whose work has ceased "because of any unfair labor practice." It is the easiest thing in the world for employees who are laid off or discharged to charge unfair labor practices. Paragraph (3) of section 8 makes it an unfair labor practice for an employer "by discrimination in regard to hire or tenure of employment or any term or condition of employment to encourage or discourage membership in any labor organization." The statute, therefore, furnishes a basis for many and varied claims of unfair labor practices. The business of the packing industry, in particular, is subject to fluctuations in employment, due to the seasonal character of the business, and the weekly, and even daily, fluctuations in the receipts of livestock, which furnish the raw material for the industry. Employes who are thus laid off as a result of necessary reductions in forces may be prone to feel that they have been discriminated against in favor of those who are retained in the employment. I certainly do not think Congress should encourage such claims by providing that employees whose services are terminated, either voluntarily or involuntarily, shall retain their status as employees because of the existence of some labor dispute or because of some alleged unfair labor practice.

It should be borne in mind that under paragraph (9) of section 2 the term "labor dispute" includes any controversy, regardless of whether the disputants stand in the proximate relation of employer and employee. A labor dispute can thus be created under the provisions of this bill by an outsider, although actually no controversy whatsoever exists between the employer and his employees. I repeat again that the unfair labor practices condemned by this bill can only grow out of acts by the employer. There is no restraint whatsoever on those who may be instrumental and chiefly interested in creating a labor dispute.

The meat-packing industry is strongly opposed to any legislation which does not make the unfair labor practices condemned by the law applicable to everyone.

4. THE LABOR BOARD AS A FORUM FOR DISPUTES

It is clear from this bill that the National Labor Relations Board is to be an inquisitorial and quasijudicial body. It is given power by section 10 to prevent any person listed in section 8 from engaging in any unfair labor practice affecting commerce, and it is provided that this power shall be exclusive. It may, as the result of charges filed with it or on its own motion, serve complaints on employers believed to have been guilty of unfair labor practices, subpena witnesses and records, and conduct hearings. It is provided that in such proceedings the rules of evidence prevailing in courts of law or equity shall not be controlling and that the findings of the Board as to facts, if supported by evidence, shall be conclusive. It has no power to act as an arbitrator in labor disputes unless the parties to the dispute agree to submit such dispute to the arbitration of the board, or its appointees.

Senator WAGNER. Do you think they should have the power of compulsory arbitration?

Mr. ELLARD. There is no arbitration effective, if it is compulsory, but a board of this sort, which is the prosecuting agency of the employees cannot be looked upon with favor by the employer in submitting a dispute to it.

Considering the facts that, under the provisions of this bill, unfair labor practices can only grow out of acts of the employer, a board so constituted and empowered cannot be a popular and welcome forum to employers for the adjustment of labor disputes. Its findings will bind the employer only. Cease and desist orders can be entered against the employer only. Vindication of the employer in a particular case means little or nothing, because another complaint, based on some unfair labor practice, can be immediately filed. In plain language, the principal achievement of this bill, if passed, will be to provide a legal means whereby trade-union leaders can harass and annoy employers and employees more than ever before in their efforts to bring about closed-shop contracts with their union. The Board cannot have the support and confidence of employers, because in the last analysis it will exist only as an agency for the prosecution of employers. No agency can be effective unless it enjoys the full confidence of all concerned and is basically designed to equally protect all parties.

5. GENERAL

In conclusion, I wish to again point out that the whole plan of this proposed legislation is opposed to the basic philosophy of partnership and cooperation between employers and employees. It is bottomed on the the theory that dealings between employers and employees are necessarily hostile and adverse. It seeks to give organization of employees greater rights and privileges than they have heretofore possessed by declaring certain labor practices of employers unfair and unlawful. These greater privileges of employees and their organization are without the assumption of any responsibilities or liabilities.

On this question of balancing of power, Judge Nields, in his decision in the Weirton Steel Co. case, said:

> The theory of balancing of power, or of balancing opposing power, is based upon the assumption of an inevitable and necessary diversity of interest. This is a traditional Old World theory. It is not the twentieth century American theory of that relation as dependent upon mutual interest, understanding and good-will.

This language is very appropriate to the point I am making. Prosperity in business is just as essential to employees as it is to employers. Employers cannot employ large numbers of people and pay high wages without prosperity. Labor disputes and controversies prevent prosperity in business, and I submit that Congress should not enact legislation which will give an impetus to labor disputes and controversies, as this bill, if passed, most certainly will do.

Senator WAGNER. Do you remember the Norris-LaGuardia injunction bill?

Mr. ELLARD. Yes, sir.

Senator WAGNER. Did you appear for or against that act?

Mr. ELLARD. No, sir.

Senator WAGNER. Did your organization have any interest in that particular act?

Mr. ELLARD. Not that I recall, I do not believe we made any presentation of any kind in connection with that act.

Senator WAGNER. Did you favor it?

Mr. ELLARD. No, sir.

Senator WAGNER. My recollection is you opposed it as an organization.

Mr. ELLARD. If we did, I am not familiar with that fact.

Senator WAGNER. Were you opposed to it individually?

Mr. ELLARD. Yes; because I felt it withdrew certain protections from employers that they were entitled to.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there anything further?

Mr. ELLARD. No, Mr. Chairman; that is all I have to say.

The CHAIRMAN. If Mr. Deffenbaugh is present, will he please come forward.

STATEMENT OF JAMES W. DEFFENBAUGH, REPRESENTING THE HOCKING GLASS CO., LANCASTER, OHIO

The CHAIRMAN. Your full name is James W. Deffenbaugh?

Mr. DEFFENBAUGH. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You are an attorney at law residing in Lancaster, Ohio?

Mr. DEFFENBAUGH. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You are appearing here in behalf of the Hocking Glass Co.?

Mr. DEFFENBAUGH. Yes, sir; that is right.

The CHAIRMAN. How many employees are there in that company?

Mr. DEFFENBAUGH. In Lancaster proper, 2,214 employees.

The CHAIRMAN. In one plant, or in a series of plants?

Mr. DEFFENBAUGH. In one plant, and then the Hocking Glass Co. owns all of the Lancaster Glass Co. which has 583 employees. There are two plants in Lancaster, Ohio, employing 2,797 employees at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there an organization of the employees?

Mr. DEFFENBAUGH. Pardon me, I should say that the Hocking Glass Co. owns one-half of the stock of the General Glass Co. of Winchester, Ind., and it employs 636 people; and it also owns a controlling interest in the Standard Glass Co. that employs 178 people altogether. Altogether, the Hocking Glass Co. in its offices in Lancaster, Ohio, account for 2,975 employees.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there organizations of employees for the purpose of collective bargaining in these plants?

Mr. DEFFENBAUGH. There is not.

The CHAIRMAN. Your employees are not organized?

Mr. DEFFENBAUGH. They are not.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you desire to submit a statement to the committee?

Mr. DEFFENBAUGH. The only statement I can make is oral, and I will try to make such a statement.

The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed.

Mr. DEFFENBAUGH. The Hocking Glass Co. is opposed to Senate bill 1958 for the following reasons:

The CHAIRMAN. If I may interrupt there, there is nothing in this bill, of course, that would change the situation in your plant, no specific language in the bill that would require these employees to form a union.

Mr. DEFFENBAUGH. That is true, Senator, but if this bill passes the Hocking Glass Co. is sure that the American Federation of Labor will come into our plants as it did in 1933, and undertake to organize our plants with an attitude of opposition to the company.

We feel that the bill, in section 2, clause 2, should not specifically exempt labor organizations or unions, or anyone acting in the capacity of an officer or agent of such a labor organization from the definition of "person."

We feel the bill seeks to set off manufacturers and employers generally of labor from agricultural employers, thus creating a class or classes among the citizens of the United States.

We are especially opposed to the latter part of section 2, clause 9, wherein this language occurs:

> Regardless of whether the disputants stand in the proximate relation of employer and employee.

We do not believe anybody should have any rights to complain against an employer unless he is an employee of the company and directly interested.

We believe that in section 6, clause A, we have lost something that appears in 1934 law, when we leave out the word "reasonable" preceding "rules and regulations", in giving the labor board authority to adopt rules and regulations, and does not require the word "reasonable" as the first bill did.

We believe section 8, the very first sentence, is unfair to employers, because it puts restrictions in clauses 1, 2, 3, and 4 of section 8 on employers, and leaves other people free to interfere, to restrain and coerce employees.

We believe that the prohibition against interference, restraint, and coercion should be not only upon employers, but upon any person or persons, or any organization or organizations, and, of course, I would expect that to include labor organizations.

Senator WAGNER. Have you had occasion to make application to the court for injunctions restraining threats, intimidations, violence, and these other things usually enumerated?

Mr. DEFFENBAUGH. We do not, but we have had plenty of exhibition of intimidation and threat in the Hocking Glass Co.

Senator WAGNER. You know the right exists to secure injunctions against those practices?

Mr. DEFFENBAUGH. It is pretty hard to do, but we had a better remedy. We followed these local men who were representing the American Federation of Labor and told them if there were any further threats, intimidations, or trying to compel people to join against their will, the men would be discharged who made those statements, and that was the end of it. I would say that was better than anv injunction.

Senator WAGNER. Is that not one of the reasons that some of the employers at least are anxious to have a system by which only an employee can represent the workers in collective bargaining, because he has that very advantage you speak of, if the employee makes a demand that the employer does not like, the employee is told if you persist you will lose your job, and it is an economic advantage I am very glad to hear you recognize as existing, because it is denied in so many instances.

Mr. DEFFENBAUGH. We do not deny it, but there is no man that works for our company but what can quit any day, and as long as we do not discharge him for his labor activities we could discharge him any day.

But, in the 30 years the Hocking Glass Co. has grown from a small plant, and it has grown tremendously since 1927, and has been growing during the last year, in the number of employees, and in the sum of more than a million dollars in wages that it pays, as yet we have had no trouble in adjusting any differences between the employee and the employer.

Senator WAGNER. If the relationship is as you state there is nothing in this legislation which will disturb that relation.

Mr. DEFFENBAUGH. We believe it does, from the fact that our experience in 1933 was that the American Federation of Labor came in there through some of its allied organizations and tried to intimidate our employees in their work.

The CHAIRMAN. Do I understand you to say that when that was done you called some of the employees in who had been doing that, and said you would discharge them if they continued to do so, and did not cease?

Mr. DEFFENBAUGH. We said we would discharge them if they made any further misstatements or misrepresentations, or any attempts at intimidation.

The CHAIRMAN. Under this bill you would not be allowed to do that.

Mr. DEFFENBAUGH. I believe that is right, we would not have a right to do that, and therefore we would have a lot of trouble.

Senator WAGNER. There is a remedy today if there is intimidation, you can get your injunction today against that sort of thing.

Mr. DEFFENBAUGH. It is a hard remedy to put into operation.

Senator Wagner. If it were put into this bill it would just be a repetition of a right that already exists, namely an injunction to prevent these practices you complain of, such as intimidation, threats of violence and so on.

Mr. DEFFENBAUGH. Why not put it in section 8 so that the same rule applies to the employee will apply to the employer, and will apply to any other person?

Senator WAGNER. You have that remedy now, and you have the additional remedy which you just admitted, of the economic pressure you can exercise against the employee today, by threatening him with the loss of his job if things are not done according to your wishes.

Mr. DEFFENBAUGH. No, do not understand me to say according to our wishes. There are a lot of things done not according to our wishes, but when they did things we believed were dishonest and in which we believe the court would uphold us, then we thought we had the right to put some pressure on them.

Senator WAGNER. From what you say, I think I can see a chance of one of your employees representing the rest and seeking something you would resent, that his job would not last very long, it seems to me, if it was something you resented.

Mr. DEFFENBAUGH. That may seem so to you, but I believe you are wrong. We treat them with great consideration that way.

Going further now, we are opposed to the closed-shop provision in section 3, clause 3 of section 7, and we are opposed to the word "encourage", in clause 3 of section 7, because it is not very well defined, not definite enough. The word "encourage" is too indefinite.

Senator WAGNER. In your State are not closed shops legal?

Mr. DEFFENBAUGH. Yes, and so are open shops legal.

Senator WAGNER. This does not change that at all, but just keeps it in status quo.

Mr. DEFENBAUGH. This would put it in the hands of a majority to say whether or not you shall have a closed shop.

Senator WAGNER. No; not unless the employer says it. If the employer does not agree with it, it is not to be done.

Mr. DEFENBAUGH. I may have read it wrong, but that is my impression.

Senator WAGNER. It simply says the employer shall not impose it on the workers unless the majority of the workers say they want a closed shop. But, it is a matter of agreement and cannot become effective unless the employer agrees to it.

The CHAIRMAN. It is just permissible. If a majority of the employees vote to have a closed shop they can go to the employer and ask him to make a contract to that effect. The contractor can say no, and that is the end of it. Of course, they can then strike, but there is nothing in the law to compel the employer to sign an agreement for a closed shop, even though two-thirds or three-quarters or nine-tenths of his employees decide to have a closed shop.

Mr. DEFENBAUGH. I am quite glad to hear you say that, Mr. Chairman.

Section 9, clause B is objectionable because I believe that would give persons who are not employees of a particular plant, but who are members of a craft the right to compel a bargain between the plant and its employees.

I have a particular objection, as a lawyer, to the latter part of section 10, clause C, where this language appears:

> In any such proceeding the rules of evidence prevailing in courts of law or equity shall not be controlling.

I believe that is a bad provision, because the rules of evidence we have developed in the courts of law, in my opinion, by the hundreds of years that some of them have been in effect, have proven their value and proven that they are correct in presenting evidence and in presenting evidence that is not competent to prove the point.

Senator WAGNER. Are you acquainted with the public-utilities law of your State?

Mr. DEFENBAUGH. Yes, sir.

Senator WAGNER. Do you know that law has a provision of this kind in it?

Mr. DEFENBAUGH. Yes, sir; and I know it is a poor thing in practice.

Senator WAGNER. Are you acquainted with the Federal Trade Act?

Mr. DEFENBAUGH. No.

Senator WAGNER. That has a similar provision, and so has the act creating the Interstate Commerce Commission, and so has the act creating the Communications Commission; and in fact, I think almost every administrative agency of the Government which is quasi-judicial in its functions has a similar provision or almost identically this provision.

Mr. DEFENBAUGH. I know of many of them, but not all of those you mentioned am I familiar with.

Senator WAGNER. Each of them has that same provision or a similar provision.

Mr. DEFENBAUGH. I say, I am not familiar with all of these you mention, but I know some of them do have that provision.

Senator WAGNER. Of course, we have a review in court; and unless the findings are sustained by evidence, the court would set the findings aside.

Mr. DEFENBAUGH. I object to that, because in the Ohio Rules of Evidence, in review, the scintilla rule has held for many years, and our supreme court is now changing that rule somewhat. It would seem to me that might be satisfactory if, under 10, clause F, which says if the findings of a board are supported by evidence, would be changed so that it would say if they are supported by a preponderance of the evidence.

Senator WAGNER. I have sat on an appellate court, and I have had to read records where the only question involved was the weight of the evidence. It is very hard to decide from reading the record to decide the weight of the evidence, you have got to look at the witnesses; and it is the impression they make upon you and upon the jury that is more persuasive as to what the preponderance of the evidence is, rather than a cold reading of the record afterward, where you haven't the opportunity of observing the demeanor of the witnesses while they are testifying.

Mr. DEFENBAUGH. That is true, and I believe the court in reviewing the evidence will be very slow to reverse a case on the weight of the evidence.

Senator WAGNER. But they always see support for the findings. If there is no evidence to support it they will readily set it aside.

Mr. DEFENBAUGH. Yes; that may be correct.

Going further, another objection is very valid, is that section 10, clause F, gives the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia jurisdiction over these cases, as I understand it, all over the United States, so that an employer might be brought from anywhere in the United States to the District of Columbia, in such a case.

Senator WAGNER. No; they go to the circuit court in their district.

Mr. DEFENBAUGH. I thought I read that in clause F that they may go to the District of Columbia. It says:

> The Board may petition any circuit court of appeals of the United States within any circuit wherein the unfair labor practice in question occurred or wherein such person resides or transacts business, or the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia.

If what you say is true, and this jurisdiction is geographical to each court, I would have no objection to that, but we should not be brought clear across the United States.

Senator WAGNER. There is no such intention.

Mr. DEFENBAUGH. I do not believe it is fair in section 13, clause 1, to permit quite such a wide latitude of the Board or agency to investigate any private business and make it produce all of the private records. I think the power there is too broad.

It is a fact, and I have heard it here for 2 days now, that in most of our Government agencies that is allowed; but on the other hand, if Government agencies have too much power without limitation, they could get intolerant sometimes, and the tendency is to increase their scope of power rather than to decrease it.

Those are the reasons I have given, why the Hocking Glass Co. is opposed to this bill. We believe recovery will be faster if the Government gets more out of the businesses and puts more into businesses.

Senator WAGNER. Of course, this examination you have referred to can only be on matters which relate to the particular controversy and must be pertinent.

Mr. DEFENBAUGH. Yes; that is true, but that would take pretty nearly the whole records of the company, except possibly the record of sales.

Senator WAGNER. I do not know how else to limit it, unless to say it will be limited to relevant matters.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there anything further?

Mr. DEFENBAUGH. No, Mr. Chairman; thank you.

The CHAIRMAN. The following letter has been received by myself relating to this hearing, which I will ask to be inserted in the record in full.

(Said letter is as follows:)

LOS ANGELES, CALIF., March 20, 1935.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
Chairman of the Senate Educational Labor Committee,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE SIR: We, the undersigned, are the elected and duly authorized representatives of the employees to the company organization of the Axelson Manufacturing Co., known as the "joint conference plan", and we certify that we have secured 205 signatures, representing 90 percent of factory employees, in opposition to the Wagner bill and ask that you use your influence to see that this measure is defeated in committee.

The joint conference plan as operated at the Axelson Manufacturing Co. since the summer of 1933 has been entirely satisfactory and without coercion or intimidation by the management. It is our belief, as well as that of our members, that we can be better served under the present arrangement than we can under the proposed Wagner disputes bill.

We feel the Wagner bill would give undue power to union labor, who represent only about 5 percent of labor in this State.

Very truly yours,

WILLIAM D. BUCKMAN,
HARRY L. BOGGS,
EDW. B. FARRELL,
Employees' Representatives Joint Conference Plan.

The CHAIRMAN. The hearing will now recess until 10 o'clock tomorrow morning.

(Thereupon, at 1:10 p. m., the hearing was recessed until Thursday, Mar. 28, 1935, at 10 a. m.)

NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD

THURSDAY, MARCH 28, 1935

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION AND LABOR,
Washington, D. C.

The committee met at 10 a. m., in room 318, Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

Present: Senators Walsh (chairman), Murphy, and Murray.

Also present: Senator Wagner.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will please come to order.

Is Mr. James L. Donnelly present?

Mr. DONNELLY. Yes, sir.

STATEMENT OF JAMES L. DONNELLY, EXECUTIVE VICE PRESIDENT ILLINOIS MANUFACTURERS' ASSOCIATION, CHICAGO, ILL.

The CHAIRMAN. Your full name is James L. Donnelly?

Mr. DONNELLY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Where do you reside?

Mr. DONNELLY. Chicago, Ill.

The CHAIRMAN. You appear before this committee representing the Illinois Manufacturers' Association?

Mr. DONNELLY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed with your statement.

Mr. DONNELLY. The Illinois Manufacturers' Association was organized 42 years ago for the purpose of representing the common interests of Illinois industry. It comprises approximately 2,600 manufacturing industries, with 10,000 industrial executives, employing in normal times over 500,000 employees. The membership of the Illinois Manufacturers' Association, on account of the diversity in the products manufactured and of the variety in size of the individual manufacturing concerns, may be said to represent a cross-section of American industry.

A brief reference to the conditions of the manufacturing industry in general in Illinois at the present time may assist the members of this committee in understanding the apprehension of the manufacturing executives of our State regarding the implications in the Wagner labor disputes bill, S. 1958.

Much misapprehension exists regarding the actual condition of the majority of manufacturing industries. The issuance of unduly optimistic reports by various agencies and the publication from time to time of reports of some manufacturing concerns who have had the good fortune to show some increase in their sales and in their financial position over the previous year have given the impression that conditions in Illinois manufacturing industry generally are greatly improved. This is not the case.

The 1935 industrial census released by the United States Bureau of the Census on March 5, 1935, reveals that the value of products manufactured in Illinois that year slipped back to the point which they reached 20 years ago, or in 1914, and were approximately 60 percent less than in 1929. The number of manufacturing establishments decreased from 15,333 in 1929 to 10,740 in 1933, a decrease of 4,593, or about 30 percent.

The CHAIRMAN. In what period of time was that?

Mr. DONNELLY. Between 1929 and 1933.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the decrease in the number of manufacturing establishments in Illinois?

Mr. DONNELLY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed.

Mr. DONNELLY. Figures for 1934 will show some improvement over 1933, but the gain will not be appreciable for the great majority of Illinois industries.

In the majority of instances where manufacturing industries have experienced a real betterment such industries were manufacturing consumer goods. The demand for such products has been materially aided by the large amount of money being expended for relief purposes. Manufacturing industries generally, and particularly those in the heavy or capital-goods groups, where the bulk of unemployment lies, are still in a definitely unsatisfactory condition. It is a fact not generally recognized that the great majority of manufacturing concerns are relatively small industries. Over 80 percent of the manufacturing industries in Illinois employ less than 100 persons.

Moreover, a large proportion of the manufacturers in Illinois, probably over 50 percent, are reduced to a hand-to-mouth basis as regards working capital. Through the years of the depression they have fought a life-and-death battle to maintain their working capital. If it is further seriously impaired, these manufacturers must give up, and when they do give up the thousands of employees they have kept and are keeping off the unemployed list must give up also. It is doubtful whether the average small manufacturer in Illinois has a cash working capital of his own much greater than 10 percent of his annual pay roll. Moreover, a substantial portion of the larger manufacturers in Illinois are not much better off in this respect. It is obvious from these facts that the great majority of the manufacturing industries in Illinois at this time are particularly susceptible to the disturbing influence of unsound legislative panaceas, designed to impose new burdens and restrictions and calculated to cause more uncertainty and increase operating costs.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you seen the pamphlet issued by the Philadelphia Manufacturers' Association entitled "The Flight of Capital and Industry from Massachusetts"?

Mr. DONNELLY. I believe I have, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. It is along the line you are discussing?

Mr. DONNELLY. Yes; I believe that is correct, Mr. Chairman.

We have had an opportunity to canvass the views of our members on the Wagner labor disputes bill and we are prepared to say that they are universally and unqualifiedly opposed to this measure.

They regard the introduction of this bill at this time, when industry is making desperate efforts to provide employment and promote recovery, as distinctly unfortunate. They believe that the promotion of radical, ill-conceived legislation of this character tends to create apprehension and uncertainty on the part of productive enterprise and materially retards improvement in business conditions. They regard this bill as the most amazing attack upon the rights of employers and the great mass of workers that has thus far been devised.

The alleged purpose of this bill is to "equalize the bargaining power of employers and employees" and "to encourage the amicable settlement of disputes between employers and employees." As a matter of fact, the terms of the bill are in direct contradiction with this declared purpose. The proposal should be entitled "A measure to promote strife and increase unemployment." It is clearly designed to discourage the friendly settlement of industrial-relations problems, to encourage strife and dislocation, and to delegate to labor union agents, aided and abetted by a so-called "National Labor Board", a dictatorial power over American industry.

The obvious purpose of this bill is to force the closed shop upon the industry with the aid of Government compulsion. The bill is designed to confer special privileges exclusively upon one group. The employer, the unorganized worker, the member of a minority union, or of a plant employee representation group are given no protection.

This bill would place a premium on strikes, nullify employees' contracts, destroy employee representation plans, force the closed shop upon employers, guarantee legal irresponsibility of labor organizers, provide for gag rule of industry, insure domination of labor boards by organized labor agents, provide for star-chamber proceedings by labor boards, and result in unlimited inquiries and investigations by Government agents.

This bill does not merely concern employers brought before labor boards, or involved in union disputes. It directly affects the lives of merchants, professional men, farmers, and every member of the consuming public.

The bill creates a National Labor Board of three members with extensive powers to summon witnesses on complaint of anyone, to take evidence on matters not covered by the complaint, at will, to conduct hearings without regard to rules of evidence, to demand books and papers indiscriminately and without responsibility. Its findings of fact are inclusive if supported by any evidence.

This bill, advanced as a means to promote recovery, would in fact retard recovery. It would create strife, widen the gap between the worker and the employer, destroy the peaceful and satisfactory relations which now generally exist, simply in order to satisfy the desire of a small group of organized labor leaders for a complete monopoly.

A brief examination of some of the specific provisions of the bill evidences the amazing disregard which the proponents of the measure apparently have for the most elementary rights of the employer and the great body of American workers.

Section 7 of the bill would make it unlawful to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the right to self-organization, to form, join, or assist labor organizations, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and to engage in concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection.

The scope of the phrase "to engage in concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection" is so extensive that it would effectively tie the hands of employers behind their backs and leave them subject to any punishment that ruthless labor leaders or union organizers or their following might care to subject them to.

By this bill, employees are specifically given the right to use all means they may conceive, including strike, boycott, coercion, terrorization, and all other of the common means of unscrupulous organizers and labor unionists to force an employer to do their bidding, but it is made unlawful for the employer to so much as raise his hand or his voice to protect himself, his business, or his employees.

Section 8 prohibits that an employer "interfere with the formation or administration of any labor organization or contribute financial or other support to it."

"Other support" would no doubt be construed by labor boards to include moral support, advice, or counsel, the furnishing of a place to meet, expression of opinion as to the relative merits of organizations or leaders, encouragement, or any other form of support.

If an employer should lend support of any kind to the employees in organizing or maintaining their own union, that would apparently make their union ineligible to represent the employees, even though its membership constituted a majority.

The result is, as a practical matter, no plan of plant-employee representation, particularly if a smaller concern would ever be eligible to act as the representative of the employees.

With very few exceptions, the A. F. of L. has a monopoly of outside unions, and the net result would be, as a practical matter, that under this bill only the A. F. of L. would be eligible to represent any employees through the "majority rule."

In practice, employers do give counsel, advice, and encouragement to their employees in any movement or enterprise that the employer believes will be advantageous to the employees. This advice and counsel is given in a manner that is entirely in conformity with the provisions of the National Industrial Recovery Act.

If employers did fail to give counsel, advice, and encouragement to such movements, whether they be a plant or company union, a baseball team, a benefit association, a savings association, a social organization, or any other such movement, it ordinarily would fail.

Generally, the employer is the employee's best friend and ordinarily employees have confidence in their employer in connection with their group activities that causes them to turn to the employer for counsel, advice, help, and encouragement.

This bill, contrary to what is the fact, is predicated upon the assumption that the employer is not the employee's best friend, but is the employee's enemy, is one who is not to be trusted by the employee even in matters where the employee has confidence in his employer and desires to turn to his employer for counsel, advice, help, or encouragement in his group activities.

The whole spirit of this bill is to make enemies of employers and employees.

The bill is clearly calculated to destroy the satisfactory relations that exist in most plants between employer and employee, and thus to destroy the entire spirit of cooperation between employer and employee in this country, which is essential to progress and prosperity.

Under section 8 (3), it would be unlawful for an employer—> be discrimination in regard to hire or tenure of employment, or any term or condition of employment, to encourage or discourage membership in any labor organization—provided he may make a closed shop agreement with a labor organization which is eligible to represent the majority, that is, with an A. F. of L. labor union.

This, taken with the other provisions of the bill, is a most extraordinary subsidy to the A. F. of L., amounting almost to a guaranty of the closed A. F. of L. shop.

Under section 8 (4) it would be unlawful—> to discharge or otherwise discriminate against an employee because he has filed charges or given testimony under this act.

As has been pointed out, there is no requirement as to what may be considered "testimony."

Under this provision, an employee would be encouraged to malign and abuse the employer, and thereby secure a lease on his job.

> Section 9 (a) provides that representatives designated * * * by the majority of the employees in a unit * * * shall be the exclusive representatives of all employees in such unit for the purposes of collective bargaining in respect to rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, or other conditions of employment * * *.

In the Houde Engineering Corporation case the National Labor Relations Board discussed the standards set-up in the National Industrial Recovery Act, and held:

> It is obvious that these desired standards and the "united action of labor and management", which Congress contemplated, could scarcely be effected except by collective agreements between employers and representatives of employees resulting from collective bargaining.

Thus, under section 9 (a), the representatives of a majority would have the exclusive right to make agreements covering rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, or other conditions of employment, under which every employee would be bound for the period of time set in the agreement.

Section 9 (a) makes a proviso that specifically permits any individual employee or group of employees to present grievances to their employer, clearly making this right of an individual or minority group his or its sole right with respect to the sale of his or its labor.

There has never been anything in the history of this country to compare with these provisions, aside from slavery and war-time conscription.

Whether an employer has engaged in an unfair labor practice, as defined in this bill, is inherently a question of fact.

This bill provides:

> The findings of the Board as to facts, if supported by evidence, shall be conclusive.

There are no provisions in the bill as to what shall be "evidence." Section 10 (c) provides:

In any such proceeding, the rules of evidence prevailing in courts of law or equity shall not be controlling.

There is no requirement that witnesses be sworn.

There is no requirement that any of the members of the Board have had judicial training or experience; in fact, any agent or agency designated by the Board may hold hearings.

It is inconceivable, under such circumstances, that there would not always be "evidence" to support any findings the Board or its agent or agencies might choose to make.

Thus, the Board would have the power to determine finally and conclusively the guilt of any employer, the ineligibility of any labor organization to act as the representative of the employees, and the character and extent of "restitution" required to be made.

Under section 10 (h), appeals shall not "unless specifically ordered by court, operate as a stay of the Board's order."

The effect of this provision is that the Board's decision would become immediately effective and could not, as a practical matter, be stayed until after the lapse of such a considerable time that would be involved in applications to the court in hearings on such applications for a stay as would make the stay ordinarily too late to prevent the damage that the Board's decisions would effect.

Under section 13, the Board or its agents or agencies would have the power of access and examination and investigation to all affairs of every employer; would have the power to compel testimony and production of documentary matter by all employers.

No employer would be excused from attending, testifying, or producing documents on the ground that this testimony or evidence might tend to incriminate him or subject him to penalty or forfeiture.

Anyone who would resist or impede or interfere with a member of the Board or any of its agents or agencies, would be subject to a fine of not more than $5,000 or by imprisonment for not more than 1 year, or both.

The relations between an employer and his employees go to everything that an employer does in connection with his business.

The power of investigation under these provisions is absolutely limitless.

The result of closed-shop union domination has always been to increase prices and restrict output. Any further increase of costs of industrial goods at this time would necessarily result in increased prices to the consumer, would further impair the ability of farmers and white-collar workers to buy goods produced. This would result in a decrease in consumption and further unemployment.

One of the principal reasons for the failure of the country to make more rapid strides toward reducing the army of unemployed has been the restriction on production resulting from undue increases in operating costs. This measure, if enacted, would no doubt aggravate this tendency.

The bill would, in effect, make unlawful any customary friendly relationship between the employer and his employees relating to terms of conditions of employment, including the fixing of compensation, hours of employment, etc.

The measure is predicated on the false premise that coercion exists only on the part of the employer, whereas it is a universally recognized fact, not only on the part of the employers, but among the great mass of workers, that many organizations who purport to represent the worker largely depend upon force and coercion for any effectiveness they might have. This bill would prevent practically any effort on the part of the employer to advise and counsel his workers regarding the condition of their employment, whereas it would permit and legalize almost unlimited coercion and force on the part of labor agents who may allege to be representatives of the workmen.

The primary problem before this Congress is, I understand, that relating to the reduction of unemployment. In determining whether the measure now under consideration is calculated to help solve this problem, it is respectfully suggested the members of this committee study the relationship of the organized labor movement in this country to the question of unemployment. We submit that such inquiry will reveal that unemployment has been unusually acute in these industries which are highly unionized and that in the instance of the majority of industries where organized labor has secured a dominant position, unrest, dislocation, and internal strife, with accompanying reduction in opportunities for employment, have been prevalent.

The manufacturers and all other citizens of Illinois have had an opportunity to closely observe the unfortunate results attendant upon the domination of several lines of business by organized labor agents.

Quite frequently the policies adopted by local agents are not consistent with, and very often beyond, the control of their superior officers. The violence in the Illinois coal fields, where the coal miners' war is still unsettled, has caused 75 deaths, 500 casualties, and million of dollars' worth of property damage, including the bombing of 25 buildings. A competent authority on racketeering activities in Chicago estimates that the racketeering cost to the citizens of that city alone has aggregated as much as $145,000,000 in a single year, or almost as much as the annual municipal budget. Quite naturally, industrial executives view with alarm any legislation which may result in this costly strife and dislocation being projected into manufacturing fields generally.

The provisions of section 7 (a) of the National Industrial Recovery Act makes generous grants of power to American workmen and their properly selected representatives. The manufacturers in Illinois are making an earnest effort to conform to the provisions of section 7 (a), as well as with the other requirements of the National Recovery Administration, although conformity to its requirements in many instances has imposed a burden of unprecedented severity. It seems manifestly proper, therefore, that the Federal Government should avoid, at this time, the imposition of additional requirements having to do with the subject of industrial relations. A measure of this kind, or any measure which is designed to increase the power of the National Labor Board, will obviously result in strife, unrest, and dislocation which may defeat the objectives of the National Recovery program, namely, increased purchasing power and reduction in unemployment.

Senator WAGNER. Mr. Donnelly, are you acquainted with the platform adopted by the Manufacturers Association at White Sulphur Springs at their convention?

Mr. DONNELLY. Just in a very general way; yes.

Senator WAGNER. I heard you say the majority rule is perpetuated, and that is the reason I want to read you from the platform of your own Manufacturers Association. That platform says:

> Under appropriate safeguards, all approved competitive practices and prohibitions submitted by the properly defined majority group of trade or industry shall be binding upon the minority.

There they adopted the majority rule.

Mr. DONNELLY. Even assuming for the purposes of this discussion that the majority rule, as stated in that platform from which you have just read, reflects the viewpoint of the group I am identified with——

Senator WAGNER. How is that? I did not understand.

Mr. DONNELLY. I say, even assuming for the moment that the group I represent is in sympathy with the majority rule, as suggested by the platform from which you read, I think there is a very fundamental difference between the majority rule in its relation to industry and the majority rule in its relation to labor.

Senator WAGNER. I know you consider that the same rule should not apply to the workers that applies to your own association.

Mr. DONNELLY. I do not admit that.

Senator WAGNER. What is that?

Mr. DONNELLY. I do not want to be understood as saying that, Senator Wagner.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you finished your statement in that regard, Mr. Donnelly?

Mr. DONNELLY. No; I have not?

Senator WAGNER. I beg your pardon. I thought you had finished.

The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed.

Mr. DONNELLY. In the abstract, the majority rule should apply to the employer in the same manner and with the same force that it does to the worker, and I think there cannot be any disagreement about that insofar as the theory of the matter is concerned. As a practical matter, any agreement that the employers may enter into under a code of fair competition is subject to approval by the United States Government; and the Government is a party to that agreement, with the purpose of safeguarding the interest of the public; whereas the majority rule in its application to the employee is not subject to that same careful supervision by governmental authority. So, in their operation, they are entirely different, and in the result, I think it is obvious they are entirely different.

Senator WAGNER. That is your answer?

Mr. DONNELLY. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there any further questions?

Senator WAGNER. No; I have no more questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you, Mr. Donnelly, for your appearance and the statement you have made.

Mr. Cunningham, if you will come forward the committee will be pleased to hear you.

STATEMENT OF JAMES D. CUNNINGHAM, PRESIDENT REPUBLIC FLOW METERS CO., AND FORMER PRESIDENT OF THE ILLINOIS MANUFACTURERS' ASSOCIATION, CHICAGO, ILL.

The CHAIRMAN. Your full name is James D. Cunningham?

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You are president of the Republic Flow Meters Co.?

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You are also former president of the Illinois Manufacturers' Association?

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What does the Republic Flow Meters Co. manufacture?

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. We manufacture industrial instruments—meters for measuring steam, water, gas, air, and so on.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you more than one plant?

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. No; just one.

The CHAIRMAN. How many employees do you have?

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. About 200.

The CHAIRMAN. Where is the plant located?

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. In Chicago, Ill.

The CHAIRMAN. Are your employees organized?

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed with your statement.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I am appearing here as an average manufacturer; I am not a so-called "big manufacturer", or a small one; but our 200-employee pay roll, I would say, represents quite a good average of industry in the United States.

When I read the declaration of policies of Senator Wagner's bill, I felt a little chagrined at my ability on employee-employer relationships.

We have always been fair and square with the employees. We have never given them any cause for worry, and we have never chiseled on their wages. We are paying going wages, and in some instances we are paying higher than the going wages, so that we are not the chiseling type—the kind that is dominating the employees; and I know a lot of them.

I walk through the shop and ask them how their families are; and they know me, and I know them, and our relations have always been very pleasant.

I think that is the average condition in the average-size shop today. The employer is not dominating his employees. I just can't see it that way. Our relationships have been very good with our men. But what I would like to know is what you are trying to accomplish in this bill. Are you trying to get after those chiseling types of employers? If you are, I am for it 100 percent.

The CHAIRMAN. What is being attempted in this bill, using your own industry as an illustration, is that if your employees desire to form a labor organization of any kind or character they choose, they shall have that right; and that if you should try to prevent or interfere or coerce your employees against forming an organization, you would be charged with an unfair practice and be subject to the provisions of this law.

The bill also provides that if these men of your employees shall form whatever kind of organization they see fit, they can elect representatives of the group of 200 men, and these representatives will be the spokesmen for the other employees in meeting with you for the purpose of settling grievances that may arise.

The law would require you to meet them and in good faith discuss grievances, which you probably already do.

This bill would not compel you to accept any terms and conditions they may seek to impose on you, but you could not slam the door in their face, and you could not meet them in a hostile attitude, and in an attitude of unfriendliness, and in a predetermined disposition not to yield in any way and not to listen to them.

This law also provides that if you discharge any one of your employees because he did join a particular organization of his own choosing, and that was the reason for his discharge, that would be an unfair labor practice.

It also provides that you shall not interfere with the free choice of representatives, or punish by discharging those who are members.

In brief, the law seeks to provide unrestrained and uninterfered methods for your employees to organize and to approach you through any organization of their choosing, for the purpose of discussing with you their grievances. That, in brief, is the purpose of this law.

It does not tell you to enter into any agreement, but you are free to do as you wish about that. It does not compel your men to form an organization. It does not indicate the kind of organization, but so far as this bill is concerned, they can go on just as they are. However, the moment they start to form an organization and you interfere with them to the extent of coercing them, then you would be subject to what is described in this bill as an unfair labor practice.

Do I make it clear?

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Very much so, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. Very many people think this bill forces employees to organize, but it does not. A good many people think it favors trade unions as against so-called "company unions" that are not dominated by the management. It does not do that.

A great many think you would be expected to actually make a contract with your employees when they come to discuss collective bargaining with you. That is not required in this bill. We cannot make you or any other employer in a free country like this make a contract that you do not wish to make.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Thank you, Senator Walsh, for that explanation.

The CHAIRMAN. There is a feeling among employers which I think we all realize is due partly to some propaganda, and due partly to some views expressed by some who have appeared in favor of the bill, that the whole thing tends to national unionization of labor. I think a great many employers have that feeling, that the result or the tendency of this legislation will be in that direction, but there is certainly nothing in this bill to indicate that, and there is no disposition on the part of this committee to favor any form of organization as against any other form, so long as the organization is a free one, so long as it is not a makeshift organization, so long as it is not dominated by the employers.

Have I helped you, Mr. Cunningham?

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Yes; you have, Senator Walsh. However, may I say this, I do not really see any occasion for it.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course, there is not any law against stealing, because 99 percent of the people do not steal, do they?

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Yet we have to have a law against stealing, because there are people who do it.

Now, there are some employers, according to the evidence Senator Wagner's committee has heard, and other departments of our Government, that have shown a disposition not to recognize the theory of collective bargaining, which, after all, is simply the right to meet and confer in good faith to see if you can reach a friendly agreement, and there are other employers who have sought to direct their employees, through antagonism against one form of unionism, in favor of another form of organization, and there have been some abuses among the limited number of employers in the mass.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Do you not agree with me that the mass of employers are such as I represent?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; I know the mass means well, and intends well, and we recognize they have been subjected to extreme measures at times upon the part of groups who are organized among their employees. We recognize that, but on the other hand, there have been some employers who have not acted in good faith, and this legislation is to define the rights of employees leading up to collective bargaining.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. There are certain things I want to bring out.

Senator WAGNER. May I ask a question here?

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Certainly.

Senator WAGNER. You favored the workmen's compensation law in your own State, didn't you?

Mr. CUNNINGTON. Yes.

Senator WAGNER. That was not passed because the majority of the employers treated the employees unfairly when they were injured, but the majority took care of the workers formerly. However, there was a minority where, when a worker was injured, he was left to his own remedies, and we had to make a law of universal application because of the minority of employers that would not care for their workers when they were injured. For that reason most of these laws are directed against the minority, and not against the majority at all.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Don't you think on the workmen's compensasation, we all got behind that because it really clarified the situation that was rather doubtful before, as to the amount of injuries for which compensation should be paid?

Senator WAGNER. It changed the fundamental law of the land, in that a workman was compensated, whether he was guilty of negligence or not, and gave him absolute security.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Of course, we are up against a lot of ill-advised and perhaps not such honest attorneys, who would take our employee's cases and make a mountain out of a molehill, and they are doing that now somewhat in the sylacosis cases, which are rather difficult to handle.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course, what you are afraid of is that your workmen will be forced by pressure to organize a union and that they will be dominated and controlled by agitators to make them organize a union.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Yes; that is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course, that is being done now, without this law.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Yes; but it is not being done in such a drastic measure as it will be done under the new bill.

Senator WAGNER. Of course, I do not want to be understood that in every case where workers make a demand to try to better their conditions because some agitator has induced them to make the demand, and if you refuse, that in many cases the workers strike for better conditions, that the strike is justified.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. In some instances I would say yes; that is correct.

Senator WAGNER. And then I do not want to say every time the workers strike for the betterment of their own conditions, it is because of some agitator's efforts.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Senator Wagner, you appointed me on the Chicago regional labor board.

Senator WAGNER. I know that well enough.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. And in that connection I want to bring out some experiences that are beneficial to both of us, I think. At the time the board was organized there were 4 labor members and 4 industrial members, and 1 impartial chairman. We heard cases on that board as a complete panel at that time, but the cases began to pile up so that we could not hear them all within the time we had. We then split it up and divided up into separate panels, its members being 1 from industry, 1 from labor, and 1 impartial chairman, and that expedited the situation very well.

However, in that connection, I have had a dose of section 7 (a) on that labor board, which, as I see it, is a mild form of labor legislation, and I am awfully fearful as to what will happen on this other form if it goes into effect.

Most of the cases that came up there were cases where a manufacturer had discharged some of his employees. We heard the case, and invariably the board would say to this manufacturer, you have got to take these men back you discharged because you discharged them on account of union affiliations.

Picture, if you can, my own plant, with labor organizers coming in there. They are perfectly able to come in, because I cannot stop them. Picture them coming in and doing that, and terribly upsetting my relations with the employees, to such an extent that some of the fellows began to lay down on their job and I fire them, which I should do, then they will run down to the labor board and haul me in there, then the grilling you get down the regional labor board is some grilling.

I felt sorry for these fellows that were brought in, they were manhandled by some of the labor members, which I think is indicative of their attitude toward an employer.

They demanded that these men be taken back, and what does that do to the morale of your organization? You fire a man because he is loafing on the job, or have various other difficulties you may get into with your employees, and then he comes back on the job after that, after the board forces him back, and he goes around to his fellow workers and says, "I cannot be fired, the Government protects me"—and that is said so many times—that "the Government will not allow me to be fired."

In that way, the employer might lose all hold of his employees, they run him ragged, and tell him what he can do.

In several instances I voted against these chiseling fellows, and, to use this slang expression, I gave them the works, and they should have had the works.

The CHAIRMAN. There is nothing more unpleasant in life than to have somebody in your employ whom you feel it not loyal, and whom you feel is a time server, trying to do as little as he can, and who is injuring the morale of other employees.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. It is. I have no sympathy at all for these fellows that come in there and exploit labor and do everything they can to them, and those are the fellows I like to see given everything we can, and I have given it to them on the labor board, too.

These men that come in there are very unfamiliar with the method of unionizing a shop, they have never had it, they have worked 20 or 30 years without any union at all. Then section 7 (a) came into the picture, and these labor organizers went out and bragged about the fact that Congress in the United States had at last given them full sway over labor relations in the plants.

They said, if you join our organization we will guarantee that you will have your jobs always. They were very vicious.

These men did not want to join unions. I know a lot of them did not want to join unions, but if you have got a few in the plant that are easily swayed by the organizers, it does not take a long time for a little group to gather about and have little meetings, and then meetings at the labor halls, and they can very easily take over the plant and make a union shop out of it.

The Chicago Regional Labor Board sent a telegram to President Roosevelt the other week, a copy of which I will hand to you, and you may read it yourselves, but I will not read it aloud

The CHAIRMAN. This telegram may go into the record.

(The above-mentioned telegram is as follows:)

MARCH 26, 1935.

To the PRESIDENT,

The White House, Washington, D. C.:

The undersigned members of the Chicago Regional Labor Board directed a telegram to you on May 29, 1934, expressing the conviction that the passage of the Wagner labor disputes bill, then pending in the Federal Congress, would promote industrial strife. Our combined experience as members of your board since that date prompts us to express the same apprehension regarding the Wagner bill now pending in the Federal Congress. We are convinced that the passage of the Wagner National Labor Relations Act, containing the majority rule provisions, would be the signal for unprecedented industrial warfare throughout the Middle West. This bill, and particularly the provisions thereof designed to eliminate company employee representation plans, are predicated upon the false premise that the employers are the enemies of their employes. While the ostensible purpose of this bill is to "promote equality of bargaining power between employers and employes" as a matter of fact the terms of the bill are in direct contradiction with this declared purpose. This measure, if enacted into law, would create strife and widen the gap between the employer and the employee. It would destroy the satisfactory and peaceful relations which now exist between most employers and their employes solely in order to satisfy the demands of a limited number of professional labor leaders who purport to speak for the great body of American workers, but who in fact represent only a limited proportion, not exceeding 10 percent of the total number of American workmen. The entire bill is designed to force the American worker and his employers under the domination of and subject to the tribute of professional labor leaders notwithstanding the fact that in practically every industry where such domination now exists extensive strife and dislocation have occurred and wages and prices beyond the willingness and ability of the consumer to pay have resulted. We respectfully urge that this measure should not be enacted into law.

Senator WAGNER. You sent a similar telegram last year.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Yes.

Senator WAGNER. So this is not new. There were other members of the Board that did not agree with you.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. The labor members did not, of course, but this was a reiteration of what was said before.

Senator WAGNER. Is the chairman's name on here?

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. No; he is an impartial chairman.

Senator WAGNER. In other words, the employer members on the Board signed it?

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Yes.

Senator WAGNER. I think those I appointed are still there.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. No; not all of them, but most of us are still there. The things that prompted us to send the telegram last year prompted us to send this one, because we knew the proposed law would be worse than the law we were trying to keep up with.

The CHAIRMAN. How many members are there on the Board?

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. There are 8 industrial members and 8 labor members, about 16, and about 3 impartial chairmen.

Senator WAGNER. I think I might say here, I think this is the only regional board out of 19 in which the employers members took the attitude you did. I do not know that they are all for this proposed legislation, but they did not feel you should take the attitude you did.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. I am surprised to hear that, but we were right worried about it.

If this new bill is passed, it creates a three-man board which I do not think can be impartial, if I may be allowed to say so.

The CHAIRMAN. You may speak as freely as you desire, Mr. Cunningham.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. My experience on the Regional Labor Board is anything but conducive to an impartial recognition of the employer. These three men, I understand, are appointed for 1, 3, and 5 years, and after that for a 5-year term. You cannot get a business man to sit on the Board, becaose he has got to run his business, and you have got to get some professional who will sit on the Board for that term.

I doubt very much if you can get three men, if you search the country for them, taking them out of industry, men who know industrial problems, and have them sit on such a Board and give impartial judgments on labor problems.

I think this Board is being given too much power, in that these three men are not lawyers. I do not think you will appoint lawyers on this Board, although I have the greatest admiration for a lawyer. But I doubt if you will appoint lawyers on the new Board set-up.

That means these men are more or less unfamiliar with legal practices, but you have given them a tremendous amount of legal power to hear testimony, to cross-examine, and then to make recommendations, which is really the province of the court.

These findings are going to be severe, there is no question about it. They have got the power to haul me in there, for example, and say, Cunningham, you do this, and if I do not, it is just too bad, and in that case I would like to be heard by men who are experts in jurisprudence.

Senator WAGNER. Of course, you have a chairman now who is a lawyer.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. You mean Dean Spencer?

Senator WAGNER. Are you speaking about the regional boards or the National Board?

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. I am speaking about the National Board?

Senator WAGNER. Mr. Biddle, the chairman of the present Board, is a very distinguished lawyer from the State of Pennsylvania, and in the State of Wisconsin, Mr. Garrison is a very eminent lawyer.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Senator Walsh has stated, as I understand, he would not feel justified in settling labor disputes because he is not in contact with the workers. He is a splendid lawyer, but he is not in the field of the workers.

Senator WAGNER. I thought you said you were apprehensive that no lawyer would be appointed on this board. Is that your attitude?

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. No; I do not think you will appoint three lawyers on the board.

Senator WAGNER. Do you want three lawyers, or do not want one lawyer?

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. I say this, that you cannot get three men to sit on this Board who are in position to give good judgment in labor cases, because you cannot get industry to give you a man for 5 years to sit on the Board. I think this bill will absolutely open the doors to the American Federation of Labor to come in and dominate the plant situation. I may be wrong, but as I read the bill, I cannot see where any company union, or, let us say, the employee representation plan can be effectuated through this bill. We cannot say anything to our employees, we cannot counsel with them.

Senator WAGNER. Where is that in the bill? Of course, if you mean by that a union financially supported by the employer, a union of that kind, of course, cannot exist under this bill, and I doubt whether you would advocate that.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Yes; but, for instance, we have some bowling teams in our plant, and under this bill you could not put up a $10 prize for the men in that connection.

Senator WAGNER. Is that the basis for your objection?

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. No; but the labor organizers will pick on that, because I have seen them do that in the Regional Labor Board, and you will find them picking on the most trivial things and lay you out cold.

I feel sorry for a fellow that has to come before the Regional Labor Board in Chicago.

The other night I was thinking about this, and I wondered why, if I was a union man, I should pay dues to the union if they have a majority in the plant, and I have got to abide by the majority rule, and I would not like to pay $2 or $3 a month because what would be the use? The majority would rule me anyway.

Senator WAGNER. What is there in the bill to compel them to join a union?

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Nothing, of course, but the labor unions will say they must join the union, and the fellows that do not want to spend the money will be forced to do it; and I have seen that, too.

Senator WAGNER. Of course, carrying your contention to its logical conclusion, you would be opposed to any efforts on the part of anybody to induce workers for their own benefit to organize themselves into a definite organization for the purpose of furthering their own interest. I think that would be extremely un-American if we did that, that is going back to the old days.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Senator, I do not see any reason for this at all, and that is why I asked why do you want to put this bill through?

Senator WAGNER. I thought Senator Walsh thoroughly explained that it is for the type of employers who will not permit his employees to organize, or who has his own organization for his own purposes. I could not explain it as well as Senator Walsh did, myself.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. That is true; he made a very clear explanation of it, but we are getting along splendidly now, and I think my company and myself present a true picture of the American manufacturers today in 90 percent of the cases. As soon as somebody comes out and tells my men that Congress has given them the right to organize and wants them to organize in the American Federation of Labor, it is going to create a tremendous amount of trouble. We are getting alone fine now, and why don't you let us stay where we are, and do something else for the small majority that do not want to cooperate with us?

Senator WAGNER. Congress has already asserted, through the National Recovery Act, that workers shall have the right to organize.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. And we are having a difficult time with section 7 (a), too.

Senator WAGNER. You do not think they should have that right?

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. No; I don't think they need it.

Senator WAGNER. All right, if you do not think they should have the right to organize, you and I cannot agree.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. They have the right to organize, yes; but let them organize through the proper channels, and come to the average fellow who wants to give them a square deal, and they can organize them. If Senator Walsh was on the other side of my employees, we would get along splendidly, but the trouble is we have these racketeers to deal with.

The CHAIRMAN. I am beginning to think my qualifications as chairman of a labor committee is being impeached.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. I really cannot get along with the labor element in Chicago, and I don't think it is any different anywhere else.

I would be glad to answer any further questions you may have.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Craigmile, if you will come forward, the committee will be glad to hear your statement.

STATEMENT OF C. S. CRAIGMILE, BELDEN MANUFACTURING CO., REPRESENTING THE ELECTRIC INDUSTRY OF ILLINOIS

The CHAIRMAN. Your full name is Charles S. Craigmile?

Mr. CRAIGMILE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And what is your residence?

Mr. CRAIGMILE. Hinsdale, Ill.

The CHAIRMAN. What is your position?

Mr. CRAIGMILE. Vice president in charge of manufacturing of the Belden Manufacturing Co. of Chicago.

The CHAIRMAN. What do they manufacture?

Mr. CRAIGMILE. Insulated copper wire.

The CHAIRMAN. How large is that industry?

Mr. CRAIGMILE. Our plant employs a total of about 1,000 people.

The CHAIRMAN. Are your employees organized?

Mr. CRAIGMILE. They are not.

The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed with your statement.

Mr. CRAIGMILE. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I appear before this committee as a member of the Illinois Manufacturers' Association, and as a representative of the electrical industry in our State. The purpose of this brief is to register a vigorous protest against Senate bill 1958, known as the "Wagner bill", and to recommend to this committee that in the interest of business recovery, it should not be favorably reported.

Last year this committee had a similar bill before it for consideration. No piece of proposed legislation caused such a storm of protest as this one, and yet in spite of that protest, the committee favorably reported a revised measure. It soon became evident that this bill, which was Senate bill 2926, could not be passed, and Public Resolution No. 44 was finally substituted. In my opinion, gentlemen the reason the Wagner bill was not passed by the Senate was that a majority of the Senators realized that back of the stated purpose of the bill was the danger that it would give an organized minority power which would seriously harm the right of every employee in this country to freely obtain employement. That danger still exists.

Senate bill 1958, which is now before this committee for consideration, states its purpose as follows:

> A bill to promote equality of bargaining power between employers and employees, to diminish the causes of labor disputes, to create a National Labor Relations Board, and for other purposes.

The last words, "other purposes" are, indeed, well chosen. As a matter of fact, this bill might well be entitled:

> A bill to turn over the all-important employee-employer relationship to organized labor, to take away all bargaining power of employees and to increase labor disputes.

With that title, the words "other purposes" could be omitted.

Back of every justified piece of legislation should be a definite need which that particular bill, if voted into law, will at least help to fill. Laws should not be put on the statute books merely because a minority group, large or small, feels duty bound to introduce bills at every session of this Congress to advance its selfish interests. If membership in an outside labor organization is desired by a majority of the employees in this country, let them decide that issue themselves. You should not consider passing a law to take away from them their freedom of choice, and force them to join any organization not of their own choosing.

The proponents of this bill seem to be laboring under the delusion that the relationship between employee and employer is one of antagonism, instead of one of cooperation. Nothing could be further from the truth. Alfred P. Sloan, Jr., president of General Motors Corporation, in an address before the Illinois Manufacturers' Association on December 11, 1934, so well expressed the real essence of this relationship that I will quote his own words:

> Looking toward the achievement of our objective, there is nothing more important than the establishment and maintenance of an effective working relationship between employer and employee, in which the rights and interests of each may be mutually understood and kept in equitable adjustment. A happy and contented employee, with a reasonable assurance of a job, and with the maximum possible continuity of employment, means increased efficiency and effectiveness throughout the whole production machine, and even more importantly, exerts a stabilizing influence on our whole social structure. * * * There is a direct relationship between business in general and workers in general, as consumers of industry's products. Unfortunately, many apparent conflicts arise; but, fortunately, and I say this most sincerely, analysis demonstrates that by far the great majority of those conflicts are traceable to a lack of mutual understanding, or a lack of appreciation of the facts, or too short-sighted viewpoint on one side or the other. In most part, they are psychological in character, and trivial so far as their economic significance is concerned. Progress in this important relationship can only be made to the extent that enlightened employers and enlightened employees realize that they have a community of interest and that community of interest dictates the wisdom of maintaining the highest possible degree of cooperation and the most harmonious of relationships.

Mr. Sloan is the head of a very large corporation. I represent a medium-sized one. I have used his exact words to show the necessity of cooperation and not antagonism between employee and employer only because he has expressed it so much better than I could hope to. Our own experience over the 20 years I have been intimately familiar with it has clearly demonstrated that the remarkable degree of cooperation between our employees and our management, which we have enjoyed, has been the very cornerstone of our continued successful existence.

There are two possible approaches to the solution of the question as to how sound industrial relations can best be maintained. One is the solution offered by our present industrial experience. Under this arrangement, every workman is free to choose what form of organization, if any, he believes will best further his interests. They have chosen, and there is overwhelming evidence to show that they want to retain this freedom. The fact that the membership of the American Federation of Labor has never exceeded 10 percent of employed people indicates clearly that employees of their own free will, will never submit to domination by any labor organization.

The other proposed solution to the problem is the one which underlies this bill, which is the extension of the closed shop. Again, on this issue, Mr. Sloan made the following exceedingly clear statement on the opposition to this proposed solution:

> First, I believe that workers should be free. Their right to work should not depend upon their membership in a labor organization. Secondly, it is axiomatic in employer-employee relationships that organized labor, as such, can never be satisfied. It cannot afford to be satisfied, for being dissatisfied is the very foundation of its continued existence. It is the necessity of never stopping in its demands that forces leaders of organized labor to exert an unsound and uneconomic influence on our whole national economy.
> In my judgment, industry should not only have the right, but should demand full opportunity to demonstrate, unhampered by the restriction of legal regulation and on the basis of experience, that method that serves best to promote, in the broadest way, the welfare of the greatest number.

I understand that Mr. Green, in appearing as a proponent of this bill, described his organization as a bulwark against strikes and threatened it would no longer urge workers to be patient if this bill should fail. It is time that threats of this type as a means of forcing unjustified legislation be stopped, or at least looked at for their true value. I personally heard Mr. Dillon make the same sort of statement before the National Recovery Board. Let us look to the workers in the automotive industry to see what their answer has been. The conference board service letter issued under date of February 28, 1935, by the National Industrial Conference Board, includes the following statement in regard to the results of the recent elections in the automobile plants held under the supervision of the Automobile Labor Board:

> Nominating elections have been conducted in 15 plants. Of a total of 73,862 eligible voters, 66,122, or 89.6 percent, have participated in these elections. The latest composite figures giving the total votes cast in these elections show that 76 percent of the voters have indicated no labor-group affiliation, and are therefore carried as "unaffiliated." Employee-representation bodies have been specified in 11 percent, American Federation of Labor unions by 4 percent, labor unions not affiliated with the American Federation of Labor 6 percent, and the remaining 3 percent have blank or void ballots.

In other words, gentlemen, the American Federation of Labor, which represents approximately 10 percent of employed people, has a perfect right to represent their members, but under no circumstances should it be assumed that they express the opinion of the large majority of employees. This majority is not threatening you with strikes if this bill is not passed, and as a matter of fact, the passage of this bill is much more liable to bring serious industrial disorders than its failure.

The principle of majority rule is written into this bill in the following words in section 9–a:

> Representatives designated or selected for the purposes of collective bargaining by the majority of the employees in a unit appropriate for such purposes, shall be the exclusive representatives of all the employees in such unit for the purposes of collective bargaining in respect to rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, or other basic conditions of employment: Provided, That any individual employee or group of employees shall have the right at any time to present grievances to their employer through representatives of their own choosing.

This principle takes away the right of a minority group, even though it be 49.9 percent of the total, to select representatives of their own choosing for collective bargaining or to bargain individually. The President of the United States made the following statesmanlike pronouncement of this vital question at the time of his announcement of the creation of the Automobile Labor Board:

> In the settlement just accomplished two outstanding advances have been achieved. In the first place, we have set forth a basis on which, for the first time in any large industry, a more comprehensive, a more adequate, and a more equitable system of industrial relations may be built than ever before. It is my hope that this system may develop into a kind of works council in industry in which all groups of employees, whatever may be their choice of organization or form of representation, may participate in joint conferences with their employers, and I am assured by the industry that such is also their goal and wish.

Gentlemen, Senate bill 1958, the so-called "Wagner bill", should not be reported favorably by this committee. It carries with it immeasurable potential power to do serious harm to our whole industrial structure. It would do much to break down the sound relationship which has successfully been built up between employee and employer, and on the continuation of this relationship much of our hope for recovery depends.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you, Mr. Craigmile, for presenting your views.

Mr. Muir, will you please come forward, and the committee will hear you?

STATEMENT OF ROBERT W. MUIR, SECRETARY OF JEWEL TEA CO., INC., BARRINGTON, ILL.

The CHAIRMAN. Your name is Robert W. Muir?

Mr. MUIR. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What is your business?

Mr. MUIR. General counsel and secretary of the Jewel Tea Co., Inc.

The CHAIRMAN. How many employees has that company?

Mr. MUIR. Somewhere between 3,200 and 3,500.

The CHAIRMAN. Has it one plant or more than one plant?

Mr. MUIR. There is a main plant, but there are other plants.

The CHAIRMAN. Are the employees organized?

Mr. MUIR. There is a so-called "employees' representation plan" in effect.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you desire to submit a brief?

Mr. MUIR. I haven't a brief prepared, but I would like to discuss the matter briefly.

The CHAIRMAN. We will be pleased to hear you.

Mr. MUIR. The Jewel Tea Co. operates throughout 42 States of the Union, with 85 branches, so that you can see they are widespread. Our business is manufacturing and distributing grocery and food specialties.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you distribute them by mail?

Mr. MUIR. By "wagon routes", so-called. Our primary business is of a rather unique kind. Our men call on their customers once every 2 weeks. At the time they call they deliver to the customer what she purchased at the previous call 2 weeks before. They collect for it, and then solicit her order for 2 weeks hence.

They are traveling mostly away from the branch, and we do very little selling from the 85 branches. That is our primary business.

We have a premium form of merchandise which accompanies our selling groceries. We advance the premiums to our customers as required and as a reward for their trading with us.

The CHAIRMAN. How many of your employees are engaged in the manufacturing or producing plants, and how many are engaged in distribution?

Mr. MUIR. I would say there are 150 employees in manufacturing, and that probably all of the rest of them are in the distributing end of the business.

The CHAIRMAN. How are the distributors paid, on a percentage or per hour basis?

Mr. MUIR. In all except 7 branches—and when I speak of branches I mean 85 different warehouses and branches throughout the United States—we pay in all except 7 of them $22.50 as a base rate to our 1,500 salesmen, who radiate from those branches, and in addition thereto we have a sliding-scale commission which starts at 10½ percent on gross sales up to about $175 a week, and then it increases up to 15½ percent as it goes up; in other words, as the sales go up the commission progressively increases.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the average pay as a result of the base pay and commission?

Mr. MUIR. I would say it is about $25.

The CHAIRMAN. Do they pay their own expenses out of that?

Mr. MUIR. No, sir; the company furnishes the car, gasoline, and all of the goods.

The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed.

Mr. MUIR. In addition to the primary business which we have, we also have 85 chain stores located in the metropolitan area of Chicago, a rather small number; but we get again a cross section of the chain-store method of distribution.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you have to obtain licenses in these communities where you distribute by wagon?

Mr. MUIR. In some communities we do, and in some we do not, depending entirely on the local situation.

The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed.

Mr. MUIR. It seems to me that the Wagner industrial disputes bill is going to have a disastrous effect upon the distribution as well as to the manufacturing end of the business. In manufacturing we have a good many complaints against the bill which have been spoken of in previous evidence, but when we come to its effect on distribution this is a matter which affects 120 million people in the United States.

Basically, anything which adds even a small amount to the cost of distribution as it at present is constituted means a serious barrier to trade and is apt to cause a hardship on many people.

If the Wagner industrial disputes bill does what I fear it will do, it will lead to a campaign of unionization of all of the sources of production and distribution; and I have personal reasons for believing that it will certainly lead to campaigns for organizations of the distributive end. If it does that, it is going to have, first, not only a direct effect but, taking for granted that unionization may mean higher wages, better working conditions, and therefore greater expenses, although it does not necessarily mean that; but if it does, it will mean an increase in the cost of manufacturing, wholesale distribution, and retail distribution, and all of this must be added to the cost of goods, affecting the purchasing power of 120 million people, if the distributors are to "break even" themselves and stay in business.

Basically, the very existence of these distributive agencies depends on the ability of the people to buy as reasonably as possible. That is particularly true in times like these when not all of the people of the United States are employed.

I have a feeling if the Wagner industrial disputes bill is passed as it is at present constituted, it is going to cause a serious increase in the cost of living. I have no particular objection if a way could be worked out to prevent the forced unionization of men to this proposed legislation. In other words, the theory back of the Wagner industrial disputes bill might be all right, but it is the practical working out, the reality of it, that we must face.

So far as the Jewel Tea Co. is concerned, when our men leave their branch, they operate alone. There are roughly 500 of the 1,500 men who operate out of city branches, and the other 1,000 live in the outside communities, or in the small cities, and go to their routes from their place of residence. If these men are approached for unionization purposes—and we have had that happen to us—the opportunity for coercion is almost unlimited, with no possible protection from it; and it seems to me that as matters stand now, if this bill becomes a law, when that knowledge is spread throughout the United States in the different areas in which we operate, there is going to be said to our men what has been said to them already in many of the localities in which we operate: "Gentlemen, the United States Government wants you to join a union, and it is the wish of the President that you do so."

That has been said to a good many of our men, and we have had our men come in and ask if that were true.

If both the employer and employee were subject to the same regulations, so far as organization is concerned, if coercion and force could be taken away from the organization of these unions, which are being organized primarily not necessarily for the good of the men but for the dues which those men can produce—if we can provide against the use of coercion and force, it seems to me we would have a much better chance of insuring the stability of employment and of being able to keep our men satisfied and contented.

We have had some labor trouble, not a great deal of it. As our men work on their different routes a party of union men in an automobile will drive up. A union man on each side will open the car doors and one of them will say, "Well, Buddy, have you joined the union yet?" He answers "No." And they say, "Well, you better join or expect trouble." Under such threats of violence some of our men feign sickness and some quit rather than face the risk.

The Jewel Tea Co. has done a great deal for its men. Last December it distributed $50,000 in extra prize money; it distributed $75,000 of extra wages to the men for the last 24 weeks of 1934, and there is another distribution of $75,000 to employees who are such on April 15, 1935. From the standpoint of our own people, they do not wish to be unionized, and if they are it is going to be more or less by compulsion, some of which we have encountered already.

If it would be possible to have an outside labor organization in which no coercion or duress could be used to influence men, or if a man was free to choose whether he would join or not, I would have no objection to any attempt an outside labor organization might make to organize our men, and I think most of the employers throughout our industry would have no objection, but the trouble is there is that coercion and intimidation.

An employer under the Wagner bill must follow almost a level course; he cannot discourage organizations, he cannot encourage organizations, he must not make any statement which can be interpreted as interfering in any way with them. Therefore he is helpless, and the union organizer makes use of that fact and tells the employees that the United States Government is back of this bill to force organization of our men.

I thank you, Mr. Chairman, for this privilege of presenting my views to you.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Muir, we appreciate your presenting your views to us.

Mr. Pierce will please come forward, and the committee will be pleased to hear you.

STATEMENT OF ROBERT I. PIERCE, REPRESENTING MANUFACTURING INDUSTRIES IN CHICAGO HEIGHTS, ILL.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Pierce, will you please give your full name for the record?

Mr. PIERCE. Robert I. Pierce.

The CHAIRMAN. Where is your residence?

Mr. PIERCE. Chicago Heights, Ill.

The CHAIRMAN. You are representing the manufacturing industry in Chicago Heights, Ill.?

Mr. PIERCE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What variety of industries are there in Chicago Heights, Ill.?

Mr. PIERCE. We have a diversified line of industries, the predominant industries being iron and steel.

The CHAIRMAN. How many industries are there in your association which you represent here?

Mr. PIERCE. Thirty-four industries.

The CHAIRMAN. Are each of those industries organized?

Mr. PIERCE. They are not. Two of them have employee representation plans.

The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed with your statement.

Mr. PIERCE. I desire to express briefly the views of the industries in Chicago Heights, Ill., with respect to Senate bill no. 1958.

Chicago Heights is an industrial community, located in the southeastern part of Cook County, Ill., and the welfare of the community largely depends upon the successful operation of our industries. Cordial, cooperative, and friendly relations exist between the various groups within the city, and harmonious relations also exist between the employees in our factories and their employers, and there have been no serious labor disputes in Chicago Heights for a great many years. There are 34 manufacturing concerns in Chicago Heights, employing 4,319 persons. Seventeen of these industries employ 50 or less persons, 5 employ from 50 to 100, 7 employ from 100 to 200, and 5 employ over 200.

We believe that apparently the framers of this bill feel that there is considerable strife between employers and employees and that harmonious relations between these two groups are impossible. We feel that such an assumption is based upon situations which are not representative of industry generally, and that this legislation is without recognition of the facts as they actually exist.

In most of the factories in our community, there is and always has been a very close relationship and contact between the employee and the employer, and in many instances both the employer and employees have grown up together in the same plants. Anything that would destroy that friendly relationship which might, and probably would, result in industrial strife and conflict would unquestionably have a demoralizing effect upon the community.

Following this thought further, I think we should consider what this might mean. If these people are not employed they cannot pay taxes, and if they cannot pay taxes you cannot operate your schools, and these people become relief clients, and so on, affecting the entire life of the community.

In Chicago Heights we have a very large percentage of foreign-born population, and about 10 percent Negro population; yet in all of the 32 different nationalities in our community and with this greatly mixed population we have had no serious labor trouble for a number of years, which proves the employment relations have been and are satisfactory.

We also feel that this bill is not only unnecessary and unwarranted, but it is also unfair to the employers of labor and workers. It rightfully prevents an employer from interfering with his employees from exercising their rights to join a labor organization if of their own free will and accord they desire to do so, but it does not prevent a labor organizer or others from harassing, coercing, and threatening his employees into trying to force them to join a labor organization against their own free will and accord. Under the agreement requiring as a condition of employment that a person belong to a labor organization, it would either force a man into a labor union or prevent him from getting a job, and establish the closed shop in industry. Every man has the right to seek honest employment where he can find it, and he should not be compelled to do something against his own desire and right to secure that job. If he wants to join a union, that may be his privilege, but he should not be compelled to do so in order to get a job.

Senator WAGNER. Are you speaking of the closed shop when you say he has got to join a union to get a job?

Mr. PIERCE. Under the closed-shop provision, he would; yes, sir.

Senator WAGNER. That, of course, is done by agreement. If an employer does not want a closed shop, there is no closed shop, and he must give his consent to such an agreement before it is in effect.

Mr. PIERCE. I take the position that a man should be able to get a job without having to be forced into a union in order to get the job. He should have the right to get work where he can find it.

Senator WAGNER. The only thing that changes it is that the employer and the majority of the workers enter into a closed-shop agreement. That is not imposed upon him by any law. By the way, what State are you from?

Mr. PIERCE. Illinois.

Senator WAGNER. The closed shop is legal in Illinois, and this legislation simply retains the status quo, and if they are legal they shall remain legal; and by this legislation we do not intend to illegalize contracts in the State that are now legal.

Mr. PIERCE. Of course, we are opposed to the closed shop.

Senator WAGNER. Exactly, but the employer would have to consent to it before there could be a closed shop in your own industry.

Mr. PIERCE. You might have to consent to it in order to keep your plant operating.

The bill would also recognize a Communist group as a labor organization, and it would compel an employer to bargain with such a group if the representatives were selected by the majority of the employees. It could even force an employer to sign a closed-shop agreement with a Communist group and compel a man to become a Communist before he could get a job.

Senator WAGNER. It might interest you to know that the Communists are as much opposed to this bill as you are. There are some Communists awaiting here, with emotion almost, to be heard against the bill.

Mr. PIERCE. We further believe that this bill is also an attempt to destroy employees' representation plans, and that it would also take away from an individual his right to deal directly with his employer, and force employees to organize only through outside labor unions.

The 1933 census of manufactures, released by the United States Department of Commerce on March 5 of this year, shows that of the 10,740 industrial establishments in Illinois, 6,361 employed 50 or less persons, and 1,521 employed from 50 to 100 persons. The statistical report of the Illinois Department of Labor, released March 22, shows that of the 1,996 manufacturing industries reporting to the State department of labor, 883 employ 100 or less persons, and 690 employ over 100 and less than 200. These two statements indicate to me that industry in Illinois is largely made up of relatively small units, each unit employing a comparatively small number of persons. The census of manufactures statement referred to above also shows that in 1933 there were 2,380 fewer industries in Illinois than in 1931, and 4,583 fewer than in 1929.

It is my opinion that many industries do not know today where their pay roll is coming from 30 days hence, and if industry is forced into closed-shop agreements and employees are forced into labor organizations, with costly strikes and labor disputes, that it will be the last straw that puts many of these remaining industries over the line into bankruptcy, closing down these plants and causing more unemployment.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there any further questions?

Senator WAGNER. I believe I have no further questions.

The CHAIRMAN. If Mr. Sherwin will come forward we will be pleased to hear him.

STATEMENT OF DONALD G. SHERWIN, VICE PRESIDENT, CATERPILLAR TRACTOR CO., PEORIA, ILL.

The CHAIRMAN. Will you state for the record your full name?

Mr. SHERWIN. Donald G. Sherwin.

The CHAIRMAN. What is your occupation?

Mr. SHERWIN. I am vice president of the Caterpillar Tractor Co.

The CHAIRMAN. You appear here representing the agricultural implement industry?

Mr. SHERWIN. No; that is not strictly true. I do not represent the industry, but only represent my own company.

The CHAIRMAN. Where is your company located?

Mr. SHERWIN. Peoria, Ill.

The CHAIRMAN. How many employees have you?

Mr. SHERWIN. About 5,000 factory employees.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that all in one plant?

Mr. SHERWIN. There are a few located in San Leandro, Calif., where we perform one operation.

The CHAIRMAN. Are your employees organized?

Mr. SHERWIN. They are not, but I think a few months ago there was an attempt to unionize our foundry in which there are about 750 people. We have no way of knowing how complete that organization is.

The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed, Mr. Sherwin.

Mr. SHERWIN. I have come here with no prepared statement, and first, I would like to say I was particularly interested in your Senator Walsh's comments explaining the purposes of this bill, and as a result of that, I would like the courtesy, if I might, of inquiring of the members of the committee on one or two points.

I take it the management of a business is by far much more interested in harmony with its employees than anyone else could possibly be. We have never had any company union in our organization, and we are, generally speaking, opposed to that idea. We have done everything we could to keep a close communion between our employees and ourselves. We pay on an average approximately twice the applicable minimum rate under our code.

It seems to me the thing we fear primarily in this legislation is that it tends to emphasize the importance of separating the management on the one hand and labor on the other. I do not think anyone can question the right of employees to organize to correct evils, and I certainly know there is no legal question as to the right; but what we fear and apprehend is that a mandate—not a mandate exactly, but encouragement is given to an outside organization, under the theory that there is an implied encouragement in this bill to organize when no particular reason or purpose for such organization exists.

Let me amplify that by saying this, referring to section 9, which seems to me to be the heart of the bill, it is there provided that a majority of the employees shall have the exclusive right to bargain on the subject of hours, rates of pay, and other employment conditions.

Does it not seem to you, that if that is the case and the shop is not organized, that those people who are going to be in the minority can only make their vote effective if they do join a union, and it seems to me that is very unfortunate. It places a weapon in the hands of people who are not interested in harmonious relations between management and labor in that business. It is an amplied Government sanction to encourage outside labor organizers to go out and organize for that purpose.

It seems to me to tend to break up all we want to accomplish, and that is harmony in business, by emphasizing the importance of the separation between the employees on the one hand and management on the other.

I think Senator Wagner or Senator Walsh this morning indicated that the real purpose of this legislation was to strike at those who are what I would call "unintelligent empolyers", who do not seem to appreciate that their success, as well as the success of their business and employees, lies in cooperation. What you are striking at is trying to protect those people who have to deal with unintelligent management, and yet in so doing you are creating a machine which tends to separate and draw up battle lines, if you please, where none exist at the present time, and that is an extremely unfortunate implication of the act.

I want to call attention also to one point on which I would like a little enlightenment. We say in this act that no one can be required to work, which is proper; but can it possibly be true that by law we can impose upon a minority in a plant the results of negotiation by representatives for whom they had not voted. I do not understand how that can possibly be done as a matter of law. It seems to me it is wholly unconstitutional to expect that a majority can represent people who have either not voted or who have definitely voted for some other candidate. I do not quite understand how that is constitutional.

Then I was interested in Senator Wagner's comment to Senator Walsh when he challenged the statement of a previous witness as an injustice to a certain elevator operator—how that could possibly constitute a dispute which would affect interstate commerce. That is away over my head; and if that is the kind of extenuated construction that can be given to the provisions of the bill, it is very disturbing. I am just trying to find out what complications might flow from that sort of construction, if the other provisions are to be similarly construed.

Senator WAGNER. Of course, that kind of complication could only come into consideration if it would threaten a strike which was apt to threaten interstate commerce. That is not new law. Judge Hughes in the Appalachian case stated that something which might happen in a community—in a strike, or whatever it might be—closing up a factory which that community depended upon for its livelihood, and which stopped the machinery of manufacture that would tend to dry up the wells of commerce, would affect interstate commerce. I think that is rather obvious, and I don't think that needs any legal technician to appreciate.

Mr. SHERWIN. I cannot agree with you, but isn't it true you have expressed a generality? We all agree, by and large, that the typical employer is interested in giving his employees a fair deal.

Senator WAGNER. Exactly.

Mr. SHERWIN. If it is a generality, isn't it more apt to be true that the encouragement given here to organizers of labor may be used more to foment discord by treating extreme cases in a way ordinary cases should not be treated, rather than to encourage the fruition of the natural development of the common interest between industry and its employees? The employers are more interested in that than anyone on the outside, because the future of their plant depends upon the success of their employees.

Senator WAGNER. Are you in favor of section 7 (a), as written into the law?

Mr. SHERWIN. When I come to a discussion of 7 (a) I am confused when you speak about it, because there have been so many adverse opinions as to what it means.

Senator WAGNER. Taking it from your standpoint, do you think it should have been included in the law?

Mr. SHERWIN. I do not think so, unless it was clearly explained what it meant.

Senator WAGNER. You think it should be qualified?

Mr. SHERWIN. I think so.

Senator WAGNER. I think this bill clarifies it.

Mr. SHERWIN. I do not think so.

Senator WAGNER. It is not your kind of clarification.

Mr. SHERWIN. It is an unconstitutional clarification, I think.

Senator WAGNER. Do you think the workers should have a right to organize?

Mr. SHERWIN. Certainly they should have the right to organize, but they should have the right to organize themselves when they have an injustice and not have somebody come in from the outside and organize them when there is no necessity.

Senator WAGNER. That can be done today.

Mr. SHERWIN. It is not the language I refer to so much as the implication.

Senator WAGNER. How are you going to protect the people's rights?

Mr. SHERWIN. Let me suggest a way, as I see it. I cannot help but believe, for the reasons I have stated, this bill is unconstitutional. I think the power is reposed in the State to treat with relations between employer and employee, and I think that is just where it should be.

Senator MURPHY. Do you see any analogy between majority control in industry and majority control in a political unit of a government?

Mr. SHERWIN. Our country being the democracy it is, and based on the principles it is, has always recognized the necessity of electing candidates by majorities. That is integral with our system of government. But when it comes to the question of negotiating as to your right to work for someone else, I think the situation is vastly different.

Let us take, for instance, a plant that has 5,000 employees, and let us assume 40 percent might be skilled and 60 percent unskilled—although I will not say that is at all analogous to my own plant—would you feel if the unskilled laborers were organized in some kind of union, they should have a right to bind 40 percent of skilled employees in the plant?

I think that is abhorrent to the Constitution of the United States.

Senator MURPHY. Let me answer your question by asking another. Do you suppose the votes of the illiterates in our population ought to count as much as the votes of the higher educated elements?

Mr. SHERWIN. I think that is a hard question to ask me. I think what we have now in our political system, the way it is—I think it is better.

Senator MURPHY. Isn't that a little bit aside from the point?

Mr. SHERWIN. Yes.

Senator MURPHY. You made a classification of your industrial workers, and I made the classification as to the political voters.

Mr. SHERWIN. I did not make the classification on the basis of intelligence.

Senator MURPHY. I understand it was because some are skilled and some are not skilled, and that is only a training of the hand, or a training of the mind; and so, to speak in the same way of citizens, that seems to me to be entirely proper.

I should like to have you answer that question, where there is any analogy in the principle between majority control in government, we will say, and majority control in industry; is there any analogy in principle?

Mr. SHERWIN. Why certainly there is an analogy, but the difficulty is we have grown up for 159 years with a democratic system, and under that we have an almost universal voting franchise.

Senator MURPHY. Of course, the sponsors of the bill would not concede there is a distinction. Our democracy is an organization of various units of government, such as the States, counties, cities, and townships, and this is an organization of the units of individual employees. It is a democratic organization, according to the theory of it, and they could come and vote on the basis of what basis they will sell their labor and the conditions under which they will work. If the majority decides, do you take that as undemocratic?

Mr. SHERWIN. I certainly do, because I think the right to earn a living is vastly different from the right to vote, no matter how sacred the right to vote is.

Senator MURPHY. Do you go back to the basis they are stronger as one unit?

Mr. SHERWIN. Certainly; I believe in representation.

Senator MURPHY. But you do not believe in majority representation?

Mr. SHERWIN. No, sir; I do not.

Senator MURPHY. What figure would you use?

Mr. SHERWIN. I am not competent to say, but maybe the Supreme Court of this country, if the question came up to it on that basis, and it was 75 percent or 80 percent, might say for all practical purposes, that is just, but I am sure that a majority of 50 percent plus one cannot bind the other 49 percent, and I do not think they should, because they might not work at the same kind of work, might be wholly different classes of employees, and there is no distinction made in this bill as to employees, but it is just by number, not by classes, or anything else.

Senator MURPHY. There is no distinction as to who can vote, either, except they are of age.

Senator WAGNER. Industry itself seems to have adopted the majority rule, in the Congress of American Industry and the National Association of Manufacturers. Do you remember that convention?

Mr. SHERWIN. I am not familiar with it.

Senator WAGNER. You know who composed it, of course?

Mr. SHERWIN. The National Association of Manufacturers.

Senator WAGNER. Yes; and the Congress of American Industries, and it is supposed to represent substantially all of the large employers of the Nation.

Mr. SHERWIN. I assume that is so, but I have not read the document.

Senator WAGNER. I will read to you from a provision of their platform adopted at that convention, as follows:

> Under appropriate safeguards all approved competitive practices and prohibitions submitted by the properly defined majority group of trade or industry shall be binding upon the minority.

That is an adoption of the majority rule.

Mr. SHERWIN. I might say we have already filed our views on competitive practices, and I have personally appeared before the National Industrial Recovery Board in that regard. We have very decided views on that, and we are very much opposed to the great bulk of competitive practices. I did not vote for that.

Senator WAGNER. Are you acquainted with the so-called "representation plans" which the large industries have organized in their factories?

Mr. SHERWIN. I am acquainted with an occasional one, but not in a general way.

Senator WAGNER. You know they exist in a great number of the large industries?

Mr. SHERWIN. Yes; and I think they are very proper.

Senator WAGNER. Those industries are all opposed to this bill, as I understand, because they fear it may interfere with their representation plans.

Mr. SHERWIN. I think it is very definite it would.

Senator WAGNER. Of course it would so far as the employers supporting the organization is concerned, and I do not think you would approve that, but we are not going into that because we may not agree. But here is the point, in these organizations they call the representation plans, the representatives are elected by the majority of the workers, and when they are so elected, they represent all of the workers, so that they have the majority plan in their particular instances, but they seem not to approve it in this bill as it affects the so-called "organization."

Mr. SHERWIN. Let me say this, and I am speaking for myself as an individual, I really believe if you could have true representation in a plant, and you knew there was absolutely no intrusion from anyone outside of your employees, the majority representation would be vastly different than under the circumstances created by this bill.

Senator WAGNER. Of course, this bill provides for an election.

Mr. SHERWIN. But when you have an election somebody has to put up candidates. and the great group of people are unorganized and are not in a position to put up candidates as are outside organizers with a prearranged slate.

Senator WAGNER. Isn't that so with the representation plan the same as any other plan?

Mr. SHERWIN. In the average case it should be somebody inside of the plant that should be elected to represent the employees of that plant.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there anything further?

Senator WAGNER. No; I think not.

The CHAIRMAN. The hearing will be recessed until a quarter past two.

(Thereupon a recess was taken until 2:15 p. m., when the hearing was resumed, as follows:)

AFTER RECESS

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order. Are the employees' representatives from Akron, Ohio, present? There are people here representing the Goodyear Co. and some representing the Goodrich Co. Will the representatives of the Goodrich Co. please come forward?

STATEMENT OF ROBERT L. HART, OF AKRON, OHIO, REPRESENTING THE GOODRICH COOPERATIVE PLAN OF THE B. F. GOODRICH CO.

The CHAIRMAN. Will you please state your name for the record?

Mr. HART. My full name is Robert L. Hart.

The CHAIRMAN. Who is with you?

Mr. HART. Paul Montgomery.

The CHAIRMAN. You are both operatives in the plant of the B. F. Goodrich Co. in Akron, Ohio?

Mr. HART. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you have an organization of employees there?

Mr. HART. We do.

The CHAIRMAN. What is it known as?

Mr. HART. The Goodrich Cooperative Plan.

The CHAIRMAN. You are the spokesman for the representatives of the Goodrich Cooperative Plan?

Mr. HART. We are.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the name of the organization of employees?

Mr. HART. The Goodrich Cooperative Plan.

The CHAIRMAN. How is it financed?

Mr. HART. By the B. F. Goodrich Co.

The CHAIRMAN. How much money do they pay toward financing your organization?

Mr. HART. They pay the representatives $15 a month, the committeemen $20 per month, the chairmen of committees $25 a month, and the president $30 per month.

The CHAIRMAN. In addition to their other salaries?

Mr. HART. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. I suppose your expenses here are paid for by the company?

Mr. HART. They are.

The CHAIRMAN. How is this paid, is it given to you in an envelop, by a check, or how?

Mr. HART. In an envelop, in cash.

The CHAIRMAN. When you receive your weekly pay you are given this envelop?

Mr. HART. No; that is paid once per month.

The CHAIRMAN. Has there been any discussion of this bill by the representatives?

Mr. HART. There has been quite a bit.

The CHAIRMAN. But not, I suppose, by all of the employees?

Mr. HART. Yes; there has been quite a bit of discussion of the Wagner bill throughout the factory by the employees.

The CHAIRMAN. That is, individually, but not in a meeting?

Mr. HART. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. Let me know something about your organization; has it an enrolled membership?

Mr. HART. It does not.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it like the other organizations we have had presented to us here, namely, an organization of the employees who vote by ballot secretly once a year to elect their representatives?

Mr. HART. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the representatives listen to the grievances of the employees and present them to the employers from time to time during the year until the new representatives are chosen?

Mr. HART. New representatives are chosen if the old representative is not properly performing his duties.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any other organization than this representation-plan organization in the plant—have any of the trade unions an organization in this plant?

Mr. HART. The American Federation of Labor has a local in this plant.

The CHAIRMAN. How many members have they?

Mr. HART. It would be just a guess on my part if I gave it.

The CHAIRMAN. I understand that.

Mr. HART. I would say less than 1,200.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the total number of employees?

Mr. HART. Approximately 11,500.

The CHAIRMAN. How many employees participated in the election of last year?

Mr. HART. Approximately 75 percent.

The CHAIRMAN. Did these members of the American Federation of Labor participate?

Mr. HART. They took advantage of the plan; yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Did they ballot?

Mr. HART. I do not know whether they balloted or not; it is a secret ballot.

The CHAIRMAN. You would know whether they voted or not by seeing them at the polls, but would not know how they voted?

Mr. HART. Certainly; because a man can cast a blank ballot and you do not know whether he voted or not.

The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed with your statement.

Mr. HART. Mr. Montgomery and myself have been sent here with our expenses paid by the B. F. Goodrich Co. at the request of the representatives of the Goodrich cooperative plan to ask this committee to report unfavorably on the Wagner labor-disputes bill.

This bill is definitely in favor of the American Federation of Labor who represent a small percentage of workers in Akron. The Goodrich Co. employs approximately 11,500 factory workers in the city of Akron and more than 85 percent have availed themselves of the opportunity of using the cooperative plan as a method of collective bargaining.

At present the situation in Akron is serious, not because of the employee representation plans, but because of the small percentage of American Federation of Labor workers who are trying to force the companies to grant them exclusive recognition. The Wagner bill is favoring this small group and so we believe it very unfair.

A worker should have the right to use a representative who is compensated by the company if he believes that he can accomplish his purpose by using such a representative.

It is utterly ridiculous for an intelligent man to claim that a representative elected by the workers and receiving a small amount of compensation would sell out to his employer. Such a statement is not even worth while arguing. The American worker is better educated and more conversant with the labor situation than the worker of a few years ago. That is why the employee representation plan appeals to him as a more sensible way of bargaining than the regimentation of labor on one side of the line and industry on the other.

There is not any sound objection to the practice of paying representatives to settle the grievance of employees with their employer. The so-called "company union" presents an opportunity for the prompt settlement of troubles. It breeds a mutual feeling of well-being in both the employee and the employer. A contented worker will pay more attention to his job and benefit both the employer and himself. The employer has a higher grade product and the employee can make more money under the incentive system of concentrating on his job. It can therefore pay for itself in this way.

The compensation on a job as representative also causes keen competition for that job and a desire of the representatives to work hard for the employee so he may be reelected at the end of his term. The employee representation plans also provide a means of recalling any representative who does not properly handle the affairs of his constituents.

It must be remembered that the arrangement for compensation of employee representatives was made at the request of the employees and is a form of collective bargaining. If the employee has no objection to his representative receiving compensation, then certainly some third person upon the outside ought not to protest against that which the employees have been willing to accept.

The presence of financial inducement certainly would tend to cause representatives to be chosen who will be independent of the company and true servants of their constituents.

Gentlemen, we, in Akron, believe sincerely that the cooperative plan form of representation is the plan that the great majority of workers wish. We believe that the threat of strikes retards prosperity and therefore heartily recommend that the committee report unfavorably on this bill.

I have here, Mr. Chairman, a tabulation of accomplishment of this cooperative plan, which I would like to have in the record.

The CHAIRMAN. You may put that in the record.

Mr. HART. This tabulation is as follows:

Some of the many accomplishments of the Goodrich cooperative plan.

Vacation plans for 1933, 1934, and 1935.

Reinstatement of the disability insurance clause in group insurance policies at no added cost to employees.

Time and one-half for Sunday and holiday work.

A guaranteed minimum of 3 hours' compensation for employees reporting for work.

Improvement of working conditions insuring higher pay.

The transfer of over 4,000 workers who otherwise would have been laid off.

The revision of the service credit plan, restoring service credits to over 400 employees, with 5 years or more of service.

The adoption of a seniority rights plan which protects the jobs of long-service employees.

The adoption of the cooperative pension plan.

The CHAIRMAN. Let me say to you that I am troubled about the financial state of your organization. This bill, if enacted in its present phraseology, is likely to prevent your present financial system from being carried out.

Mr. HART. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. As the bill is drafted, your employers would be permitted to pay you for the time which you actually lose while you are engaged in collective bargaining among yourselves as representatives of the employees with your employer, but I am inclined to think the bill would forbid, or the labor board created under the bill would prohibit or forbid, your company from paying you a definite sum like $25 per month. Had you thought of that?

Mr. HART. I had, but I understand the bill does not allow them to finance, directly or indirectly, any organization.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill as drafted allows the employer to pay the time lost in performing your duties as representative during working hours, but the pay must be the same amount of pay that you would have received if you remained at your work.

Mr. HART. That is not entirely fair at all, because some workers can represent their constituents just as well if they are being paid 70 cents per hour as a man being paid $1 per hour, and I believe the flat rate is the best.

The CHAIRMAN. How much time do you spend at this work?

Mr. HART. I would say approximately 12 to 14 hours a day, during working time, and outside of that, 30 or 40 hours a month to do my job properly.

The CHAIRMAN. How much does the company pay you per week?

Mr. HART. They pay me $30 per month, but you get 75 cents per hour at any time you are on your regular job, and, of course, that is less than I make, and I just about average it, that is all.

The CHAIRMAN. Then you are not within the provision if the amount paid you is practically what you lose from your employment.

Mr. HART. To properly represent the employees, a man must put in a lot more hours per month than what he can put in on his regular work. I put in as high as 12 to 14 hours a day at this job of representing the workers.

The CHAIRMAN. Then that day you would not get any pay at your work, but this other pay is in lieu of that?

Mr. HART. I get 75 cents per hour, but I would not get any pay at my regular work.

The CHAIRMAN. That is what I mean, if tomorrow, for instance, you were engaged with some other representatives in negotiating some grievance with the company, you would not get any pay in your weekly envelop for the day's work, and the company allows you as a representative so much per month?

Mr. HART. They pay 75 cents per hour, then $30 per month.

The CHAIRMAN. The 75 cents per hour is the time lost and the $30 a month is what you are paid. I am just submitting this for your consideration. What is your occupation in this industry?

Mr. HART. Machinist.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you for your appearance and your statement of your views.

Will the representatives of the Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co. please come forward?

STATEMENT OF A. B. TREMBLEY, CHAIRMAN OF THE GOODYEAR INDUSTRIAL ASSEMBLY OF THE GOODYEAR TIRE & RUBBER CO., AKRON, OHIO

The CHAIRMAN. Will you give your full name for the record?

Mr. TREMBLEY. A. B. Trembley.

The CHAIRMAN. How many other employees are there here with you?

Mr. TREMBLEY. There are five others besides myself, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. One is W. L. Cash?

Mr. CASH. Yes; that is right.

The CHAIRMAN. Another is named E. R. Baskey?

Mr. BASKEY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Another is named H. W. Harmon?

Mr. HARMON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Another is named J. Otterman?

Mr. OTTERMAN. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. And the last one is named J. Shirley.

Mr. SHIRLEY. Yes, sir; that is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. You may be seated, gentlemen. Mr. Trembley, you are chairman of the committee of representatives who are elected by the employees in the Goodyear Co.?

Mr. TREMBLEY. I am chairman of the committee elected by the Goodyear Industrial Assembly to present a protest against the Wagner Labor Dispute bill here today.

The CHAIRMAN. And the other gentlemen are members of the same committee?

Mr. TREMBLEY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, what is the name of your organization?

Mr. TREMBLEY. The Goodyear Industrial Assembly Plan.

The CHAIRMAN. How many workers are there in the Goodyear Co. that belong to that plan?

Mr. TREMBLY. They are not members of the plan.

The CHAIRMAN. But they participate in the elections?

Mr. TREMBLEY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. How many employees are there?

Mr. TREMBLEY. There are approximately 16,000 people that are affected by this plan.

The CHAIRMAN. How many participated in your election?

Mr. TREMBLEY. Between 80 and 90 percent.

The CHAIRMAN. When was the last election?

Mr. TREMBLEY. Last fall, in October, at which time there was a vote taken which showed that 81.4 percent voted for this plan.

The CHAIRMAN. How many representatives were elected in that election?

Mr. TREMBLEY. There were 40 representatives elected and 10 senators.

The CHAIRMAN. How many representatives?

Mr. TREMBLEY. Forty representatives and ten senators.

The CHAIRMAN. That is a new plan, what does that mean?

Mr. TREMBLEY. I was going to explain that our plan is patterned after the Congress of the United States. In other words, it is a two-body plan, a senate and house of representatives.

I will further state, Mr. Chairman, that this plan was formed at the request of the employees back in 1919 at a time when there was no necessity for such a plan, because at that time we were enjoying prosperity and high wages, but the employees themselves felt they should have a share in the management of that organization. They, therefore, requested the management to draw up a plan along that line with their assistance that would be beneficial to the employees and the mangement as well. This plan was, therefore, originated in 1919.

The CHAIRMAN. Has that plan continued, or have you modified it from time to time?

Mr. TREMBLEY. From time to time, as conditions change, we have changed the plan some to meet the changing conditions. After the plan had been in effect for 5 years the employees, in order to reassure themselves that the plan was worthwhile, took a vote on it in 1924.

At that time there were 85 percent of the people that voted in favor of the plan.

The CHAIRMAN. Let us find out about this conference you have out there. You say you have 40 representatives and 10 senators.

Mr. TREMBLEY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. I hope you followed our plan of paying them both alike, having them both receive the same compensation, or is there any difference?

Mr. TREMBLEY. Well, some; yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The senators get a little more than the representatives do?

Mr. TREMBLEY. No; not at all; all representatives and senators are paid the same amount of money.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the election held at one time for the senators and the representatives?

Mr. TREMBLEY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What distinction do you make, first of all, in the method of selecting the senators and representatives?

Mr. TREMBLEY. Well, I might explain it in this manner, that our plan is drawn up in what is known as "40 precincts and 10 districts", so that each person is represented by a representative in each precinct, and each district has a senator.

The CHAIRMAN. Each precinct elects its representative, and the districts elect their senators?

Mr. TREMBLEY. Yes, sir; that is true.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the distinction between the duties of representatives and the duties of the senators?

Mr. TREMBLEY. I might explain it in this way: Grievances on any matter that may come from the employees will go to the representatives first. That means that an employee who may have a grievance or any other matter pertaining to the department, or something they may seek, goes to his representative. If he feels that he has not been given a fair deal, as we might say, he has the privilege of taking that to the senator or both the senators in that district, of the same problem.

The CHAIRMAN. Do they try to adjust it themselves, or do they bring it before the whole body of senators?

Mr. TREMBLEY. They do not bring it before the whole body if it can be adjusted among themselves.

The CHAIRMAN. Do both groups meet together?

Mr. TREMBLEY. They do; in separate houses, the house and the senate.

The CHAIRMAN. I take it the house has original jurisdiction in most matters, and the senate is an appeals board?

Mr. TREMBLEY. No; not necessarily. It is so patterned that if a bill or a resolution comes up before one body, say, before the house, and it is passed on by the house, it is then taken over to the senate; and if it is passed on by the senate, of course it goes before the management for approval; and if one house defeats it, naturally the bill is not approved.

The CHAIRMAN. The senate could originate a resolution which would then go before the house?

Mr. TREMBLEY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Suppose you decided to resolve you would petition your employer to pay one and a half times the regular pay for extra time or for work on Sunday, and the house passes that resolution, then it went to the senate and the senate passes it, then it would go representatives or senators, or both, with the management?

Mr. TREMBLEY. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. Suppose the management turned it down, then what would happen?

Mr. TREMBLEY. Then we have a recourse to the president of the company; and after the president of the company—first, I should say it goes to the factory manager, and from the factory manager to the president of the company, then to the board of directors of the company.

The CHAIRMAN. Then, of course, with the right to strike if they do not agree?

Mr. TREMBLEY. I may say under the Industrial Recovery Act we can appeal our case to the National Labor Relations Board.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you at any time sit in conference, either the representatives or senators, or both, with the management?

Mr. TREMBLEY. We do.

The CHAIRMAN. How often?

Mr. TREMBLEY. We have what is known as the "district", which meets once a month. Any case that may come up from the shop to the representatives or senators to this district—all the cases are made up and come to it—and this district is composed of 6 members of the management and 6 members of the assembly, 4 representatives and 2 senators—and any problem that comes up before this district meeting, which meets once a month, if we are unable to agree at the meeting, we will take a vote on the question; and if the vote is a tie, for instance, it goes over to what is known as the "joint general committee", on which committee there are 6 more members of the management and 6 more members of the congress; and if we fail to agree there, it goes to the executive committee of the company, at which the facts are all brought out, and it is up to the factory manager to make a decision on the matter.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, how are you financed?

Mr. TREMBLEY. In what respect, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. Where does the money come from to pay the representatives and senators for the time they devote to the work for the employees?

Mr. TREMBLEY. Mr. Chairman, they are paid for the time lost on our regular duties; and if we have some extra work to perform above that, we are paid for it at our hourly average earnings.

The CHAIRMAN. So that if you meet at night, let us say, you would be paid the amount of time which you give to this collective bargaining as though you were working for the company during those hours?

Mr. TREMBLEY. That is right; but we very seldom meet at night.

The CHAIRMAN. You may now proceed with your statement.

Mr. TREMBLY. We think it desirable first to acquaint your honorable committee with the fact that the six employees of the Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co. of Akron, Ohio, who are here present, have been elected and instructed by the Goodyear Industrial Assembly, which is an association or body created and maintained by the employees of the Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co. for purposes of cooperative and collective bargaining, to voice some of the objections of a majority of the employees of the Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co. to the enactment of Senate bill no. 1958, known as the "Wagner bill." The objections set forth are raised by us as individual employees as well as members of the committee.

The employees of the Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co. are presently represented for purposes of collective bargaining by the Goodyear Industrial Assembly, members of which have been duly elected by employees of the company under a program known as the "Goodyear industrial representation plan." The assembly is representative of the employees alone, the management having no representation therein. The plan has been in effect and operation at the plant of the Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co. for the past 16 years and has proved to be an effective means of collective bargaining between management and men. Through the efforts of the Industrial Assembly we have built up, over a period of years, a feeling of confidence between employer and employee which the Wagner labor disputes bill would tend to tear down, destroying such benefits as we have built up.

It is not the sole and exclusive method by which employees of the Goodyear Co. may bargain with the management. It is set up as a means of collective bargaining which any employee may use or not as he pleases. There is in it no attempt to deprive any employee of the right to deal directly with the management, and no individual or group is required to use the plan in bargaining with the management.

A. THE THEORY OF THE BILL

1. Collective bargaining: The chief purpose of this bill seems to be to compel collective bargaining through organized labor by empowering the National Labor Board to subpena witnesses and to issue orders, with resort to the courts for the enforcement of such orders. This is unwelcome compulsion.

Such a program cannot possibly work to the advantage of either employee or employer. If collective bargaining is to be accomplished through compulsion, then the result is not a bargain but an edict issued by a board compelling employer and employee in their relations with each other to follow a certain program determined and laid out for them by a third person or group. The program of the bill at once robs employer and employee of freedom in their negotiations by injecting a third party or group into such negotiations.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there another labor organization, other than the one you represent, in your plant?

Mr. TREMBLY. The American Federation of Labor has a local.

The CHAIRMAN. How many members are there in that local?

Mr. TREMBLEY This is only a guess, but so far as we understand they have approximately 700 to 800 people out of the 15,000 or 16,000 we have in the plant.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there some agitation or some talk of a labor disturbance?

Mr. TREMBLEY. Yes, there is, Mr. Chairman, at the present time. This local, as I have explained, is trying to negotiate with the company for recognition, and the management of the company has not seen fit to bargain with them, that is, to sign an agreement which they want them to do.

The CHAIRMAN. In other words the representation of this local of the American Federation of Labor claim to represent a majority of the workers?

Mr. TREMBLEY. They do.

The CHAIRMAN. And has petitioned the management to recognize them as the representatives of their employees for the purpose of collective bargaining?

Mr. TREMBLEY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And the management has refused to do this on the ground that they do not represent the majority of their workers, but that the organization of which you are a representative actually and does represent the majority?

Mr. TREMBLEY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And therefore they say they are within the provisions of 7 (a) of the National Recovery Act, and under the regulations of the Labor Board in adhering to the claim that they are engaged in collective bargaining with the organization which represents a majority of the employees?

Mr. TREMBLEY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Has there been any election other than the election of last fall?

Mr. TREMBLEY. No; there has not.

The CHAIRMAN. Has any election been asked for?

Mr. TREMBLEY. Yes; I might explain that last fall the Industrial Assembly requested the National Labor Board in Washington, as well as the regional board in Cleveland to conduct an election at our plant to determine who represented the employees.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you have that question on the ballot?

Mr. TREMBLEY. We would have had, but we did not take a vote, We had a petition in for that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Magruder, has this case come before your board?

Mr. MAGRUDER. That case has not come up for hearing before the national board.

The CHAIRMAN. Has it been heard?

Mr. MAGRUDER. Our election orders have been thrown before the court in the Goodrich case and in the Firestone case, upon petitions by the companies for review. The Goodyear case was before the Cleveland regional board, but for some reason or other, it has not come up to us in Washington yet.

The CHAIRMAN. I am disturbed as to whether I should hear any evidence in the matter if it is on the brink of possible serious disturbance.

Mr. MAGRUDER. So far as our Board is concerned, we have no objection to your hearing this witness.

The CHAIRMAN. I believe this witness would want to be heard on the other side also. We are not concerned about that, and the witness is here to present the record of their own organization and to show what it has accomplished, and I assume to express the wish that no bill be enacted that would interfere with it.

Mr. TREMBLEY. That is true, but the question was brought out, and I thought I would explain to you that we had requested the National Labor Board to conduct an election.

The CHAIRMAN. When?

Mr. TREMBLEY. Last fall.

The CHAIRMAN. Why didn't they do it?

Mr. TREMBLEY. For this reason, that the rules of the Board said that if we were not in conflict with the management of the company we deal with, we are not able to have an election granted, but at the same time the American Federation of Labor brought a request in to hold an election, and later withdrew their request, therefore there would be no election held.

The CHAIRMAN. The representatives of your organization requested an election of the National Labor Board?

Mr. TREMBLEY. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. And the representatives of the American Federation of Labor also requested an election?

Mr. TREMBLEY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The National Labor Board refused to take jurisdiction over your request on the theory there was no dispute between your organization and the company, but the National Labor Board had before it at the time information that another group were claiming to be representatives of the employees, did they not?

Mr. TREMBLEY. Not information, but a request asking for an election to be held also.

The CHAIRMAN. I cannot understand, Mr. Magruder, why that is not a labor dispute?

Mr. MAGRUDER. Senator Walsh, I do not know what the status is, and I would have to get the necessary information from the Cleveland regional board, which has had the case before it. I do not know what the status is, but we have not had it before us in Washington as in the Firestone and Goodrich cases.

The CHAIRMAN. Two persons or groups representing different elements of employees, both asking for an election, I should think would be evidence that sooner or later there is going to be a contention as to which one represent the majority, and the sooner an election is held, the better.

Mr. MAGRUDER. I understand there are representatives of the American Federation of Labor group here, and they possibly can explain the situation.

The CHAIRMAN. In any event, no election has been held, Mr. Trembley, and you have been going on as you have?

Mr. TREMBLEY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed.

Mr. TREMBLEY. How can the Federal Government bring employees and employer harmoniously together when one or the other, or both, are driven by law to reach an end determined by an outside group? It is plain to see that the term "collective bargaining" under such a program is a misnomer.

The program of this bill, if considered in connection with a large industry, such as the Goodyear Co., where for 20 years there has been no strike or serious labor dispute, and where, since 1919, a representative plan for employee participation in management has been mutually satisfactory and helpful, would work a gross and vicious injustice both on labor and management. It would deprive us, as workers, of a tried and proved method which a majority of our fellow employees have adopted and approved and find so advantageous in our negotiations with the management. It would bring into our negotiations with the management a group who do not understand our problems and would thus engender difficulties which for at least 16 years have not arisen.

We maintain that our "family" of employees should not be molested or annoyed by uninvited and unwelcome third parties. Who knows better than we, the employees, what the employees desire? Is the labor board to tell us that what we desire is not good for us? We believe that a fair election with a secret ballot conducted by the Government will best subserve our rights and our desires. If the Government can open up to us a means of freely choosing our own representatives, without fear, without threat, without coercion, without outside interference, and without pressure from any source, it will have helped us immeasurably.

First. Proposed constitution of the board: The bill provides for a separate and distinct executive department of the Government to be constituted of three members appointed by the President.

Senator WALSH. You have at least seen from your experience enough developed in the case that you are familiar with in your own industry to see the value of an independent tribunal having legal and lawful authority to hold an election.

Mr. TREMBLEY. Yes.

Senator WALSH. Proceed.

Mr. TREMBLEY. We believe that if such a board is to be established there should be certain definite limitations with respect to the persons whom the President might appoint; that is, there is no provision in the present bill which would prevent the board being constituted wholly of representatives of union labor, or entirely of representatives of unorganized labor, or altogether of representatives of employers.

Second. Exclusive representation and majority rule: Section 9 of the proposed bill is vicious in that it makes representatives selected by a majority the exclusive representatives to deal with the employer. Under the bill, all the employees of an employer in a local plant might be limited in their collective bargaining to a committee of representatives from a foreign locality. This would be true especially if the board, by virtue of section 9 (b), might determine that the craft should be the unit from which the majority were chosen.

Section 9 deprives employees of a local employer of the right to freely choose the men whom they know and who in turn know local conditions, and makes it possible for outsiders, unacquainted with local situations, to control their contractual relations with the employer, especially in the event the craft, no matter where its individual members are located, is to be considered as the unit by which a majority may be chosen.

" Collective bargaining " by employees is a misnomer if the minority has no voice and no opportunity to bargain with the employer. If it is sincerely desired that employees themselves, uninfluenced, shall determine who shall represent them in their dealings with management—and this certainly is the end to be desired—then the employees of an employer in Akron, Ohio, should not be compelled to accept representatives selected by a majority of the craft, but should be permitted to choose from among their fellow employees in their own plant. To be fair, bargaining with the employer should be the right of the minority as well as the right of the majority. each man should have the right to contract free from the influence of another. Otherwise an employees' contract is regulated by someone or some group with whose policies he is not in harmony.

The exclusive majority rule requires that all of the employees shall use as their sole and exclusive representatives for collective bargaining only those representatives (or that organization) which has received the highest number of votes. Other individuals or groups may present grievances, but under the provisions of this bill they cannot bargain for themselves. The representatives chosen by the majority of the employees in any unit are to act as the exclusive collective bargaining agency for all the employees in such unit. So long as the exclusive majority rule prevails, minority groups are denied the right to bargain through representatives of their own choosing. Such contractual and property rights as they have in collective bargaining are abolished by this bill. This, we believe, constitutes the taking of property without due process of law.

Third. The craft as the unit for collective bargaining: The bill in question provides that the board shall decide whether the unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining shall be the employer unit, craft unit, plant unit, or other unit. Our experience is that a better understanding and a more satisfactory result is to be obtained through the employer unit, and we believe that the employer unit is the only fair means of adjusting labor disputes. Craft units would not meet local needs. The employer unit is different from the idea of the old labor unions, which held that a union should be made up of the employees of many different employers, no matter where located; but the craft union is more likely to be influenced, swayed, and agitated by paid leaders, organizers, and agitators from outside our own ranks and to become conducive of trouble because conditions differ in the several localities and representatives from the craft who are not acquainted with local situations and have little knowledge of local needs are not as competent to carry on collective bargaining as are those employees directly interested.

Possibly employer unions could not be the basis of majority in smaller local industries, but in these instances it seems apparent that the craft union should be limited to the craft in a particular locality. To leave this to the board, however, makes the whole plan too uncertain.

Fourth. Representatives and elections: While section 9 (a) of Senate bill 1958 provides that representatives may be designated or selected for the purposes of collective bargaining, by the majority of the employees in a unit, the proposed bill does not in any manner stipulate how such designation or selection may be made or shall be conducted. We believe that it is very important that this be made definite and certain. How is the majority to be determined? And is the majority to be considered as a majority of persons who may vote, if voting is the means of selection, or is it a majority of the employees in a particular plant, or the employees of a particular employer, or all employees of all employers in a particular craft, or all of the employees in a particular craft in a designated area?

Fifth. Unfair practices: Section 8 (2) of the bill provides that it shall be an unfair practice for an employer to contribute financial or other support to any labor organization. In the main this is a very laudible provision, but we do not agree that it should be considered an unfair practice for an employer to contribute toward paying a designated representative for any reasonable amount of extra time and effort expended outside of his regular working hours in meeting with fellow representatives and other matters incident to his representative capacity. We do not believe that such contribution by the employer to a representative makes the representative subservient to the employer.

If the employees themselves desire or are willing that the company compensate the representatives chosen by them for time and effort expended on their behalf, certainly such desire of the employees should be considered. If the employees themselves desire that their representatives engaged in collective bargaining should be paid and are willing that the payment shall come from the employer, then, certainly some outsider ought not to protest and no legislative act should stand in the way. How can the payment of compensation to representatives whom the employees have selected be thought to affect a representative in his bargaining with the employer? It may encourage some employee to campaign for his own selection as representative, but if he doesn't truly represent his fellow employees—if he serves the employer rather than his fellows—he will not be likely to be reelected. That person will be elected who has served his fellows best and who has been loyal to them all through. If employees want their representatives paid for extra work and if the employers are willing that such pay come from the employer, who can properly object. Can all, or even a majority, of the employees of a particular employer be swayed by the employer by reason of the fact that a few employee-representatives are to receive compensation for extra services? To imagine for a moment that because the employer pays the employee-representative, all the employees are prejudiced in favor of the employer is outside of all clear reasoning.

Sixth. Closed shop: Section 7 (3), which permits the employer to require his employees to belong to a particular labor organization if such labor organization is the representative of the majority of the employees, would defeat our country's attempt to solve the unemployment question. If an employee were not in sympathy with a certain labor organization, he would be compelled to take his medicine or lose his job. This would defeat the right of an individual employee, or a small group of employees, from bargaining with the employer.

In conclusion, why should Congress enact this bill which would interrupt the peaceful relations which have existed between our employer and ourselves for years past. We are engaged in no difficulties with our employer and we look back over our years of service with pride in the fact that we have been able to fairly, successfully, and satisfactorily negotiate and collectively bargain with our employer. Such relationships in the Goodyear factory are threatened and individual rights vital to us and afforded us by the Constitution of our land are jeopardized.

We believe that the industrial-representation plan is a proper method of collective bargaining and that there is no just reason why it should be made impossible for us to continue it.

Senator WALSH. I have been asked to ask you some questions. Is the company paying your expenses?

Mr. TREMBLEY. The employees' activities committee, which is a committee made up of various clubs in the Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., which numbers around 22 or 23, are paying our expenses to Washington at this time.

Senator WALSH. Do they receive any funds from the company?

Mr. TREMBLEY. No; their funds are derived from various activities which they promote, such as baseball, football, basketball, dances, and so forth.

Senator WALSH. Have you your constitution with you?

Mr. TREMBLEY. I have, Mr. Chairman.

Senator WALSH. Will you leave it with the committee?

Mr. TREMBLEY. Yes, sir; I will.

Senator WALSH. What pay do you get or what allowances are you given as a representative of the organization of this company?

Mr. TREMBLEY. I am paid for the time I lose from my job when I am called off by an employee and when it is necessary to work a few extra hours I receive my average hourly earnings as a piece-worker in the plant.

Senator WALSH. Do you make any reports to the employees in the shop of your activities in their behalf as a representative of the workers?

Mr. TREMBLEY. All of the minutes of our meetings are posted on the bulletin boards or any information that the employees may wish.

Senator WALSH. That is the way they get the information?

Mr. TREMBLEY. Yes, sir.

Senator WALSH. Was there any meeting of the workers for the purpose of sending you here, or was it done by the board of representatives?

Mr. TREMBLEY. It was done by the Goodyear industrial assembly.

Senator WALSH. How many members in that assembly?

Mr. TREMBLEY. There are 60.

Senator WALSH. And are they somewhat similar to the organization which was described by the last witness?

Mr. TREMBLEY. No. I am the one that explained that.

Senator WALSH. Pardon me; all right, sir.

Mr. TREMBLEY. Mr. Chairman, I would just like to explain a little more fully if time will permit.

Senator WALSH. Certainly.

Mr. TREMBLEY. The employees whom we represent today are enjoying the benefits that have been made possible through the cooperation of the assembly with the management. I might state right here that the employees of the Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co. today are receiving an insurance to the extent of $33,000,000 in the Akron factories alone, which the premium is paid by the company alone. There are no charges to any of the Goodyear people.

We have a vacation plan. A man with 5 years of service receives 1 week vacation with pay. A man with 10 years of service receives 2 weeks' vacation with pay.

Senator WALSH. Who makes those payments?

Mr. TREMBLEY. The company pays it.

Senator WALSH. Was that a right or a privilege obtained through your organization?

Mr. TREMBLEY. It was in force before the organization was formed, but in the years 1931 and 1932 at the time of the depression, the company felt that it was quite an expenditure. It runs now a half a million dollars a year, and they were going to eliminate it, but through the efforts of the Goodyear industrial assembly, we were able to retain it and received it for that year and are receiving it now.

I might further explain that we have a pension plan whereby the company set aside 1 percent of the pay roll a year toward the pension fund to take care of employees who have come to the age of 65 years, who have become eligible under the pension plan.

Any employee who becomes disabled in the plant after 15 years of service, regardless of age, also comes in under the pension plan. At the present time the fund has been built up to the extent of $3,000,000.

We have a loan department where, if a man has an emergency that may arise, such as a death in the family or any emergency that may rise unforeseen and has no money, he goes to this department and he is able to negotiate for a loan which he pays off weekly, at no cost to him for the loan.

Senator WALSH. You mean there is no interest charge?

Mr. TREMBLEY. No interest charge whatever.

Senator WALSH. Do any of the other gentlemen accompanying you desire to be heard?

Mr. TREMBLEY. Mr. Chairman, I believe Mr. William Cash would like to say a few words.

Senator WALSH. Perhaps you had better wait, Mr. Cash, until we hear the other witnesses representing the opposite point of view.

Is Mr. House present?

Mr. HOUSE. Yes, sir.

Senator WALSH. Are you here alone or have you someone accompanying you?

Mr. HOUSE. I am here by myself.

STATEMENT OF JOHN D. HOUSE

Senator WALSH. Where do you reside?

Mr. HOUSE. Akron, Ohio.

Senator WALSH. Where are you employed?

Mr. HOUSE. By the Federal Labor Union, representing the Goodyear employees.

Senator WALSH. You are not an employee of the Goodyear Co.?

Mr. HOUSE. Not since January 15, 1934.

Senator WALSH. Perhaps you should talk after the other witnesses.

Mr. HOUSE. I will suit your convenience.

Senator WALSH. You may as well continue. Is it a unit of a local unit of the American Federation of Labor among the Goodyear employees?

Mr. HOUSE. Yes, sir.

Senator WALSH. And have they officers?

Mr. HOUSE. Yes, sir.

Senator WALSH. And you are one of those officers?

Mr. HOUSE. I am president of the local union.

Senator WALSH. But you do not happen to be an employee?

Mr. HOUSE. Not at this time.

Senator WALSH. Were you at one time?

Mr. HOUSE. Yes; for 9 years.

Senator WALSH. How many of the employees of the Goodyear Co. are enrolled in your local?

Mr. HOUSE. Over 7,000.

Senator WALSH. And the total number of employees, as you understand, is how many?

Mr. HOUSE. Well, to explain that, I might refer to a vote that was taken of the production and maintenance employees some few days ago by the group just preceding me on the witness stand. The question to be determined by that vote was whether or not to lay off a certain number of employees and work 30 hours, or to cut the time generally into 24 hours and retain all the employees.

The CHAIRMAN. Which were these departments that were affected?

Mr. HOUSE. The maintenance and production employees. That takes in the mechanics, too.

The CHAIRMAN. And what else?

Mr. HOUSE. Production. That is excluding office workers.

The CHAIRMAN. The question arose among the employees in the maintenance and production departments as to whether it was better to drop a certain number of employees and continue those that the company was able to carry for a 30-hour week, or, as an alternative, to continue all of the employees and reduce the time for all to 24 hours; is that right?

Mr. HOUSE. That is so.

The CHAIRMAN. To whom was that question presented?

Mr. HOUSE. That question was presented—I don't know just where it originated, but I have my suspicions—but the thing was presented to the employees who are working in the shop.

The CHAIRMAN. In these two departments?

Mr. HOUSE. Throughout the factory. May I explain that? The production and maintenance employees cover the entire factory; that is, they are excluding the office workers.

The CHAIRMAN. Was there a vote taken?

Mr. HOUSE. There was.

The CHAIRMAN. Was it a secret ballot?

Mr. HOUSE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Where was it held?

Mr. HOUSE. Inside the shop. The workers on the job, wherever they were working, were contacted and asked to vote.

The CHAIRMAN. This vote was a vote that was taken by personal contact?

Mr. HOUSE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. By you and some others?

Mr. HOUSE. No; by the representatives of the inside assembly.

The CHAIRMAN. Of these people [indicating].

Mr. HOUSE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. So these representatives conducted this election or vote?

Mr. HOUSE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the result of that vote?

Mr. HOUSE. A total of 9,258, and as it was given to me, with 5,945 voting to reduce the hours, and 3,313 voting to work 30 hours.

The CHAIRMAN. Why did you not tell me about this, Mr. Trembley?

Mr. TREMBLEY. I would like Mr. Cash to answer that question.

The CHAIRMAN. That vote was taken when?

Mr. HOUSE. I do not recall the exact date.

The CHAIRMAN. Within a few days or within a week?

Mr. HOUSE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. As a result of that vote, what has been done by the management?

Mr. HOUSE. That would be hard to say.

The CHAIRMAN. You do not know? Was it announced in the press, in the local papers, at Akron, that this was the vote?

Mr. HOUSE. I did not see it myself; no.

The CHAIRMAN. As far as you know then, you are for the first time publicly announcing this vote?

Mr. HOUSE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Whether the management will accept it or not or what the representatives have done to take the matter up with the management, you do not know?

Mr. HOUSE. I do not know.

The CHAIRMAN. Or what plans are being worked out?

Mr. HOUSE. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What has that to do with the number of members in your organization?

Mr. HOUSE. That would tend to show the number of workers who are eligible to join our organization.

The CHAIRMAN. You claim that the vote of about 9,200 would indicate the number of employees who are likely to be interested in the labor movement for the employees, and that you have enrolled 7,000, therefore you have more than a majority of the number of employees?

Mr. HOUSE. I might add, too, that this is the membership enrolled in the Federal Labor Union. We have other crafts in there who have a membership in various international unions. I believe there are 12 represented.

The CHAIRMAN. In other words, there are several local units applying to particular crafts?

Mr. HOUSE. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. That are affiliated with national organizations?

Mr. HOUSE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And who I assume are submerged so far as collective bargaining is concerned iin the representative organizations?

Mr. HOUSE. Yes. We have what we call a "united rubber workers' council" which is composed of all crafts working in and around the rubber plant, through representative form of government in this council which claims jurisdiction of all the work done in and around the rubber plant.

The CHAIRMAN. How many members in that council?

Mr. HOUSE. There are the members of the executive board, and the delegates are elected by the component organizations, which covers the entire United States. I do not know the exact number.

The CHAIRMAN. How many of the board at this plant?

Mr. HOUSE. There are two members at this plant.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any council of these employees who are organized in organizations other than the representative plan to which reference has been made?

Mr. HOUSE. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. How many members are there on that board and what do they represent?

Mr. HOUSE. The set-up is not complete yet because we have not been able to establish——

The CHAIRMAN (interposing). When did you start organizing a unit or local for the American Federation of Labor?

Mr. HOUSE. The first member signed up was on June 30, 1933, I believe.

The CHAIRMAN. And you have been working ever since then?

Mr. HOUSE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you had any meetings there?

Mr. HOUSE. We have regular meetings twice a month of the membership.

The CHAIRMAN. And you have elected officers, including yourself?

Mr. HOUSE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you attempted to do any collective bargaining?

Mr. HOUSE. Many times.

The CHAIRMAN. With the company?

Mr. HOUSE. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. You yourself?

Mr. HOUSE. And a committee representing the unions.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you had a chance to confer with the management?

Mr. HOUSE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Did they receive your grievances?

Mr. HOUSE. They received them, yes; and kept them.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you been able to get results? You have not been able to, I assume?

Mr. HOUSE. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. How many of these employees attend these meetings?

Mr. HOUSE. The numbers vary. Sometimes we only have a few that come to the meetings, and other times we have a full hall of upward of a thousand or fifteen hundred and as high as 2,000 has been at one meeting.

The CHAIRMAN. You have been given a regular charter, if that is what it is called, by the American Federation of Labor; is that so?

Mr. HOUSE. That is true.

The CHAIRMAN. And you are there on the ground actively performing the duties of your office as the representative of the American Federation of Labor local in this plant. Is there one being attempted to be organized at the other plant, the Goodrich?

Mr. HOUSE. There has been, concurrently with ours.

The CHAIRMAN. And are they having the same difficulty you are experiencing?

Mr. HOUSE. The same difficulties.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there anything else you wanted to say?

Mr. HOUSE. Yes. I have quite a lot I want to say if I have the time.

The CHAIRMAN. Have your members voted for a strike?

Mr. HOUSE. The date is set——

The CHAIRMAN (interposing). Are they going to vote for a strike?

Mr. HOUSE. I do not know how they will vote. They will vote on the question next Sunday.

The CHAIRMAN. You have announced that the members of your organization will have an opportunity to vote on the question of a strike on Sunday of this week?

Mr. HOUSE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the issue that you are at variance with the company over?

Mr. HOUSE. The refusal of the company to recognize the union as a duly accredited agency.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not over this 24- or 30-hour plan?

Mr. HOUSE. No.

The CHAIRMAN. So you are going to strike because you have not been able to convince the employers of the company and they have declined to recognize your association for the purpose of collective bargaining?

Mr. HOUSE. I would not say——

The CHAIRMAN (interposing). Why has not this matter been called to the Labor Board?

Mr. HOUSE. It has.

The CHAIRMAN. Why have they not taken action?

Mr. HOUSE. For this reason: In the Goodrich and the Firestone cases, whose appeals preceded ours to the Board in this case, they spent a lot of money, the unions involved spent a lot of money going to hearings, financing their own witnesses and lawyers, and such, and they have obtained nothing, because the companies, in each case, have taken an appeal of the case to the circuit court, and it still remains before the court. They have been able to get no action. So the order, when it was issued by the National Labor Relations Board, the companies refused to accept that as final.

The CHAIRMAN. That is all in the case you referred to, Mr. Magruder?

Mr. MAGRUDER. Yes.

Mr. HOUSE. Another reason was that the application by the industrial assembly and the contention of the management was that the election should be held on company property.

The CHAIRMAN. Wait a minute and see if we have this record clear. In the case of the two competing companies with the Goodyear Co., there has been petitions to the Labor Board for elections for the purpose of determining who represents the employees for collective bargaining purposes with the employers. In those two cases elections have been ordered but appeals have been taken by the employers under the law, I assume, and there is consequent delay in holding the elections. Your organization, in view of the experience in the other two cases, and the delay, propose to determine whether they will have a strike or not rather than to go to the Labor Board and be subjected to delays and appeals that you think may result?

Mr. HOUSE. That is right. And that is why we are asking and pleading that the Wagner Labor Disputes Act be immediately enacted.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, let me see. In a situation like that, this bill would prevent these delays.

Mr. HOUSE. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. It is one of the features of the bill to eliminate the delays that have been experienced as a result of these two cases and other cases. Proceed.

Mr. HOUSE. I did not have the advantage that the other side has had in this, and I do not have a lawyer paid by the company to prepare a brief for me. I knew of their coming here only about 10 o'clock last night, and I only had half an hour to catch a train, so I immediately beat it to the train without a suitcase or anything, and I came to Washington in order to appear here. Through that fortuitous circumstance, I was able to make it, and through your benevolence I was able to appear before the board.

I have a few notes jotted down here. Although the statements may be rather disconnected, I think it will bring about clearly the things I want to say.

The CHAIRMAN. I understand you do favor this legislation?

Mr. HOUSE. I am in favor of it; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. One of the reasons we have already developed. Are there any other reasons?

Mr. HOUSE. Another main reason would be that I am in favor of the bill and the organization which I represent and also I represent the feeling expressed by the other bona fide unions in the city of Akron and the district; we are in favor of the bill because it guarantees to the workers the right to choose freely and without interference from either source, and that it provides an adequate enforcement of the law which the Senate Resolution 44 obviously has not done. We fought for the bill in the Seventy-third Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. I assume that you have used no coercion in your efforts to obtain members in your organization or in any of these organizations?

Mr. HOUSE. That assumption is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course, there is no law that can prevent you from discussing the matter amicably and peaceably with the workers there and presenting to them the merits of your organization and the demerits of theirs; nor is there in this bill anything to prevent an employer from discussing with his employees the merits and demerits of the various kinds of organizations.

Mr. HOUSE. Not that I know of.

The CHAIRMAN. I think that you would agree with me that it would be unfortunate, for instance, if an employer mistakenly but honestly believed that an organization was attempted to be formed among his employees that was un-American, and that he should be denied the right to state that, and show that to his individual men or even collectively. You agree with that, of course?

Mr. HOUSE. This is a free country.

The CHAIRMAN. So that all that you are asking for yourself, you are willing to give to the employer, in the matter of discussing amicably and peaceably the merits and the demerits of any particular organization?

Mr. HOUSE. Yes, sir.

Senator WALSH. When it comes to the question of coercion or interference, that is a different thing. We are now talking about influence. In this bill originally, the word "influence" was included, to prevent the employer using influence, and so forth, and we struck the word "influence" out, because we felt that an employer should not be prevented from exercising his influence for or against any particular organization that he thought detrimental to the welfare of his workingmen. Of course they would be left free to reject his advice and views and not to be interfered with if they did not choose to accept it. So that I understand you to say that all you have been doing is in a peaceable way, trying to argue it and persuade these employees that your organization is better than the one they have, for their own good.

Mr. HOUSE. That is true. The whole question would hinge on a definition of what constitutes interference.

The CHAIRMAN. That is a difficult situation. Coercion is more easily definable, but interference would not be, but I personally do not think that peaceably arguing for or against a particular course of action is interference. Do you?

Mr. HOUSE. Here is one thing where it might be interference. You must realize that a man working on a job for a company has an inherent fear of losing his job, so that when the employer takes a definite stand and advises its employees that he favors certain plans, their wills are corrupted because they fear unless they do as he wants them to do, they will lose their job, and without the protection of a bona fide labor union, they are powerless to protect themselves and are therefore fearful of losing their jobs if they incur the displeasure or ill will of the boss.

The CHAIRMAN. After this bill is enacted, if it is enacted, no employees can be discharged without an appeal to the Labor Board if he can prove that the reason for his dismissal is because he did not take the advice of his employer and because he chose some other organization different from the employer's, and that is one of the arguments made for the bill by its proponents, that it seeks to remove the economic pressure that the employer possesses by reason of his ability to discharge a man if their minds do not meet on a question of what form or character of organization they should join.

Mr. HOUSE. That same thing existed to a certain degree at least, in the Joint Resolution 44, but the difficulty is educating the workers.

The CHAIRMAN. There was no definition in that of what is called "unfair practices." I am afraid I am taking up too much of your time and my own time in discussing this. You may proceed.

Mr. HOUSE. What I started to say there was that the workers themselves sometimes do not have faith enough in the Government boards; that is, they are afraid that the manufacturers themselves will be able to evade the law through some legal step, therefore, without strong organizations behind them, they will, rather than take their case to the courts and risk the chances of losing it and thereafter being discharged, they will accept things as they are without comment.

I have stated some reasons why we favor the enactment of the bill, and I will give some further reasons.

The Industrial Assembly, which the members that preceded me represent, was instituted shortly after a strike of machinists in 1919. The machinists' strike threatened to tie up the productive operations of the plant. Shortly after that, the plan was put into effect.

I have affidavits here before me to show that it was never submitted to a vote of the employees; that is, they never voted directly on whether or not the plan was acceptable to them, and no other substitute was offered to them. It was either "take it or leave it."

I have affidavits to show also that coercion was used, intimidation and interference, inasmuch as foremen went around and told them unless they voted for someone to represent them under the plan, that they might incur the ill will and displeasure of Mr. Litchfield, who conceived the plan himself and put it in operation.

In 1926, after the plan went into effect and was working for some 7 years——

The CHAIRMAN (interposing). I assume that one employee could do that after this law is passed, that one employee could go to another and say, "now, John, you should not join this organization, our bosses won't like it and it will be unpleasant, and I cannot urge that too strongly." On the other hand, an employee can go to another employee and say, "John, this union is not free to represent you and fight for your rights, and you want to belong to this other union."

Mr. HOUSE. That would be possible.

Senator WALSH. I do not suppose there would be any violation of the law under this bill. If the employee himself or a foreman or superintendent or someone to whom it could be traced that he was directing this propaganda, it might be construed as interference.

Mr. HOUSE. That is what I would say would be interference. Let the employees choose freely.

The CHAIRMAN. I think you will agree with me that any fellow employee would have as much right to argue against your union as much as you would have a right to argue in favor of the merits of your union.

Mr. HOUSE. That is true. In 1926, after the plan had been in operation for a period of over 7 years, about 5,000 Goodyear employees joined an outside union.

The CHAIRMAN. This was in 1926, you say?

Mr. HOUSE. This was in 1926. That was under threat of discharge which finally did come to many of them, the most active workers in the organization, after the organization was broken up through the underhanded methods, spy systems, and so forth, which were employed at that time by the manufacturers.

The assembly is not a collective-bargaining agency. It is impossible for it to bargain collectively, which I can show through referring you to the decision handed down by the National Labor Relations Board in the case of Goodrich and Firestone, which organizations are similar in most details. That is to say, that the assembly as my predecessor here has stated, it passes a bill, but it must go then to the factory manager for his O. K. before it becomes a law, as a rule, in the shop. If he vetoes it, it must be passed over his veto by a two-thirds vote of both the house and the senate, and each vote must be an aye and no vote, and the way the man voted is to be recorded and spread in the minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Does it then become a rule or regulation?

Mr. HOUSE. No; it does not then.

The CHAIRMAN. If the representative group and the senatorial group pass a resolution asking that the working hours be reduced from 8 to 7½, and it goes to the management and the management vetoes it, then if the representative passes it by two-thirds and the Senate passes it by two-thirds, what happens then?

Mr. HOUSE. It goes up the line. The board of directors holds the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The only thing left then is to strike, of course, if the men insist.

Mr. HOUSE. There is something rather curious, rather humorous in it.

The CHAIRMAN. I do not see why it is necessary to go through those stages of a two-thirds vote.

Mr. HOUSE. That is provided for in the plan.

The CHAIRMAN. Unless the two-thirds vote would emphasize to the management the determination on the part of the men and give them a chance to see that the men were in deadly earnest, is that right?

Mr. HOUSE. That might possibly be the operation. Of course it is said that they can now appeal to the National Labor Relations Board, but that is not so in the matter of wages and hours, because the jurisdiction of that board is only on questions of discrimination, as I understand it.

They are powerless to pass any bill which, as I say, the company does not favor. I would like to point out that the men cannot be courageous, having no organization backing, to pass a bill over the president's veto, certainly where it must be that his vote is so recorded, and the management would know exactly how he voted.

The CHAIRMAN. You make that argument as indicating the limitations upon real collective bargaining and choice under this system?

Mr. HOUSE. That is right. They never call meetings of the employees. The question of the hours, a few days ago, was the first time in my experience with the plant that such a vote was taken on any question. The total vote cast was 9,258, as I said, and more than 7,000 have at one time or another been members of the Federal Labor Union and besides those who have joined the various craft organizations.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, young man, you impress me as being very fair-minded and sincere and in earnest in the advancement of the organizations that you represent. Why is not the sensible thing for you to do—pardon me for giving this advice—to ask your men not to strike now, but to petition this labor board for an election. You will have the same delays undoubtedly that the others have had, but you will finally get a decision. If you do not get it in the courts, you may get it through this appeal. If a majority of those workers want the organization that you represent, they are going to have it sooner or later. It may be postponing or delaying the matter, and it seems to me that that would be the better course for you to pursue rather to have at this time these men put to the trouble and expense of being out of work. I know that it is a good deal to ask. On the other side, you may not be able to control the situation and control the spirit of these men.

Let me first ask Mr. Magruder: What is the legal objection being raised by the companies to the order of the Labor Board?

Mr. MAGRUDER. Senator, they attack the constitutionality of Senate resolution 44 as beyond the power of Congress as applied to regulating labor relationships in manufacturing, which they say is not interstate commerce.

The CHAIRMAN. In other words, they raise the question that no Federal law can attempt to regulate the relationship between the employer and employee in the production plants?

Mr. MAGRUDER. Yes; that is their fundamental contention. They also raised a question whether the "public interest" requires an election, as the statute reads. That phrase has not been interpreted by the courts yet.

The CHAIRMAN. It is certain that there is in this case and it is almost true in the other, what we would call the possibilities of a strike, the threat of a strike.

Mr. HOUSE. I have not any doubt about it myself. They are fighting it all along the line.

Senator WALSH. I submit that, young man, to you. Perhaps I am trespassing beyond my prerogatives in even making a statement to you, but it is made with the best of intentions and I am sure that you will probably consider that. Of course, it is possible that you may not be able to get the majority in the election now and in time you would.

Mr. HOUSE. Along that line, we have been 18 months trying to keep down a strike and wait upon the boards. We have waited through the Goodrich and Firestone cases, which are almost analogous, and the same principles and laws would apply.

Senator WALSH. But could not those cases be heard for a decision?

Mr. MAGRUDER. They will be up for argument in April, I think, before the Circuit Court of Appeals.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there an appeal then to the Supreme Court of the United States?

Mr. MAGRUDER. Yes.

Mr. HOUSE. Then, understanding the attitude of the management, the only thing, when the question was brought up of an election now, the management was asked if they would agree to negotiate an agreement to a final conclusion with the group that might be successful in an election held under the auspices of the National Labor Relations Board. They still wanted it on the company property, and there was a statement made by Mr. Slusser, the vice president and general manager of the company, that he would not let a dog of his go to the armory to vote. They maintain that the election should be held on the company property, which we maintain is not fair and right. It should be held on neutral property and give everyone an opportunity to freely express his choice. That is all we ask for.

Then, too, is the advantage of the assembly, the financial support given by the company. I would like to enlarge upon that just a little. The financial support given to the representatives in the industrial assembly—a little history there might clarify the situation.

In 1933, in July, the Budget allowance for members of this industrial assembly representatives and senators was 25 hours per month. That time could be used during working hours or after working hours—it did not matter. And there is extra time allotted for committee work.

At that time we began to organize a bona fide labor union outside, and by the fall of 1933 this budget allowance had been raised to 45 hours per month, with the extra time allowed for committee work.

Some time later, in the early part of 1934, when the organization was at its peak, the outside labor organization was at its peak; that is, in paid-up membership; that limit was almost, you might say, taken off. That is, unlimited time was given to any persons purporting to represent employees through the plan. That continued up until recently, when the edict came down from the management that they would have to adhere strictly to their budgetary allowances, that is, the 50 hours per month of straight assembly work besides their other committee work.

That is a corrupting influence which would be done away with by the Wagner labor-dispute bill.

I would like to read from a decision just a few lines. Before doing that there is one statement I would like to make. It has been said that the collective bargaining or freedom of contract——

The CHAIRMAN (interposing). Will you let us have the decision to be printed in the record instead of your reading it?

Mr. HOUSE. I was not going to read the entire thing. I just wanted to point out a few salient features only. Freedom of contract is possible only where there is equality of bargaining power, which evidently is not so in regard to the assembly plan.

There are some excerpts from the Firestone and Goodrich decisions—statements that I want to read.

The CHAIRMAN. That may all go in the record.

Mr. HOUSE. Yes, sir. In referring to the Firestone plan, they said:

> The plan as we read it is better adapted to the handling of hours and basic working conditions affecting the plant as a whole. Significant in this connection is the fact that the plan does not provide for general meetings of employees, as in a union local, nor even for regular meetings of the whole body of representatives, which factors, if included in the plan, would obviously afford a ready means for the formulation of the collective wishes of employees which are essentially preliminary to the process of collective bargaining.

And then they say further:

> As we have intimated, the company's conduct with reference to the creation and operating of the employees' conference plan, may be an interference with the rights of self-organization under section 7–a. If after the election, the company maintains its practice of contributing to the financial support of the plan, whether or not the plan represents the suffrage of the majority, such action might be held to constitute a continuing interference.

That was in the Firestone case.

In the Goodrich case they said:

> The plan is not a membership organization, but rather is a method which may be used by the employees to bring grievances to the management for consideration.

Collective bargaining is more than the handling of grievances, as we all know.

> Amendment of the plan is not possible without the consent of the company, because it is provided that proposed amendments must run the gauntlet of two joint committees composed in equal numbers of representatives of management and employees, before they receive the final sanction of the elected representatives of employees from the various departments or divisions. No referendum as to the body of employees is provided in such cases.

Original from UNIVERSITY OF ILLINOIS AT URBANA-CHAMPAIGN

And later along they say:

> It is clear that the company has actively participated in the drafting, adoption and financing of the Goodrich cooperative plan, that the plan has never been put to a vote of the employees for acceptance or rejection; that the employees have never had an opportunity of voting on whether they desire to be represented as provided in the plan or by the local outside union—or words to that effect.

One other quotation from the decision. In speaking of the feature of the plan that paid the salaries to employer representatives, it says:

> At this juncture, we believe that the company interfered with the self-organization of its employees when it threw the great weight of its financial support in favor of the group of employees who wanted a plant organization. The tendency of the thing at the time of the inauguration of the plan was corrupting and the continuance of financial support by the company at the present time is corrupting. This is particularly true of the payment of salaries to representatives. However single-minded these elected representatives under the plan might be in their devotion to the interests of the employees, the provision for paying extra salaries to the approximately 150 employees representatives causes their independence of employer domination to be highly dubious.

Those are the words of the National Labor Relations Board, and they are significant. The passage of the Wagner labor dispute bill will do away with a condition of that sort; it will enable the workers themselves to choose freely as to the organization that might represent them.

This does not preclude independent organizations or the company union. It does not preclude the company union. The employees might elect to be represented by an independent group composed entirely of employees of their own manufacturing establishment, but lacking the great weight of the financial support of the company behind them, they would be on an equal footing, even though if an outside organization from that standpoint that is one affiliated with the American Federation of Labor. in getting membership into their organization.

We have in Akron an independent organization started. They are not very successful in getting memberships.

The CHAIRMAN. That is a local independent apart from the American Federation of Labor?

Mr. HOUSE. Yes, sir. But neither is it dominated by the company. There was a feeling among the workers that the American Federation of Labor was too conservative and reactionary. That is, they want direct action. It is a form of communism, communistic tendencies that cause these workers to desert the ranks of the more conservative element and to go to the independent union, the vertical independent union. Lacking the financial support of the company, the employees then would be given the choice as to which of the two organizations they wanted to belong to. Of course, it would naturally result in the workers belonging to an organization that in itself would be more capable of protecting their interest.

It does not preclude that there will be closed shops. That is as we all know, brought about through agreements between the men and the management. It merely gives employees an opportunity to choose freely without the corrupting influence of paternalistic employers, who will prey upon the most gullible type of worker, promise him promotion and extra pay, and threaten workers with the withdrawal of certain privileges enjoyed by them at present, given them as a sort of opiate or palliative to soothe their injuries. That will do away with that.

Of course, a bona fide labor organization, out from under the domination of the boss, does not say that there will always be strikes. The workers now are better educated than they were years ago. They understand the problems of management better than they did years ago, so that it is only fair to assume that should the employers deal fairly with the men, that that would insure that they would deal fairly to, and would be more inclined to deal fairly with them unless they were goaded to some radical action by the tactics of some unfair employer.

I think that the employers oppose the bill because they want to be able to maintain their despotic control of workers through the control of company unions. The only reason why the company unions oppose the bill is that it would prevent them from spying on their fellow workers openly in the guise of representing them in the presentation of their grievances and get paid for it by their employer, instead of having to operate under cover.

I have a clipping here from the Akron Times-Press, of the statement made by the vice president and general manager of the Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., referring to the statement made by President Green before this committee, I think. Regarding the hiring of paid spies, by the company, he made this statement. I will file it with my testimony, and that statement was made in the presence of reporters from the Beacon Journal and the Press. The Press carried it as an item in quotation marks.

Another note that I have here is the mystery of the employers when a labor question comes up, which is highly amusing to those who understand the principles of organized labor and the psychology of a worker in a labor organization and their reaction to the attempt of their labor organizers to stampede them or of employers to sully them or keep them in meek submission.

Workers are not so ignorant of the problems of management as they were, and unless goaded by unfair tactics of employers through radical action, they are more than willing to cooperate with the management. I think that has been proven on many occasions.

Speaking of the benefits that have been obtained by the company's union in Akron during 1933 and 1934 or since the organizing started in Akron, the American Federation of Labor affiliates have signed 200 closed-shop agreements, signed with manufacturers and employers in that district, Greater Akron. Over 2,000 verbal and written agreements covering wages, hours, and working conditions, raising wages in some instances and as much as $40 per month per person. That accounts in great measure for the $21,000,000 increase in the pay rolls in Greater Akron during the year 1934.

The CHAIRMAN. Are these agreements with competitive organizations?

Mr. HOUSE. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. None with this organization?

Mr. HOUSE. No.

The CHAIRMAN. But industrial organizations that perform the same function?

Mr. HOUSE. There is one closed-shop agreement with a rubber-manufacturing concern in Greater Akron. That is in a suburb of Akron, the India Tire & Rubber Co., which has a closed-shop agreement, even using the union label. That is the only rubber shop in competition with the three large major shops, and of course they do not compete much with them.

In the organized shops, there is too great a disparity in wages paid to the different classes of workers. The building-service employees representatives a short time ago made the statement that their membership was being discriminated against. The same is true in our locality. A member in the building service averages around 50 cents an hour.

I have affidavits here to show that the company does interfere with the rights of self-organization in the plant. They show coercion and intimidation.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you want those put in the record, or would you rather not have them in the record?

Mr. HOUSE. I think it is just as well to keep them out of the record except as I may comment upon them if I may.

The CHAIRMAN. You can put them into the record without the names.

Mr. HOUSE. The stenographer is taking down what I am saying, is he not? So that is all I care to say is what should go in.

There is an affidavit here which shows that in a certain department in the Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co. when they reported such a high vote in the industrial assembly plan, that a certain foreman got up on a table—he wrote a notice first on the bulletin board that he wanted to see and talk to all of the employees in that department at a certain hour. That was at 12 o'clock noon. At 12 o'clock noon, when the shift changed, the first shift going out and the second shift coming in, all of the employees in both shifts gathered around that table in the department. The foreman arose on the table and addressed them and told them what a good fellow he had been to them and all through the preceding years, and he said that he intended to continue in that way and in that spirit, but that it would be a great personal favor to him if they would go ahead and vote, take an active part in the company union.

We in the outside union passed a resolution that no member of our union should take active part in the industrial assembly, feeling that that was the greatest curse to workers—a company-dominated union was the greatest curse that the workers ever had foisted upon them. So that we passed a resolution that our membership would not be allowed to participate and take active part. Some of them construed that to mean that they could not vote in the industrial assembly elections, and the company seemed to take the same attitude, because they went around and asked them to vote.

This man got up on a table and addressed them just as at a meeting, that he would consider it a personal favor if they were to go and vote. That was on the day preceding the date of the election. It happened at that time they were rotating, that is, during slack production they would rotate one day; a certain group would stay off 1 day and the other group would work. They were getting perhaps 4 days per week per person, but still the plant was operating 5 days a week. That day the polls were brought in by the assembly.

The CHAIRMAN. I have given you a good deal of time, Mr. House.

Mr. HOUSE. I am sorry if I have imposed upon your good nature.

The CHAIRMAN. I have some other witnesses that must be heard tonight.

Mr. HOUSE. I will conclude, then, very shortly. I would just like to say that our organization has voted upon this. They did not tell me to come down here. I am acting in the capacity representing the United Workers Federal Labor Union, having a large membership employed by the Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co. We fought for the bill, passed resolutions in favor of the bill during the Seventy-third Congress, and sent them in. A record was made of our last resolution, I think it was on March 5 of this year, that we sent the resolution in to the Senate, the Speaker of the House, and the President of the Senate in favor of this bill, so that I am carrying out the orders of my members.

(As directed by the chairman, the following National Relations Labor Board decisions are incorporated in the record in connection with the testimony of Mr. House.)

National Labor Relations Board 208. In the matter of Firestone Tire & Rubber Co. employees conference plan and United Rubber Workers Federal Labor Union, Local No. 18321. Case No. 156. Hearing, October 19, 1934; decision, November 20, 1934.

The Firestone Tire & Rubber Co., of Akron, Ohio, is a corporation organized under the laws of Ohio. It manufactures tires and other rubber products, obtaining its raw materials, such as rubber and cotton, from the Far East and other points beyond the borders of Ohio. The finished products are sold and shipped all over the United States by a wholly owned subsidiary corporation organized under the laws of West Virginia, which is known as the Firestone Tire & Rubber Co. of West Virginia and which has sales agencies throughout the United States. Some of the officers of the West Virginia corporation are likewise officers of the parent corporation in Ohio, and the sales manager of the West Virginia corporation has his office in the same building with the Ohio corporation. All of the officers of the West Virginia corporation are residents of Ohio. There is a wholly owned subsidiary of the Ohio corporation located in California known as the Firestone Tire & Rubber Co. of California, and another subsidiary in Liberia, which has a plantation there. The company signed the President's reemployment agreement, effective August 1, 1933, and since December 1933 has been subject to the rubber manufacturing industry code and the rubber tire manufacturing industry code. On September 1, 1934, the company employed 10,552 factory and office employees, of which number 9,048 were factory-clock employees.

United Rubber Workers Federal Labor Union, Local No. 18321, which obtained its charter from the American Federation of Labor on July 25, 1933, and which is composed wholly of employees in the Firestone plant, has petitioned the Board to order an election to determine by what person, persons, or organization the employees of the Firestone Tire & Rubber Co. desire to be represented for the purpose of collective bargaining. Local 18321, and its affiliated craft locals, are members of the United Rubber Workers Council, affiliated with the American Federation of Labor. A motion was made at the hearings before the regional board, on September 26, 1934, for an order declaring the employees' conference plan illegal because of the alleged interference, coercion, and intimidation by the company in the organization and continuance of the plan; and included in the motion was a request that the company be required to desist from financial support of the plan. At the hearing before us on October 19, 1934, some further evidence was introduced and argument was held on the record.

Shortly after local no. 18321 was organized, a so-called "employees' conference plan" became operative in the Firestone plants on September 21, 1933. This plan is not a membership organization but rather is a method which may be used by the employees to present their grievances to the management for consideration. The professed purpose of the plan, as stated in the constitution, is to promote a spirit of cooperating and mutual understanding between all persons engaged in the operation of the plant. The company contends that the plan was instigated and developed by the employees themselves, while local no. 18321 contends that the plan was sponsored by the management to interfere with its development.

It is clear that the company cooperated in and encouraged the formulation of the plan and to some extent supervised the details of its organization. The management conducted an election among the employees for the selection of representatives from the various departments to draft a plan. These elected representatives named from their group a drafting committee, which, with the aid of the management representatives, drafted a plan. This plan, having been approved by the management representatives as well as by the employee representatives, was forthwith put into operation as the employees' conference plan, without any vote of ratification by the general body of employees.

The Firestone Tire & Rubber Co. owns a number of adjacent plants in Akron. Each plant is divided into departments. The employees' conference plan, as finally adopted, provides for an employees' committee, departmental conference committees, and a senior conference committee. The employees' committee consists of representatives nominated and elected by the employees from the various company departments. Each elected committeeman represents approximately 100 employees. The purpose of the employees' committee is "to present and discuss such matters as wages, working conditions, working hours, seniority, health, safety, and any such other and similar matters as may pertain to the general welfare of the employees." The elected committeemen also serve on their respective departmental and plant conference committees. The plan provides further that the management shall group the departments into divisions. The elected committeemen from each division then elect one of their number to the senior conference committee. Each member of the senior conference committee represents approximately 500 employees.

An employee who desires to submit a problem to the employees' conference plan must refer that problem through the following steps, in consecutive order, until satisfactory action results: (1) Employee to foreman, (2) employee to committeeman or department manager, (3) committeeman to foreman or department manager or departmental conference, (4) department manager or committeeman to labor department, (5) department manager or committeeman or labor department to plant conference committee, (6) plant conference committee to senior conference committee.

In a case where the matter has been submitted to the senior conference committee and that committee is unable to agree with the management, it may be submitted to a board of arbitration for final decision.

Aside from a provision that employee representatives shall receive their full pay during the time devoted to representation work, there is no provision in the plan itself for financial support by the company. The evidence disclosed, however, that the company is paying the current operating expenses of the plan.

Under the prescribed procedure for amendment of the plan, no changes can be made in it without the consent of the management.

It is clear that the company has actively participated in the drafting, adoption, and financing of the employees' conference plan; that the plan has never been put to a vote of the employees for acceptance or rejection; that the employees have never had an opportunity of voting on whether they wanted to be represented as provided in the plan or by local 18321, of which a large number of Firestone employees are members.

The employees as a body have voted on the selection of the drafting committee as aforesaid and at the election conducted under the terms of the plan. The employees would naturally want to participate in the selection of the representatives chosen under the plan, because it is in fact the collective-bargaining agency now recognized by the company. Hence, the fact that three-fourths of the employees participated in the annual elections in October 1934 affords no sufficient basis for inferring that they liked the plan or would choose it as against other alternatives. Furthermore, even though no overt threats have been made by responsible officials, employees would quite understandably be reluctant to render themselves conspicuous by refusing to participate in the election, in view of the fact that the company is known to be strongly supporting the plan.

Notwithstanding the foregoing, it is claimed for the plan that it has the support of a majority of the Firestone employees. On the other hand, union officials have testified that local no. 18321 has as members over 6,000 employees of the Firestone Co.; and on the basis of such asserted membership it is claimed that a majority of the employees would choose to be represented by the United Rubber Workers Council.

The company argues that the public interest does not require an election here, because conditions are peaceful at the plant, and the campaigning incidental to an election will only serve to create disturbances among the employees.

But the requirements of public interest do not limit us to ordering elections only in cases where disorder exists or where there have been threats of a strike. The basic purpose of Congress in providing for elections was to facilitate the free exercise by the employees of their right of self-organization for collective bargaining. When we find in existence a plant organization or company union whose claims to be the choice of the employees for collective bargaining are open to serious challenge, as in this case, the very existence of such a substantial controversy is likely to lead to strife and discord if the wishes of the employees are not ascertained by an impartial agency. We think the present case is one in which a secret election conducted by us would fulfill the purposes of Congress as disclosed in section 7 (a) and in Public Resolution 44, Seventy-third Congress.

We consider now the appropriate form of ballot and other matters connected with the election.

The motion by local no. 18321 that the employees' conference plan be declared illegal we interpret as a request that it be excluded from a place on the ballot. Since the election is to determine a choice of representatives for collective bargaining, we may, in extreme cases, be justified in refusing a place on the ballot to an organization or plan of representation which by its very terms is incapable of serving as a collective-bargaining agency. This, however, we should rarely have occasion to do, since ordinarily the choice, good or bad, is for the employees to make. The plan, as we read it, is better adapted to the handling of individual grievances than it is for collective bargaining on matters of wages, hours, and basic working conditions affecting the plant as a whole.

Significant in this connection is the fact that the plan does not provide for general meetings of employees, as in a union local nor even for regular meetings of the whole body of representatives, which factors, if included in the plan would obviously afford a ready means for the formulation of the collective wishes of employees which are an essential preliminary to the process of collective bargaining. Nevertheless, collective bargaining is not impossible under the plan, and hence, so far as this point is concerned, there is no sufficient reason for excluding the plan from a place on the ballot. Insofar as the company's conduct in assisting and supporting the organization of the plan is concerned, even though that conduct may have been an improper interference with self-organization under section 7 (a), a secret election held under our auspices can remedy the wrong already done, as we held in the Kohler case. The constitution of the plan itself does not prescribe that the company shall pay the operating expenses and hence the fact that the company had made a practice of doing so in the past is not in itself a sufficient reason for keeping the plan off the ballot.

As we have intimated, the company's conduct with reference to the creation and operating of the employees' conference plan may be an interference with the rights of self-organization under section 7 (a). If after the election the company maintains its practice of contribution to the financial support of the plan, whether or not the plan represents the suffrage of the majority, such action might be held to constitute a continuing interference. But the petition addressed to us was simply a request for an election; the notice of hearing before the regional board so defined the issue.

Likewise, the notice of hearing before the National Labor Relations Board informed the company that it was "for the purpose of determining whether in the public interest an election should be held of the employees of the Firestone Tire & Rubber Co. to determine by what person, persons, or organization they desire to be represented for the purpose of collective bargaining as defined in section 7 (a) of the N. R. A." It is true that at the end of the hearing before the regional board a motion was made to declare the plan illegal because of the company's alleged interference with self-organization, and in the briefs submitted to us, as well as the oral argument before us, this matter was debated by counsel. Nevertheless, in view of the announced scope of the hearing, it may fairly be contended that the company was not put on notice that its "blue eagle" was in jeopardy. The allegations as to the illegality of the employees' conference plan were incidental to the election petition and might have been directed toward the question whether the plan should be accorded a place on the ballot. Therefore, in this proceeding we refrain from any decision respecting the company's alleged illegal activity in contributing to the financial support of the plan.

There have been 1,000 employees laid off in recent months. It was testified on behalf of the company that the large number of men laid off were laid off during the last 2 or 3 months. It was testified further that they were not laid off because of a seasonal decline in business, but rather because of an abnormal reduction in the amount of their business. It is to be expected that when business improves, at least some of these employees will be called back to work. If we select as the date for determining eligibility to vote the date on which the petition for election was received, September 7, 1934, we shall thereby include a considerable part of the employees now laid off but who are expected to be called back to work as business improves. We therefore hold that all of the production and maintenance employees on the company pay roll on September 7, 1934, and, in addition, all production and maintenance employees who have been added to the pay roll in the period from September 7 to 2 days before the date of the election, and are still on the pay roll of the company 2 days before the date of election, shall be eligible to vote in the election.

FINDINGS OF FACT

1. The Firestone Tire & Rubber Co. signed the President's Reemployment Agreement effective August 1, 1933, and has been subject to the Rubber Manufacturing Industry Code and the Rubber Tire Manufacturing Industry Code since December 1933. The company manufactures tires and other rubber products and through wholly owned subsidiaries sells and ships its finished products all over the world. It employs approximately 10,552 factory and office employees of which number 9,048 are factory-clock employees.

2. The Firestone Tire & Rubber Co. is a corporation having its general offices and manufacturing plant at Akron, Ohio, and through a wholly owned subsidiary corporation organized under the laws of West Virginia has sales and service agencies in Ohio and other States. The company engages in interstate commerce, obtaining raw materials from States other than Ohio and shipping and selling its finished products all over the world through sales agencies.

3. The United Rubber Workers Federal Labor Union Local No. 18321 for employees of the Firestone Tire & Rubber Co. obtained its charter from the American Federation of Labor on July 25, 1933, and, according to testimony before us, has more than 6,000 members. Local 18321, and its affiliated craft locals, are members of the United Rubber Workers Council affiliated with the American Federation of Labor.

4. On September 21, 1933, the employees conference plan became operative within the Firestone Tire & Rubber Co. The plan was drafted by representatives elected by the employees with the assistance and cooperation of the management. It was approved by the elected representatives of the employees and the management representatives and put into effect without any further ratification by the general body of employees. Its expenses are paid by the company.

5. There are conflicting claims on behalf of employees conference plan and United Rubber Workers Council as to who represents a majority of the workers of the Firestone Tire & Rubber Co. for the purpose of collective bargaining. The employees have not had an opportunity to vote on acceptance or rejection of the employees conference plan nor have they had an opportunity to vote on the alternatives of the plan and United Rubber Workers Council.

6. Continuance of the present uncertain situation is conducive to discord among the employees.

7. Approximately 1,000 workers have been laid off during the last few months because of an abnormal decline in business. Local 18321 made application to the regional labor board, eighth district, for an election on September 7, 1934.

CONCLUSION

It is the conclusion of this Board that it is in the public interest that an election by secret ballot of the production and maintenance employees of the Firestone Tire & Rubber Co. should be had to determine whether they desire to be represented by the employees' conference plan or by the United Rubber Workers Council for the purpose of collective bargaining as defined in section 7 (a) of the National Industrial Recovery Act and incorporated in Public Resolution 44 of the Seventy-third Congress.

ORDER FOR ELECTION

This proceeding having been duly heard by the National Labor Relations Board on October 19, 1934, upon petition of the United Rubber Workers Federal Labor Union, Local No. 18231, and upon testimony and evidence received at Cleveland, Ohio, on September 26 and October 1, 1934, and thereafter at Washington, D. C., this Board having herewith made its decision, its findings of fact, and its conclusion that it appears to be in the public interest to so order: Now, therefore, it is Ordered that within a period of 3 weeks from the date of this decision, and between such hours and at such place as the director of the regional labor board for the eighth district may determine, having in view the making of the necessary mechanical arrangements, there shall be held, under the supervision of a representative of the National Labor Relations Board, an election by secret ballot of the production and maintenance employees of the Firestone Tire & Rubber Co. who were on the company pay roll on September 7, 1934, and in addition all production and maintenance employees who have been added to the pay roll in the period from September 7 to 2 days before the date of the election and are still on the pay roll of the company 2 days before the date of the election, to determine whether they desire to be represented by the employees' conference plan or by the United Rubber Workers Council for the purpose of collective bargaining as defined in section 7 (a) of the National Industrial Recovery Act and incorporated in Public Resolution 44 of the Seventy-third Congress.

Ordered further, for the purpose of determining the eligibility of employees to vote, that 2 days before the date of election the Firestone Tire & Rubber Co. shall submit to the director of the regional labor board, eighth district, as representative of the National Labor Relations Board, it pay-roll lists showing the names of all its production and maintenance employees who were on its pay roll on September 7, 1934, and all its production and maintenance employees hired since September 7, 1934, and who are on its pay roll 2 days before the date of election.

NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD,
H. A. MILLIS.
EDWIN S. SMITH.

National Labor Relations Board (209). In the matter of B. F. Goodrich Co., Goodrich Cooperative Plan, and the United Rubber Workers Federal Labor Union, Local 18319. Case 155. Hearing, Oct. 18, 1934; decision, Nov. 20, 1934.

The B. F. Goodrich Co. manufactures rubber products which, through sales agencies, are sold and shipped all over the world. It maintains sales agencies, service agencies, and plants in States other than Ohio, and obtains raw materials from points outside of the borders of Ohio. The company signed the President's reemployment agreement effective August 1, 1933, and since December 1933 has been subject to the Rubber Manufacturing Industry Code and the Rubber Tire Manufactoring Industry Code. There are approximately 15,000 employees within the plant at Akron, made up of about 12,000 production and maintenance employees, 2,000 clerical employees, and 859 to 900 supervisory employees.

The United Rubber Workers Federal Labor Union Local No. 18319, which obtained its charter from the American Federation of Labor on August 6, 1933, has petitioned the National Labor Relations Board to order an election to determine by what person, persons, or organization the employees of the B. F. Goodrich Co., of Akron, Ohio, want to be represented for the purpose of collective bargaining. Local No. 18319 and its affiliated craft locals are members of the United Rubber Workers Council affiliated with the American Federation of Labor.

Shortly after Local No. 18319 was organized the company began to concern itself with employee representation for collective bargaining purposes. The management instituted a survey to find out what sort of plan would be acceptable to the employees, and thereafter at the request of a number of employees, arrangements were made to have the various departments within the plant elect representatives to a drafting committee. These elected representatives named a smaller committee which in cooperation with representatives of the management drafted a plan. This plan was then approved by the management as well as by the elected representatives of the employees, and went into operation in October 1933, as the Goodrich Cooperative Plan.

The plan is not a membership organization, but rather is a method which may be used by the employees to bring grievances to the management for consideration. It has for its professed purposes the promotion of closer relations between employees and management and the provision of a means whereby employees shall have representation for collective bargaining. The plan provides for the annual nomination and election by the employees of representatives from the various divisions of the company to serve upon a general committee. The representatives of the employees on the general committee elect officers and also elect a chairman and four members of a wage committee and a chairman and four members of a welfare committee. The management has one representative on each of the two committees. The plan further provides for a joint committee to be composed of the president of the general committee of representatives, the chairman of the wage committee, the chairman of the welfare committee, and three members appointed by the management. There is also an appellate council make up of an equal number of employee and management representatives. Individual problems may be taken by the employee to his immediate superior, then to his representative, then to other superiors up to the general foreman. If the matter is not settled in these preliminary stages, it can be taken through the committees of the cooperative plan to the appellate council and finally to the president of the company and the board of directors.

Group problems follow a similar procedure, except that they may be presented in writing directly to the elected representative of the department or division, who arranges a meeting, if so requested, between 1, 2, or 3 spokesmen of the employees concerned and the foreman, general foreman, or other proper official. If the problem is not settled at this stage, it can be taken up through the cooperative plan committee until it finally reaches the company's board of directors.

Provision is also made for compensation of the 150 employee representatives who serve pursuant to the terms of the plan. Each representative receives $15 a month, in addition to 75 cents an hour for time spent for regular committee meetings necessitating absence from work. The president of the general committee receives $30 a month, and the chairman of the welfare and wage committees each receive $25 a month. These salaries, paid by the company, are in addition to the regular earnings of the employees. Although not provided for in the plan itself, the record shows that the company has paid the expenses incurred in inaugurating the plan, and also pays all of its current operating expenses.

Amendment of the plan is not possible without the consent of the company, because it is provided that proposed amendments must run the gauntlet of the two joint committees composed in equal numbers of representatives of management and employees, before they receive the final sanction of the elected representatives of employees from the various departments or divisions. No referendum to the body of employees is provided in such cases. By an amendment so adopted on December 7, 1933, it is provided that the plan is to remain in force until May 1, 1939.

It is clear that the company has actively participated in the drafting, adoption, and financing of the Goodrich cooperative plan, that the plan has never been put to a vote of the employees for acceptance or rejection; and that the employees have never had an opportunity of voting on whether they desire to be represented as provided in the plan or by Local No. 18319, of which a large number of Goodrich employees are members. The employees, as a body, have voted only on the selection of the drafting committee, as aforesaid, and in the elections conducted under the terms of the plan in October 1933 and October 1934. The employees would naturally want to participate in the selection of the representatives chosen under a plan which is in fact the collective-bargaining agency recognized by the company. Hence, the fact that 90 percent of the employees participated in the annual elections affords no sufficient basis for inferring that they liked the plan or would choose it as against other alternatives. Furthermore, even though no overt threats have been made by responsible officials, employees would quite understandably be reluctant to render themselves conspicuous by refusing to participate in the elections, in views of the fact that the company is known to be strongly supporting the plan.

Notwithstanding the foregoing, it is claimed for the plan that it has the support of a majority of the Goodrich employees. In contradiction of this, union officials have testified that Local No. 18319 has, as members, 7,654 employees of the B. F. Goodrich Co.; and on the basis of such asserted membership it is claimed that a majority of the employees would choose to be represented by the United Rubber Workers Council.

There is a substantial controversy which well might lead to strife, if not resolved. In arguing against an election the company alleged that the present situation at the plant was peaceful and that an election would inevitably produce restlessness and confusion among the employees. On this point we think it is unnecessary to do more than state the board's adherence to the common belief that the device of election in a democratic society has, among other virtues, that of allaying strife, not provoking it. That potentiality of strife now exists in this plant because there are contending factions of employees, we have already shown. Certainly Congress in authorizing, by Public Resolution 44, elections to be held in the public interest dir not contemplate that contention must have reached the proportions of a threatened strike before an election order was issued.

We think the present case is one in which a secret election conducted by us would fulfill the purposes of Congress, as disclosed in section 7 (a) and in Public Resolution 44, Seventy-third Congress.

It remains to consider the appropriate form of ballot and other matters connected with the election.

Is the Goodrich cooperative plan capable of functioning as an agency for collective bargaining so as to entitle it to a place on the ballot? Collective bargaining involves far more than the mere adjustment of individual grievances. In the Houde case we emphasized that the ordinary everyday details which any employer would be glad to discuss with any employee or group of employees in no sense constitute the recognized subjects of collective bargaining, namely, wages, hours, and the basic working conditions affecting the plant as a whole.

It may be objected that the Goodrich cooperative plan is better adapted to bringing the grievances of the individual employee, or small groups of employees, by successive stages of appeal, up to the highest officers of the company, than it is to formulating and prosecuting mass demands of employees on basic matters affecting the whole plant. Significant in this connection is the fact that the plan does not provide for general meetings of employees, as in a union local, nor even for regular meetings of the whole body of representatives. These factors, if included in the plan, would obviously afford a ready means for the formulation of the collective wishes of employees, which are an essential preliminary to the process of collective bargaining. Nevertheless, as collective bargaining can, although not without difficulty, take place within the plan's framework, we conclude that there is no sufficient reason for excluding the plan from a ballot which offers the employees their free choice as to how they wish to be represented for purposes of collective bargaining.

Another feature of the plan which raises a serious problem is the fact that it is financed by the company, and that, in particular, the company pays extra salaries to the employee representatives under the plan. At the time when the plan was initiated by the company there existed a group of employees within the plant, we do not know how numerous, who favored affiliation with an outside union as their designated agency for collective bargaining. We may assume that there were also at the plant employees who preferred a plant organization.

At this juncture we believe that the company interfered with the self-organization of its employees when it threw the great weight of its financial support in favor of the groups of employees who wanted a plant organization, to the competitive disadvantage of the group of employees who wanted representation by an outside union. In effect this was a form of discrimination which handicapped the efforts of one group of employees in promoting their ideas on self-organization. The tendency of the thing at the time of the inauguration of the plan was corrupting and the continuance of financial support by the company at the present time is corrupting. This is particularly true of the payment of salaries to representatives. However, single-minded the elected representatives under the plan might be in their devotion to the interests of the employees, the provision for paying extra salaries to the approximately 150 employees representatives causes their independence of employer domination to be highly dubious. It is improper for the company to influence the choice of employees in the manner described above, which involves in substance the subsidizing of an active group of propagandists among the employees for the type of employee representation the company would prefer to deal with. In this case, however, the petition before us is simply a request for an election. There has been no complaint charging a violation of section 7 (a) of the National Industrial Recovery Act nor has the argument before us focused on this point. Hence, in this proceeding we refrain from passing specific judgment as to the illegality of the various forms of financial support of the plan by the company. Moreover, since the petitioners have not requested that we require an amendment of the plan as a condition of its being placed upon the ballot and since there has been no argument before us on this subject we shall allow the plan to go on the ballot as it stands.

It is contended in behalf of the company that for election purposes the 2,000 workers in the clerical force as well as the production and maintenance employees should be eligible. There is no provision for representation of the clerical employees under the cooperative plan, and it is available solely to production and maintenance groups. After the adoption of the plan, the clerical force drafted a plan of its own under which it is now represented. The local union represents only production and maintenance employees. Since the clerical force is not represented by and has no connection with either the cooperative plan or the local union, and since, regardless of the outcome of the election, neither the plan nor the union would represent them, there is no reason for allowing them to participate in an election which is in fact an election to determine whether the plan or the union shall act as the bargaining agency for production and maintenance employees.

The company also contends that only the employees on the pay roll as of the date of the election should be eligible to vote. The union states that since August 1, 1934, about 1,000 employees have been laid off, and for that reason August 1, 1934, should be used as a date to determine eligibility. It was testified in behalf of the company that the lay-off is purely seasonal and that the employees who have been laid off will be called back to work if, as and when orders come in. In normal years the seasonal peak of the company business occurs in November, depending somewhat on the action of the automobile manufacturers. It is indicated, therefore, that the 1,000 men have been temporarily laid off and will be recalled when needed, so a decision excluding all of them from voting would be unjustified.

On the other hand, the union did not petition this board for an election until September 7, 1934, and we see no reason in this case for setting a date to determine eligibility for voting purposes prior to the date on which the petition was filed. It is likewise true that the union should not be penalized because of the fact that the time necessarily elapsed in conducting proceedings in furtherance of the application for an election. The pay roll as of September 7, 1934, will undoubtedly include some of the 1,000 men who have been temporarily laid off. We therefore hold that all of the production and maintenance employees on the company pay roll on September 7, 1934, and, in addition, all production and maintenance employees who have been added to the pay roll in the period from September 7 to 2 days before the date of the election, and are still on the pay roll of the company 2 days before the date of the election shall be eligible to vote in the election.

FINDINGS OF FACT

1. The B. F. Goodrich Co. signed the President's reemployment agreement, effective August 1, 1933, and has been subject to the Rubber Manufacturing Industry Code and the Rubber Tire Manufacturing Industry Code since December 1933. The company manufactures rubber products and through sales agencies sells and ships its finished products all over the world. It employs approximately 12,000 production and maintenance employees, 2,000 clerical employees, and 859 to 900 supervisory employees.

2. The B. F. Goodrich Co. is a corporation, having its general offices and manufacturing plant at Arkon, Ohio, and sales and services agencies in Ohio and other States. The company engages in interstate commerce, obtaining raw materials from States other than Ohio, and shipping and selling its finished products all over the world, through sales agencies.

3. The United Rubber Workers Federal Labor Union, Local 18319, for employees of the B. F. Goodrich Co., obtained its charter from the American Federation of Labor on August 6, 1933, and, according to testimony before us, has now more than 7,654 members. Local 18319, and its affiliated craft locals, are members of the United Rubber Workers Council affiliated with the American Federation of Labor.

4. In October 1933 the Goodrich cooperative plan was put into effect within the plant. The plan was drafted by representatives elected by the employees, with the assistance and cooperation of the management. It was approved by the elected representatives of the employees and by the management, and put into effect, without any further ratification by the general body of employees. Its expenses are financed by the company, which also pays salaries to employee representatives elected thereunder.

5. There are conflicting claims on behalf of the Goodrich cooperative plan and the United Rubber Workers Council as to who represents a majority of the workers of the B. F. Goodrich Co. for the purpose of collective bargaining. The employees have not yet had an opportunity to vote on acceptance or rejection of the Goodrich cooperative plan, nor have they had an opportunity to vote between the alternatives of the plan and the United Rubber Workers Council.

6. Continuance of the present uncertain situation is conducive to discord among the employees.

7. Approximately 1,000 workers have been laid off since August 1, 1934, because of a seasonal curtailment in the company's business. One thousand workers who have been laid off will be taken back to work as soon as the seasonal curtailment of business is over. Local No. 18319 made application to the Cleveland regional board for an election on September 7, 1934.

CONCLUSION

It is the conclusion of this board that it is in the public interest that an election by secret ballot of the employees of the production and maintenance department of the B. F. Goodrich Co. should be had to determine whether they desire to be represented by the Goodrich cooperative plan or by the United Rubber Workers Council for the purpose of collective bargaining as defined in section 7 (a) of the National Industrial Recovery Act and incorporated in Public Resolution No. 44 of the Seventy-third Congress.

ORDER FOR ELECTION

This proceeding having been duly heard by the National Labor Relations Board on October 18, 1934, upon the petition of United Rubber Workers Federal Labor Union, Local No. 18319 and upon testimony and evidence received at Cleveland, Ohio, on September 26 and 27, 1934, and thereafter at Washington, D. C., the board having herewith made its decision, its findings of fact, and its conclusion that it appears to be in the public interest to so order: Now, therefore, it is Ordered, That within a period of 3 weeks from the date of this decision and between such hours and at such place as the director of the regional labor board for the eighth district may determine, having in view the making of the necessary mechanical arrangements, there shall be held under the supervision of a representative of the National Labor Relations Board an election by secret ballot of the production and maintenance employees of the B. F. Goodrich Co. who were on the company pay roll on September 7, 1934, and, in addition, all production and maintenance employees who have been added to the pay roll in the period from September 7 to 2 days before the date of the election and are still on the pay roll of the company 2 days before the date of the election, to determine whether they desire to be represented by the Goodrich cooperative plan or by the United Rubber Workers Council for the purpose of collective bargaining as defined in section 7 (a) of the National Industrial Recovery Act and incorporated in Public Resolution No. 44 of the Seventy-third Congress.

Ordered further, For the purpose of determining the eligibility of employees to vote, that 2 days before the date of election the B. F. Goodrich Co. shall submit to the director of the regional labor board for the eighth district, as representatives of the National Labor Relations Board, its pay roll lists showing the names of all its production and maintenance employees who were on its

STATEMENT OF W. L. CASH, AKRON, OHIO

The CHAIRMAN. You are employed by the Goodyear Co. in Akron, Ohio?

Mr. CASH. Yes, sir; for 23 years.

The CHAIRMAN. And you are one of the duly elected representatives of the Goodyear Industrial Assembly?

Mr. CASH. Yes, sir; at this time I happen to be the president of the "Senate", as we call it.

The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed and state your views.

Mr. CASH. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to take up too much time. I know the time is short, but in answer to some of the statements made here—of course I think we have got both sides pretty well represented. We have got the outside and the inside, and I believe you fellows are interested to know the situation. To show the percentage of our employees, whether they are satisfied or not, we have with less than 5 years of service, only 4,230 people in the factory. With 5 to 10 years' service, we have 4,455 people. With 10 to 15 years' service, we have 2,870. With 20 to 25 years of service, we have 662, which I happen to come in that group. With over 30 years of service, we have 14.

I think that is evidence for you to know that our employees must have been satisfied. That is one reason why we are opposing the Wagner bill. We have built up this spirit of cooperation over years.

We have, I believe, one of the highest paid, and I believe the Government statistics will show, in our factory today, we have our rates, taking a total of 2,500, and our janitor service, elevators, and all of that, which low-rated jobs as you know, our average rate, the average earnings in the factory today is 92.4 cents, which I believe is one of the highest——

The CHAIRMAN (interrupting). Per hour?

Mr. CASH. Yes; that includes 2,500 women.

The CHAIRMAN. Two thousand five hundred out of 15,000 workers?

Mr. CASH. Yes; and we believe in fact we know that due to the efforts of this organization in the past 16 years is what has brought this condition and our workers today, we have a few which I believe Mr. Trembley said that are with the outside organization, but we were perfectly willing, in fact we asked the National Labor Board and the Regional Labor Board I believe Mr. Trembley was one of the members before the National Board asking that an election be taken to see which side would represent those workers. At that time the outside organization which Mr. House represented had also requested and our management agreed.

The CHAIRMAN. Why don't you do that then?

Mr. CASH. Because Mr. House withdrew his request.

The CHAIRMAN. That is, the representative of the outside union?

Mr. CASH. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Why can you not have it now?

Mr. CASH. I do not think there would be any objection. I do not think they will do it.

The CHAIRMAN. Would you object to a vote being held now other than on the company's premises, Mr. House?

Mr. HOUSE. If they would agree to negotiate with the successful party. We put that up to Mr. Litchfield last week, that if he would agree to negotiate an agreement with the successful party, that we would agree to an election outside of the plant. Mr. Slusser made the statement that he would not let a dog of his go to the armory.

Mr. CASH. Mr. Chairman, I might say that our armory is at least a mile and a half or two miles from the factory. I happen to be one of the members that contacted our regional board which Mr. Lynn, I believe, is the chairman of in that district. I happen to be one of the members of our organization that contacted with him, and we thought everything was worked out satisfactorily until the request was withdrawn. In fact, I do not believe that they ever got to the point whereby it was any argument over where the election should be taken, whether inside or outside.

The CHAIRMAN. If you are quite confident that the majority of the employees would vote for the kind of organization that you represent——

Mr. CASH (interrupting). Absolutely.

The CHAIRMAN. You feel quite confident of that?

Mr. CASH. I feel that way.

The CHAIRMAN. Wherever the election is held?

Mr. CASH. I believe they would. The question is getting them to vote when it is that far from the factory. They are not that interested, lots of them. The fellows are not interested to vote.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any hall nearer than the armory?

Mr. CASH. We could work out details closer than that.

The CHAIRMAN. Could you get a hall that was not owned by the company?

Mr. CASH. I would not say that they could get a hall. We have three plants there.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you not have the elections on different days for different plants?

Mr. CASH. Our organization?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. CASH. No; it was all held on the same day.

The CHAIRMAN. With three different plants, in casting the ballots of 15,000 men and women would be quite a task, would it not?

Mr. CASH. Yes. The way we had it set up, we have a plant there and we put in so many booths. There was one statement made by Mr. House there which I feel confident is not true, and that is when he said that a foreman got up. I believe that every foreman was instructed by the factory management and Mr. Litchfield and Mr. Slusser, due to the conditions to not take any part and not talk to any worker in the shop whereby they can say that there was some coercion used, and I believe that was carried out. I believe those were the instructions from our president.

Our election has been solely held by the workers in the plant. I have been on the assembly myself for the past 11 years, and as Mr. House stated that their members were instructed not to vote. I know they were instructed not to vote for me, and I happen to have carried by a very large majority when they had a man in the field running against me. I do not want to bring personalities in, but I think the true story ought to be known before this committee. I think we welcome any branch of the Government to check our records.

The CHAIRMAN. It would be unfortunate if the minority even votes for a strike. Would it not be likely to tie up the whole plant.

Mr. CASH. There have been threats put out around there and propaganda that they will bring the unemployed from Canton, which is 20 miles from Akron, and other parts in order to tie up the plant and prevent the majority of workers from working, and so as I stated here, I do not believe there is a plant in the country that is paying like that, and I do not believe the Government statistics will show any higher wages or any better conditions than we have in the Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co. in Akron. For that reason we oppose this bill, because we feel that if this bill is passed, it will be detrimental to such organizations which have been built up and would interpret section 7 (a)——

The CHAIRMAN (interrupting). This bill, if it is passed will undoubtedly affect the present method of financing your organization.

Mr. CASH. We feel that it should not be, because we have worked out satisfactorily, which we can prove, and we welcome any branch of the Government to check those facts. I have the figures right with me.

If there is any question I can answer, I would be glad to do it.

The CHAIRMAN. You may put in the record anything you desire now or later.

Mr. CASH. There was one statement raised about the way we act. We have a copy of our plan here. I would like to read that in.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. Do you believe there is likely to be a substantial vote on Sunday for a strike?

Mr. CASH. That is the unfair part. I can give you exact figures of our workers in our plant. We have 14,686 workers in the plant at the present time, and the armory is the largest building we have in the city of Akron, in which all of their meetings are conducted behind closed doors. That would only seat approximately, I believe, 5,000.

The CHAIRMAN. Could you not open up a voting place and let the men come in one at a time and cast a secret ballot simply on the question of "Which do you prefer as the organization of the employees of this plant for the purpose of collective bargaining, the Goodyear Industrial Assembly, or the local—whatever its number or name may be—of the American Federation of Labor; yes or no." Just hand that out and let each man go in with a pencil and mark "yes" or "no."

Mr. CASH. We tried to work, Mr. Chairman—we have tried as I said with Mr. Lynn from our district to work out such a method if we could, but they withdrew.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the money available for holding such an election?

Mr. MAGRUDER. I assume the National Labor Board or the Conciliation Division has money available ordinarily within the jurisdiction for that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. Would you agree to whatever decision the fifteen thousand-and-odd employees made on that question?

Mr. CASH. Absolutely. I think we should.

The CHAIRMAN. Would you agree to that, Mr. House?

Mr. HOUSE. Providing there was a free choice.

The CHAIRMAN. It would be a free choice if it was held some place other than the company, and the money for the election and the ballots were prepared by the Government?

Mr. HOUSE. Speaking personally, I would say yes.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the company's attitude?

Mr. MAGRUDER. I do not know what the company's attitude has been in this case.

Mr. HOUSE. We would agree to an election if the company would agree to negotiate with the ones who won the election.

The CHAIRMAN. I think that is fair. This witness says you and your associates would agree to that so far as the employees are concerned.

Mr. CASH. I said we have in the past.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course we have to get the company's approval, and we would have to get them to consent to waive what they claim to be some legal rights which relates to the constitutionality of this whole procedure. However, if it were agreed to by you and aside from the operating under this law or under Resolution 44, it would be a mutual agreement apart and aside from any order issued by any governmental agency.

Mr. MAGRUDER. I think the director of the regional board is prepared to negotiate a consent election if everybody is agreed on the terms under which it is held.

The CHAIRMAN. If the employers—and I assume they will hear from those that are here or through the press—are any Akron papers represented here?

A VOICE. Both of them.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Litchfield is not here?

A VOICE. He was here yesterday.

Mr. CASH. I have said that we have asked for such. I do not care to go on record until the details are worked out as to where the election should be held.

The CHAIRMAN. If Mr. Litchfield desires to enter into an agreement in view of what has been said here, I will use my good offices to have the Department of Labor, not the Labor Board, because there might be some legal questions arise, although they could do it without issuing an order, and by agreement—they do have power of conciliation—and we could have it determined once and for all. But I only make that suggestion. I have no authority to go further.

Of course I do not know how serious the threat of the strike is. I take it that you do not take it so seriously?

Mr. CASH. Personally I know that in our plant that our workers are asking us every day, "What is going to happen, can we get to work in case they do?" Their main object is whether they will be able to get work and not that they want to strike in the plant. Those conditions are absolutely unfair to our organization.

The CHAIRMAN. I should think that if this local that you represent, Mr. House, would agree to abide by the vote for 1 year and not have any strike and abide by the decision, and the company would agree to carry on negotiations with the group, whichever group won out, that that would end all controversy for a year; but that would not prevent you, during the year, from continuing to agitate for additional members in your organization. Of course, in the meantime if this act becomes a law, different questions would arise as to the legal status of this organization. Do you follow me, Mr. House?

Mr. HOUSE. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. It would be expected, of course, in good faith and as a matter of honor, that you would do nothing to further a strike within a year until another election is held.

Mr. HOUSE. Of course, I cannot speak for the organization.

The CHAIRMAN. It would not be fair to ask the employer to give up whatever legal rights he may have if the election turned out against your group, and you started to call a strike.

Mr. HOUSE. It would be foolish to strike if we did not have the majority. I would like to ask there, did the industrial assembly take a strike vote inside of the factory?

The CHAIRMAN. Is that true?

Mr. CASH. I might say there that our employees have requested in case that this minority—as I have said before, it is about four or five hundred, or three or four hundred which meets at those meetings—if they take a vote and try to pull them out, that they requested us to hold a vote within the plant to give them a chance to see what they want.

The CHAIRMAN. The decision of your group is that you would like to have a vote in case the other group have a vote, for the purpose of showing the contrast between the numbers that vote for a strike in their group and the number that vote against a strike in your group.

Mr. CASH. Personally, we are willing for anybody, if it is the Government or the local or the national, to intercede if such is necessary.

Here are some of the cards that they are putting out at our gates. I do not know whether you want me to read it.

The CHAIRMAN. It may be put in the record.

(The same is as follows:)

IMPORTANT! READ CAREFULLY!

United Rubber Workers Federal Labor Union No. 18282, composed entirely of employees of the Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., has been organized for the past 18 months. We have tried to carry out the purpose of this organization by peaceful persuasion without result. We were told that the company would deal only with the assembly. The company and everyone else knows that the assembly has no power to bargain collectively. They can only beg. We have exhausted every means whereby we might establish collective bargaining, peacefully. We want to remain peaceful, but we also want collective bargaining. We want to know by April 1 just how many employees really want to have a voice in the determination of their wages, hours, and working conditions. If you want that, let's go get it! This will be your last chance to reinstate for one dollar. The initiation fee will be raised April 1st. President Roosevelt can't win alone! Let's help him.

The CHAIRMAN. Is this your organization, the United Rubber Workers Federal Labor Union, Mr. House?

Mr. HOUSE. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. You are affiliated with the American Federation of Labor?

Mr. HOUSE. Yes.

Mr. CASH. Mr. House handed me that card himself at the gate.

There were also statements made in which the previous vote we have taken a short time ago, in fact just a week or two ago, in regard to whether our employees wanted to work 24 or 30 hours a week. I believe it was stated that 9,000 and some voted in such election. That election was asked for and checked, each representative in the respective precincts. Some of the workers seemed to want 24 and some wanted 30. We were one of the first I believe, that went on record as a 6-hour day, our assembly. And we maintain it should still be.

We have taken this check to find just what the sentiment of the employees wanted to do. It would either mean to lay off approximately 1,500, with our present production, that has gone down, and work 5 days, or work 4. So we put it to the employees in that manner, and the results were it was 9,491 voted, but this did not include two other departments, the maintenance, which is the machine shop, and the engineering, and the mechanical goods department, because they were working more time than 30 hours at that time, or around 30 hours. But each assembly was checked to take that vote, and they have taken it, and we are abiding by the decision of the workers.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there any other suggestions you want to make? Are there any further statements?

Mr. CASH. Are there any questions?

The CHAIRMAN. No; I think your case has been very fully presented.

Mr. HOUSE. May I add one statement for the record?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; you may.

Mr. HOUSE. At one time 53 out of the 60 of the senate and representatives of the industrial assembly were members of the outside union. All of those present here today were at one time members of the outside union.

Mr. CASH. I might state also that Mr. House was a member of the assembly until he resigned to become president of the local.

Mr. HOUSE. I was, and I withdrew.

STATEMENT OF WILLIAM DUNNE

Mr. DUNNE. May I file a statement, Mr. Chairman? It is in the name of the Communist Party which I represent here. My name is William Dunne.

The CHAIRMAN. What is your residence Mr. Dunne?

Mr. DUNNE. New York City.

The CHAIRMAN. What office do you hold in your union?

Mr. DUNNE. I am connected with the Daily Worker in a journalistic capacity.

The CHAIRMAN. You are presenting a brief?

Mr. DUNNE. It is in opposition to the Wagner bill, for the record. We are also submitting our own proposals for the record in the same document.

The CHAIRMAN. I appreciate, Mr. Dunne, your sparing our time.

(The brief referred to follows:)

BRIEF SUBMITTED BY WILLIAM DUNNE

As spokesman for the Communist Party of the United States, I am appearing before the Senate Committee on Education and Labor to state the opposition of the party and its central committee to the so-called "Wagner bill", and its main reasons for this opposition.

The Communist Party, early in 1934, when the provisions of the first draft of the Wagner bill were made public, stated its opposition and gave the reasons for it in its press, and in public hearings and meetings. It declared the Wagner bill was an attempt to set up a new set of illusions regarding the beneficient role of the Roosevelt government of monopoly capital among millions of American workers whose faith in the good intentions of the administration and its N. R. A. was beginning to wane rather rapidly.

The Communists at that time declared that the proposed bill was intended to strengthen measures for establishing and maintaining compulsory arbitration under Government auspices in labor disputes. We said that the official labor leaders of the A. F. L. and other labor organizations who supported both N. R. A. and the Wagner bill were acting against the interests of the membership they are supposed to represent and against the interests of the whole American working class.

We have not changed our opinion as a result of the rewording of the draft bill or because of the changes in some of its provisions. As a matter of fact, because of some new false hopes, generated by these changes, by the desperate desire of millions of wage workers for some improvement in their terrible conditions and by the unscrupulous efforts of most of the official family of the A. F. L., Socialist Party leaders—and by the demagogic activities of the horde of time-serving economists and pretentious social-welfare workers which the N. R. A. machinery jerked from deserved obscurity—the present form of the Wagner bill is more dangerous to the economic and social interests of working people than it was before.

A dispute over wages and working conditions in any important section of industry is in essence a test of power between capital and labor, with the Government and its various agencies always on the side of the employers as a class. This is necessarily so because so-called "impartial government" is a polite but dangerous fiction.

Government that does not represent the interests of the dominant class in any given epoch of society is a paradox. Government is the organized power of the dominant class. In the United States this is the capitalist class. In the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics government represents also the interests of the dominant class—the working class.

All this is, of course, elementary. Conscious representatives of the capitalist class know this just as well as do Communists and other class conscious workers. But capitalists and their representatives are very anxious to conceal this fact from the great mass of the toiling population. If they cannot succeed in doing this—and the present ecoonmic crisis, now of 5½ years' duration with its unspeakable misery for all sections of the toiling population, makes it increasingly difficult—political crises inevitably develop.

More and more the ruling class and its spokesmen and general staff are forced to resort to complicated maneuvers. As the purposes of these maneuvers are discovered by the workers, a whole series must be invented, one following the other. As these fail to achieve the desired results, that is, to confuse the whole working class, especially that section in decisive industries, divide its ranks, create suspicion, and dissension, and make its struggles hesitant, weak, and ineffective, and prevent the outbreak of conflicts between employer and worker, more forcible measures are indicated.

We saw this strategy at work in the railway and auto and steel situations—with President Roosevelt and Mr. Green duplicating the role of Wilson and Gompers in the steel campaign of 1919, when the full pressure of the Government and the official American Federation of Labor leadership was brought against the struggles of terribly exploited and oppressed steel workers.

Promises to workers whose burdens have become intolerable, promisory notes that always have and always will be repudiated much faster than were the European war debts, are much in vogue now.

But these kinds of promissory notes have a feature all their own; foreclosure proceedings take place against those to whom they are given—not against those who sign them.

In between the lines of these documents there always lurks the threat of further suppression or jeopardy of workers' rights, either by force in one form or another, or by cajolery and deception, or by a mixture of both.

The Wagner bill is this kind of a domument. This we will show later. First it is necessary to be specific in regard to the present economic and political situation in the country—a situation whose main features must give the greatest concern for all working people and also the general staff of American capital and its Government. It is out of these specific instances that the Wagner bill arises.

Since the Wagner bill is intended to strengthen or replace clause 7 (a); since clause 7 (a) brought about the greatest development of company unionism ever seen in this country; since clause 7 (a) was intended to substitute futile negotiations under control of Government agencies for effective organization and struggle by workers; and since the economic and social status of the American working class as a whole has been reduced, by price rises and actual wage cuts and permanent mass unemployment, all under the actual operation of the National Recovery Act and its clause 7 (a), as the C. P. told workers would be the case; and since in spite of clause 7 (a) many hundreds of thousands of wage earners have organized, struck, and attempted to get a larger share of the employers' profits, it follows logically that the Wagner bill, if it is not a mere literary exercise, must be designed as part of the program of capitalist recovery—to protect profits; to make it more difficult for wageworkers to exercise effectively their bargaining power, and, most of all, to prevent the effective use of their main weapon, the strike.

The following outstanding developments, the facts of which are more or less a matter of public knowledge, many of them contained in official Government reports, are some of the main features of the present economic and political situation which give rise to such measures as the Wagner bill:

There is the increasing contradiction between the constantly lowered income of the working population and growing concentration of capital with huge increases in profits; prices are rising. Together these form the economic base for the present wide-spread wage demands, union-organization movements, and the unprecedented wave of strikes, movements of the unemployed, etc.

I furnish this committee with the following unassailable facts, most of them gathered from reports of Government and business agencies, showing the continuous degradation of the living standards of all working people under the National Recovery Act, its codes, and its administration. It can be said with absolute truth that in the 6 years of the crisis, unrelieved so far as working people are concerned, with the process of pauperization, aided by the National Recovery Act, the United States has become a gigantic poorhouse—and that in many large sections it is at the slum level.

SPEED-UP

Code authority study of 672 cotton-garment plants show following speed-up:

Number of plants	Hours worked	Increase in productivity
		Percent
508	40 or less	25
68	40–45	43
71	45–50	90
25	50 and over	102

NATIONAL RECOVERY ADMINISTRATION AND NEGRO

Federal Emergency Relief Administration figures for relief, Davis of the joint committee on national recovery declared at National Recovery Administration hearings, showed what National Recovery Administration has meant for the Negro workers:

"In October of 1933 roughly 2,117,000 Negroes were in families receiving relief. This was 17.8 percent of the total Negro population as of 1929. Today the same source shows 3,500,000 Negroes in families receiving relief, or 29 percent of our 1930 population."

Further:

"We estimate that today 3,000,000 Negro workers are jobless. Not the least contributor to this mass unemployment has been National Recovery Administration."

Permission to pay less than the minimum code wage rate to Negro workers granted early in June 1934 to the Central Spinning & Weaving Co. of North Carolina, by the Silk Textile Code Authority. Minimum rates for Negro workers are now $10 a week instead of $12. This will be used as precedent for other companies.

Miserable conditions imposed on Negro workers in textile plants of the South as a result of the Textile Code, are disclosed in a survey made by John P. Davis, of the joint committee on national recovery, showing:

"The majority of skilled Negro machine operators and Negro foremen, while working only the maximum, 40 hours a week, had their wages cut to the minimum of $12 or less." (Some were found working 54 to 76 hours at 10 cents per hour.)

"Reclassification and subterfuges are frequent. Skilled machinists had their time divided between machine work and cleaning. Painters were classified as 'outside workers' and exempt from maximum hours. There is much firing and rehiring."

"The excepted group—cleaners and outside workers—had their wages decreased with little or no cut in hours."

Men work 54 to 60 hours for $9 to $11 per week.

Women work 54 to 60 hours for $5 to $8 per week.

Negroes at the same time are forced to buy from company stores with prices 20 to 30 percent higher than independent or chain stores. In many localities the Negroes' only pay was in the form of a credit slip.

NATIONAL RECOVERY ADMINISTRATION AND WOMEN

Out of 465 approved National Recovery Administration codes, 120 carry lower minimum wages for women than for men, according to a survey by the Women's Bureau of the United States Department of Labor.

NATIONAL RECOVERY ADMINISTRATION AND UNEMPLOYMENT

American Federation of Labor, in monthly report on unemployment (Dec. 28, 1934) admits that unemployment during November 1934 increased for the sixth successive "new deal" month to 11,459,000, as compared with 11,030,000 jobless in November 1933, an increase of 429,000.

The Pen and Hammer study shows by their estimate on unemployment that in November 1934 there were 450,000 more workers jobless than in October 1933, or a total of 14,525,000 unemployed workers in the United States.

Hand in hand with this, employed workers' wages are further cut. Report of United States Bureau of Labor Statistics shows that between October and November employment in nondurable goods industry group declined 2.6 percent, and pay rolls decreased 3.8 percent. In the durable goods groups, employment decreased 1 percent from October to November, and pay rolls decreased 0.6 percent.

The United Mine Workers Journal (Feb. 15, 1935) says:

"The record of National Recovery Administration, now almost 2 years old, should make the cold chills of apprehension run down the spinal vertebrae of every captain of industry in America." In other words, labor is losing faith in National Recovery Administration, this United Mine Workers Association organ discovers. Mine workers are not going to submit much longer to National Recovery Administration conditions of low wages and continued mass unemployment.

Recent report, National Recovery Administration Research and Planning Division. In December 1934:

1. Pay rolls were 60 percent of the aggregate pay rolls for 1926.

2. Dividends and interest payments of corporations were 150 percent of 1926 total.

Nearly 300 companies whose profits are compiled by the Federal Reserve Bank of New York showed for the first 9 months of 3 years the following gain: 1932, $100,000,000; 1933, $202,800,000; 1934, $430,500,000.

These industries where exploitation speed-up are most outstanding since National Recovery Administration show:

	Deficit, 1932	Profit, 1933	Profit, 1934
Automobile	$18,700,000	$82,500,000	$86,600,000
Automobile parts	8,800,000	6,900,000	21,000,000

Recent table of Bureau of Labor Statistics, showing decline of weekly average wages since National Recovery Administration began in June 1933.

	June 1933	June 1934	Nov. 1934
Automobiles	$23.05	$22.54	$22.80
Boots and shoes	15.68	17.20	14.51
Tobacco (and snuff)	13.43	13.70	12.84
Iron and steel	18.33	23.86	17.43
Rubber tires (and tubes)	24.28	23.48	22.67
Woolen textiles	16.85	16.07	16.25

In all material it is proven by cases here and there that "minimum wage becomes maximum wage."

COST OF LIVING

Retail food prices rose 34 percent from March 1933 to February 26, 1935. In some cities the rise is as high as 49 percent. Various articles rose as high as and up to 138 percent.

A. F. of L. monthly survey reports 13½ percent rise in cost of living from January 1933 to January 1935; 8 percent rise in wages during the same period; 5½ percent drop in real wages.

The following is an analysis of the so-called "Roosevelt social security program" as it is designed to affect the present hunger standard of the increasing millions of unemployed. This analysis shows that the plan intends to make their wants still more acute, their insecurity and misery still greater, to drive to still lower social levels the millions of workers whose labor power brought into the billions of wealth now in the hands of a small clique of multimillionaires—the monopolists—to which all factions of the Roosevelt administration cater to or openly represent.

ANALYSIS OF THE ROOSEVELT SOCIAL SECURITY PROGRAM

FACTS

1. One million five hundred thousand unemployables taken off Federal relief and thrown to mercy of States.

2. Calls for taking 3,500,000 employables off relief roles and putting them to work, calling for a maximum wage of $50 a month or $12 a week.

3. Four million eight hundred and eighty thousand dollars to be appropriated.

4. Payments are to be less than prevailing rate in locality.

5. Federal Emergency Relief Administration by order of Roosevelt to stop present grants to State by February 1. Full program supposed to go into effect by June 30. But Peoples, Roosevelt relief expert, says plan cannot possibly go into effect until 30 days after passage, and in full not for a year at least, so that ending of F. E. R. A. grants to States leaves the 3,500,000 as yet unprovided for.

6. Provides for jobs for only 1 out of every 5 unemployed persons, even if plan is carried out in its entirety.
7. Carries a provision for a $2,000 fine.

EFFECTS OF THIS PROGRAM—DIRECT CUT IN RELIEF

Fifty dollars a month wage, or $12 a week, if paid out, which is unlikely, means a direct cut in the living standard of workers, a slave wage under forced labor; according to Connery, head of Labor Committee, a "A starvation wage rate."
according to Connery, head of Labor Committee, "A starvation wage rate."
But even this $50 will not be paid for. There are approximately 3,650,000 unemployed, according to Federal rolls, to be provided for with a total appropriation over 2½ years, when plan ends, of $2,226,250,000 for wages; rest of sum goes into material, according to figures of Government. This gives us $24.39 a month per worker for 2½ years. When we consider that there are 4 to 4½ in each family, the pitiful nature of this appropriation is seen. Even the 391,000 C. C. C. boys and men in October 1934 received $16,939,595 in wages, or an average of $43.32 a month.

LOWERING OF WAGE RATE GENERALLY

The scales called for are even lower than the C. W. A. rates. William Green has given his tacit consent to the establishment of rates below the prevailing rate in the locality. Employers will use the scales on the relief jobs to cut wages they pay their own workers.

PLANNED BY ADMINISTRATION

Representative Buchanan, Chairman of the Appropriations Committee, who drafted the relief bill giving Roosevelt unlimited power in the control of relief, revealed the relief-slashing designs of the administration under the proposed relief set-up. "Security of home and country is threatened when 20,000,000 people are on the dole, one-third by the grace of State political machines. We're determined to end the waste. This appropriation will do the job" (New York American, Jan. 23, 1935). Thus a direct threat against all those on relief rolls. He also spoke about the thousands of grafters "packing the rolls."
It is pertinent to ask here, Senator Wagner, if as you claim, you have the welfare of the working people at heart, and that your bill is designed to aid them, why you took a leading part in defeating the so-called "prevailing-wage measure" and voted for an unemployed relief wage that, if not fought against and substantially increased, must inevitably place vast numbers of workers still more at the mercy of the monopoly employers than at present; that will drive down still further the wages of employed workers; that will, because of dire necessity, make potential strikebreakers of unemployed workers who find that even the starvation wages of private industry are slightly higher than the proposed coolie level for relief workers.
There would seem to be only one correct answer to this query. It is that you are not interested in the welfare of working people except when destitution appears to be making them desperate. Then you come forward with more promises and the special advocacy of certain "rights" of which monopoly capital and its government promptly prepare to prevent the exercise. This, in a nutshell, is the labor policy of the Roosevelt administration and its hangers-on in the labor movement, in Democratic, Republican, and Socialist Parties. The answer is, to put it still more clearly, that your bill is not designed to help working people and their organizations in the struggles against the constant encroachments of monopoly capital but to hamper them. You have said, if you have been quoted correctly, that what you want to do is to preserve the status quo, but the employers never stop their attacks on wages, working, and social conditions. For this reason, for working people, the status quo means not only the continuance of the present employers on their living standards and organizations but more vicious attacks and worsened living conditions.
Furthermore, since under N. R. A. company unionism, one of the major signs of the growing fascistization in the United States, has forced some 45 percent of workers into these employer organizations, the status quo means at best the legalization of the existing company unions. In the steel industry some estimates have shown that 85 percent of the workers had been forced into company unions.

It is all the more significant, therefore, in considering the merits of the Wagner bill, that, according to reliable press reports, Senator Walsh, chairman of this committee, told a representative of a company union during the recent hearing, that "this bill doesn't hurt your union"; that Senator Wagner assured the same person that "it (the bill) doesn't say anything about the company * * * if the board attempted to declare your organization illegal it would act illegally." Yet, on another occasion, and to a representative of bona fide labor organization, Senator Wagner stated categorically that his bill "outlaws the company financed or controlled union." (Mar. 27.)

It appears that Senator Wagner is following the policy of a certain candidate for Parliament in England, whose early education had been neglected, and who stated in his campaign speeches that if elected he would be "like Caesar's wife—all things to all men."

It is clear that the creation of additional confusion as to the purposes of the Roosevelt administration has begun even before the passage of the Wagner bill. Every important labor struggle since N. R. A. has been marked by the attempt of the Government and its various agencies to create division in the ranks of the workers involved, to confuse issues, to try to delay organized action by workers by all possible means (steel, auto, textile, marine, etc.), and if these attempts fail, to put no obstacles in the way of employers crushing these movements by force, as in the textile and West coast maritime strike.

This brings us to another infallible sign of the fascistzation process going on under N. R. A., that is, the growing use of sweeping injunctions against labor—with their subsequent train of mass arrests—to the increasing use of troops, police, and privately paid professional gunmen against strikers and the unemployed. The facts of these developments are so notorious that it is not necessary here to detail them. With these evidences of fascist development, the Wagner bill makes no pretense of dealing.

The enormous and unprecedented military, naval, and air appropriations—the heavy increase of all armed forces—are not only evidences of the drive of monopoly capital and its government toward war as the way out of the crisis, but also of preparations for more suppression of the organizations and struggles of American working people. There is more and more evidence that war and fascism on the American plan are being considered with the utmost seriousness in the highest circles of Wall Street and in the Roosevelt administration. The Wagner bill, even though some factions of the Roosevelt administration and certain groups of employers may not believe it necessary now, is an integral part of this set-up.

The Communist Party is not opposed to the Wagner bill because we are opposed to legislation in favor of workers and their organizations. We are opposed to the Wagner bill because it is opposed to the interests of working people and their organizations. We are opposed to the bill because it is a compulsory arbitration measure in essence. It sets up new police powers in industrial disputes to enforce compulsory arbitration directly under the control of Government agencies. Under such a bill collective bargaining is a cruel brand. The right to strike would be questioned and then destroyed.

Why do we not offer amendments to the bill? Because to do so would be to help to deceive workers into thinking that the bill contains something inherently good. It does not.

While the working people of this country sicken from the yellow fascist pestilence spread by the antilabor Hearst press; while the country is infested with many antilabor demagogues, garbed in many colors and costumes, ranging from the black cassock of Coughlin to the green pajamas of Huey Long; while banker leaders of the Legion, like Belgrano, encourage, organize, and justify murderous attacks on hungry strikers and call for exile and the death penalty for Communists; while Green, Woll, Lewis, Hillman, and other official leaders of the A. F. of L. make with Richberg and Roosevelt a Pax Romana—a peace of death for labor, such measures as the Wagner bill clearly will furnish a common meeting point, sooner or later, for all antilabor forces. We Communists said this same thing about N. R. A. when its preliminary ballyho almost drowned our voices. We were right. Today, we say the same thing about the Wagner bill. The Roosevelt administration today is the focus point for American fascist reaction.

The Communist Party of the United States has a program that meets the immediate needs of the American working class, and of the entire labor movement, and that it would like to see enacted into the law of the land. This program includes the following points and as a substitute for the Wagner bill we propose that the Congress enact legislation embodying the following points: (If the question of the constitutionality of such legislation is raised we reply that before and since the N. R. A. the Constitution and the Bill of Rights has been pretty well riddled—in favor of the employers and the ruling class generally, and if the will and the power to do so is present, the provisions of the Constitution which sanctify the rights of property as against rights of working people can also be abrogated.)

The Communist Party wants legislation that includes:

1. The immediate enactment of the workers' unemployment and social insurance bill—the so-called "Lundeen bill", H. R. 2827.
2. Declaring illegal company unions, and any and all forms of so-called "employee representation."
3. Declaring that the right of workers to organize freely in unions of their choice, without intimidation or coercion by employers and their agents shall be inviolate.

(a) Specifically legalizing the right to strike.

4. Specifically declaring illegal the use of the "blacklist" for the purpose of intimidating workers and prevent union organization or other forms of labor activity.
5. Declaring illegal any interference by employers, their associations or agents with workers' rights of free speech, free press, and free assemblage.
6. Declaring specifically that the provisions above shall apply without discrimination to all working people regardless of occupation, sex, race, nationality, religious and political opinion.
7. Specifically declaring illegal any discrimination by employers against Negro workers in the matter of employment, wages, and working conditions.

The Communist Party does not propose the above legislation as its solution of the crisis or as the way out of the morass of misery into which capitalism has plunged the working population. Neither does it believe that such legislation would be passed by any Congress without a majority from the ranks of militant labor. The Communist Party does believe, however, that the measures it proposes meet the immediate needs of the labor movement. The Communist Party of the United States further believes that such measures would strengthen the working class and its organizations greatly in their necessary and constant combats with the capitalist class and enable them to beat back the present gigantic offensive against its living standards, its organizations, its elementary democratic political rights, and against fascist reaction.

Such measures would strengthen the working class and enable it to organize and lead its allies—the exploited farmers, the doubly oppressed Negro people, the ruined and suffering lower middle class—in the decisive struggle for the revolutionary way out of the crisis.

For the working people of this country there is only one way out of this crisis that does not lead to the horrors of fascism and war—the overthrow of the dictatorship of bankrupt capitalism and its antilabor institutions and establishing in their place the only true popular democracy—a workers' and farmers' government—the dictatorship of the working class, headed by its Communist Party. This is the Communist answer to the crisis with its indescribable mass misery, to monopoly capital's program of hunger and war. This is our answer to the N. R. A., to the Wagner bill, and all other such legislation.

Statement Submitted by J. L. Walker, Representing Manufacturing Industries in Aurora and Fox River Valley, Ohio

The area which I represent is 90 percent industrial. It is located in the Fox River Valley, some 36 miles west of Chicago and includes the cities and towns of St. Charles, Geneva, Batavia, North Aurora, Aurora, and Montgomery. These communities are primarily manufacturing centers and have been ever since their origin.

A conservative estimate of the number of individuals employed in industry at the present time, both male and female, is somewhere in the neighborhood of 25,000. Most of the concerns have been in business for more than 20 years. While our community is a thoroughly representative American industrial area, the great diversity of the products we manufacture which range from heavy conveying machinery to women's corsets and brassieres, makes our problems manifold.

For a number of years the manufactures through the years this group of employers have constantly and conscientiously endeavored to maintain for all employees a fair rate of wages commensurate with living conditions in the area in which they operate.

The proof that they have succeeded in doing this very thing is set forth unmistakably in the large percentage of homes owned by workmen and by the very significant fact that although there are few large fortunes in our community we take pride in a generous number of moderately well-to-do citizens.

All through the past 5 years the records show that the valley has stood near the top in the average number of people employed, as compared with other communities of like size. During the 12-year period, between 1920 and 1932, labor disputes were few and far between, and of little or no consequence. This is common knowledge, and labor has been attracted to our community as a result.

Gentlemen, it is not my purpose to extol the Fox River Valley as an industrial Utopia. As I stated before, our community is a representative one and it follows that legislation affecting our welfare and prosperity will similarly affect the welfare and prosperity of manufacturing areas throughout the Nation. With this in mind, I think you will regard as significant the fact that our 12-year record of—I might say—universal employment and freedom from serious labor disputes was accomplished under conditions known as the open shop. True, some of our plants had trade unions, but none except the foundries had closed-shop conditions. It is not coincidence that these were the only ones who had any trouble.

Since 1932 and coincident with the inception of the N. R. A., many of our plants have been partially organized by professional labor organizers. These gentlemen, were seemingly loath to correct the erroneous idea prevalent among the workmen that they must join a union. What has been the result? Rumblings of dissatisfaction, threatened walk-outs, some strikes, and a pronounced general feeling of unrest, all of which was extremely unfortunate for some companies already in financial struggle.

Surely, such widespread discontent must inevitably mitigate against our universal objective of industrial recovery. Yet at this very time—as though adding fuel to the fires of chaos—a Senate bill has been introduced which, if enacted into law, will irreparably promote strife in American industry. I refer to Senate bill 1958 which will make it practically impossible for employees and employers to deal with each other on a collective bargaining basis which excludes professional labor leaders controlled from outside the ranks of the employees—even though these employees preferred to elect their own representatives and deal through them.

Both employers and employees who have informed themselves on this proposed legislation are united in opposing it. It is evident to both that its enactment would assure the domination of labor boards by organized labor agents. Further, it would permanently establish a majority rule principle in employment relations, thus depriving minorities of any real right to bargain, except through professional leaders. This is clearly discriminatory and un-American.

We have a large percentage of employees who at some time in the past have been affiliated with unions and who have had contacts with professional agents. They have no desire to renew either the affiliations or the contacts.

All of our plants have made every effort to live up to the requirements of the N. R. A., nevertheless we have been harassed with code authority investigations and complaints made to the regional labor board, all of which have been decided in our favor, and which never should have been brought to the attention of the board. At the present time some of these same cases are again being filed, although we have already received one decision.

In the past 3 months we have had inquiries in many lines of industry, business in the valley looks somewhat better. All of the plants are willing to take orders on a very small margin of profit in order to maintain their working forces and give more people employment. Everything that in any way interferes or retards such a condition is in our opinion unnecessary and uncalled for.

STATEMENT SUBMITTED BY ABRAHAM G. FELDMAN, PRESIDENT AND TREASURER OF THE STORKLINE FURNITURE CORPORATION OF CHICAGO

My name is Abraham G. Feldman, president and treasurer of the Storkline Furniture Corporation of Chicago. I am speaking for my firm who represents net assets of $1,369,000. We employ about 350 people and the first 3 months of this year our pay roll amounted to about $130,000. I am here also to represent and speak in behalf of the furniture manufacturers of Chicago.

I feel rather nervous in speaking before such a distinguished body of men and therefore hope you will bear with me for the time which was allotted to my talk.

There are about 243 manufacturers in Chicago with about 8,000 employees representing a wage of around $8,000,000 per year and a capital investment of around $25,000,000—the output is around $29,000,000 per year.

Chicago is considered to be the largest furniture-producing center in Illinois. The products that we manufacture in Chicago consist of bedroom furniture, dining-room furniture, cabinets, furniture novelties, and radio cabinets.

The greatest part of the output consists of upholstered and living-room furniture. My firm has been in business for 20 years and never had any labor trouble. This is becase our employees have been able to earn a decent living in our factory, and all of them are contented and happy. This statement that I have made is honest and truthful.

I will give you an example of what happened over a year ago, when a committee consisting of three men called to see me. One of the men introduced himself as a business agent representing the Cabinet and Carpenters' Union of America. These men told me that they wanted to organize our factory. My answer to this was that I would be very happy to allow them to go through our factory and talk to our employees.

Inasmuch as I knew the people who worked in our factory, I felt confident that they would not be successful in accomplishing what they set out to do.

I sent one of my assistants with these men to take them through the factory so that they could talk to the men working on the different machines. I will give you one example as to what occurred when the business agent approached the first man and told him what his mission was—that is, to join the union of the American Federation of Labor.

Our employee, who was working on a band saw at the time, replied that he had been a woodworker for 30 years, that he had been working for the Storkline Furniture Corporation for 16 years, and was pleased with the condition and wages, also the personnel.

The business agent had the same reply after questioning about 40 people—none of them were in favor of joining the union.

When the business agent came back to my office, he stated that inasmuch as I was in favor of organizing the factory, he was very much surprised that the employees refused to join the union. I have not seen these men ever since. By the way, the three gentlemen who called on me had at their disposal a Cadillac car in which they were traveling from place to place.

I will give you another example as to what happened in Chicago in the living-room furniture industry. They paid their employees a decent wage, but the manufacturers who make upholstered furniture were less fortunate than we were and the labor officials were successful in organizing their employees and what happened? Strikes after strikes—and this was against the will of the majority of the employees.

Several of the manufacturers are practically broke. Business in the furniture industry for the past 4 years has been very poor and all of us had our hands full trying to keep our heads above water. We had to sell merchandise very closely and had a lot of grief in collecting after the merchandise was shipped. Then, when trouble arose with the employees which was caused by outside instigators, it was the final blow that was struck to several manufacturers in our city as well as other cities in the upholstering line.

The code provide for a minimum wage of 34 cents per hour. The average rate that our men in the woodworking and finishing departments and also other departments earn is about 65 cents per hour. This also applies to the other furniture industries in Chicago.

If as a result of the passage of the bill our furniture factories are unionized and wages are raised higher than they are today with materials going up, we will not be able to sell our products and will be forced to close our factories which means throwing thousands of people out of work. This condition would certainly never bring prosperity back to this country.

I could stand before you and give you a dozen or more examples as to what happened in Chicago in other industries which were organized by the American Federation of Labor. The condition of these manufacturers is deplorable but my time will not permit me to go into this.

We had 3 months of good business from January up to date, and were happy that we were able to employ men and women. Our aim, to continue and create new ideas and styles in furniture for the public. In doing this we will be able to employ men and women in our organization. This also applies to the other manufacturers in Chicago.

If the Wagner bill, S. 1858, which is before you gentlemen should be adopted and the so-called "labor deputies" or "business agents" are allowed to interfere and run our businesses which have taken years to build, I predict the passing of this bill will mean chaos to the furniture industry.

(Whereupon, at 4:40 p. m., a recess was taken until Friday, Mar. 29, 1935, at 10 a. m.)

NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD

FRIDAY, MARCH 29, 1935

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION AND LABOR,
Washington, D. C.

The committee met at 10 a. m., in room 318, Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

Present: Senators Walsh (chairman), Murphy, Thomas, Murray, and Borah.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will please come to order.

There was one witness that was unheard yesterday. Will that witness please come forward?

(No response.)

The CHAIRMAN. Is anyone here representing the Storkline Furniture Corporation? Mr. Feldman?

STATEMENT OF ABRAHAM G. FELDMAN, PRESIDENT AND TREASURER OF THE STORKLINE FURNITURE CORPORATION, CHICAGO, ILL.

The CHAIRMAN. What is your full name, sir?

Mr. FELDMAN. Abraham G. Feldman.

The CHAIRMAN. Your residence?

Mr. FELDMAN. Chicago.

The CHAIRMAN. And with what business are you connected?

Mr. FELDMAN. I am the president and treasurer of the Storkline Furniture Corporation.

The CHAIRMAN. How many employees has that company?

Mr. FELDMAN. Three hundred and fifty.

The CHAIRMAN. Where is its plant located?

Mr. FELDMAN. In Chicago.

The CHAIRMAN. And you are here as representing yourself?

Mr. FELDMAN. Yes, sir; and also the furniture manufacturers of Chicago.

The CHAIRMAN. How many are there?

Mr. FELDMAN. There are about 243 manufacturers.

The CHAIRMAN. How many employees?

Mr. FELDMAN. About 8,000 employees.

The CHAIRMAN. Are they organized in any labor organization of any kind?

Mr. FELDMAN. The upholsterers are organized.

The CHAIRMAN. The upholsterers are. Do you desire to submit your statement to the committee for printing in the record, or do you desire to read it to the committee?

Mr. FELDMAN. I would be glad to do that if you wish, but I have just a few words I would be very glad to give you and the rest of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well. That will be very helpful.

Mr. FELDMAN. My brief is very short.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well, sir.

Mr. FELDMAN. I am here for the sole purpose to try in my humble way to show you that conditions which exist among our employees and also prevail in other furniture factories in Chicago are not as bad as some individuals contemplate are taking place.

I am representing my firm, with a capital of $1,369,000. We employ about 350 people and the first 3 months of this year our pay roll amounted to about $130,000. I am here also to represent and speak in behalf of the furniture manufacturers of Chicago.

STATEMENT OF ROBERT C. GRAHAM, VICE PRESIDENT OF THE GRAHAM-PAIGE MOTORS CORPORATION AND ALSO DIRECTOR OF THE AUTOMOBILE MANUFACTURERS ASSOCIATION

The CHAIRMAN. Will you give the reporter your full name?

Mr. GRAHAM. Robert C. Graham, vice president of the Graham-Paige Motors Corporation, of Detroit.

The CHAIRMAN. And who are you representing?

Mr. GRAHAM. I represent the Automobile Manufacturers Association. This organization comprises all of the major manufacturing companies in the automobile industry with the exception of the Ford Motor Co.

The CHAIRMAN. Will you put in the record the name and the official position of each member of the industry who is here, commencing with this gentleman here, his full name and his position?

Mr. GRAHAM. Alfred P. Sloan, Jr., president General Motors Corporation; Alfred H. Swayne, vice president General Motors Corporation; Alvan Macauley, president Packard Motor Car Co., and president of the Automobile Manufacturers Association; A. J. Brosseau, president Mack Trucks, Inc.; B. E. Hutchinson, vice president and treasurer Chrysler Corporation; Norman Damon, of the Automobile Manufacturers Association; Herman Weckler, of the Chrysler Corporation; William Cronin, Automobile Manufacturers Association; H. W. Anderson, General Motors Corporation; Henry Hogan, General Motors Corporation; T. R. Dahl, vice president White Co.; and George H. Peterson, of the Graham-Paige Motors Corporation.

The CHAIRMAN. I assume the industry is unanimous in one thing, in its approval of the views you are going to present to us?

Mr. GRAHAM. I would say that it is so far as the Automobile Manufacturers Association is concerned. However, Senator, we are not able to speak for the Ford Motor Co.

Senator, I would like to ask permission to have Mr. John Thomas Smith, of General Motors, and Mr. Herman Weckler, of the Chrysler Corporation, to come up in case there would be some technical questions that I would not be able to answer.

The CHAIRMAN. You may both come forward, please, and take chairs near Mr. Graham.

I suppose in your statement you tell us in what form or character of organization now exists in the industry for the purpose of collective bargaining? You will deal with that, I suppose?

Mr. GRAHAM. I will cover that, Senator; and I would also like to say that I want to give an oral summary and then later file the completed brief.

The CHAIRMAN. How many employees are represented by this group who are appearing here this morning representing the industry?

Mr. GRAHAM. In the industry there are around a quarter of a million men. Of course, there are parts-manufacturing companies and others. If you took the entire industry from every standpoint you would find, for example, that it would be over 400,000 men.

The CHAIRMAN. But those who are appearing this morning have in their employ approximately 250,000 men?

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes, sir.

Senator and members of the committee, I would like to just take a few minutes' time to tell you what the automobile industry is doing in the aiding of recovery, because I think that what this industry has done surely merits the consideration of everyone.

Personally, I have had over 30 years now of manufacturing experience in the glass industry, and the truck-manufacturing business, and in the automobile business. I have loaded bottles in cars. I have worked in the packing room, and I have worked out in the field, and I have worked with the men in many different capacities, so I would not want it to appear that what I am saying would come from one who perhaps has just come into the manufacturing industry, or who had had relations with employees over just a short time, because ever since finishing college I have been shoulder to shoulder with my brother in this work.

I would like to have it understood that from our standpoint there has always been a fine, wholesome feeling for all of our employees, and I am sure it is equally true that that same kind feeling which we have had for our men they have had for us.

In regard to this industry, as you know, it is one of the youngest manufacturing industries in America. It reached the heights in 1928 of the great figure of 5½ million cars. And then came a number of years of depression that brought us down in the low period of 1932 to 1,200,000 cars.

This industry has tried to cooperate with the administration in every possible way. We supported the President's Reciprocal Tariff Act because we realized that if we could get our world trade back it would mean a tremendous aid toward recovery.

We showed in 1928 that over a million automobiles could be exported. And when we analyzed that million cars we found it meant 800,000 tons of steel, we found 5,000,000 tires, 2½ million square feet of glass, and 3½ million gallons of paint, besides the copper, leather, and other articles that went into the manufacture of the car.

In 1932, with that low figure of 1,200,000 we went up in 1933 to 1,800,000. In 1934 those figures rose to 2,800,000, and we are anticipating for 1935, providing nothing is done to upset the conditions of this country, the great figure of 3,500,000, not up to the figures of 1928, but a fine substantial progress that we are hoping to make. And this with an industry that has always paid for a major manufacturing industry the highest wages, an industry that has always believed in short hours. And anyone who has visited any of the automobile plants well knows that the working conditions are the finest in the world. And I have visited the plants in other countries, and I am safe in saying "in the whole world." We have gone along with a fine, happy feeling that this industry was able to pay fine wages.

We have gone along with the belief that we could have the finest working arrangement with our men in the world, that this new industry, comparatively new, of 25 years, for example, could do tremendous things, and it was with that feeling that we have gone through this depression, and it was with that feeling that we have tried to cooperate in every way.

I would like to read this oral summary and I hope that I won't take a lot of time.

The automobile industry believes this legislation to be altogether unnecessary and unwise. This industry in its industrial relations is already subject to Government regulation and supervision under methods imposed by the President of the United States. These relations during the past year have been conducted under the terms of this settlement.

This bill would also tend to destroy the basis of industrial relations upon which the automobile industry has been enabled for many years to expand employment, to pay high wages, to provide a wider market for its products, and to make an outstanding contribution to the industrial and social development of the country.

Instead of furthering the interests of American labor as a whole, this bill, whatever its declared purpose, appears to be really in the interest of a small minority represented by labor leaders who apparently seek legislative sanction of their efforts to dominate all American labor.

Our automobile industry, which is one of the largest manufacturing industries, insists on the principle that the labor employed in its plants be free to join or not to join any organization.

Merit, not membership in a union, should always be the basis of employment.

A man's labor affiliation or lack of any such affiliation, should have no more to do with his job than his religion or his politics.

We believe this is a fundamental American principle.

We are opposed to any legislation which deprives men of their inherent right to work regardless of the dictates of a labor organization.

We object to the proposed bill because we believe it violates that principle, and because it would disrupt the harmonious relations between employers and employees which have existed in this industry for many years.

Few, if any, American industries have been less troubled by labor disputes than the automobile industry.

It is our desire to maintain this condition in the interests of our employees as well as of the public, whose purchase of motor cars makes possible automobile employment.

It is our desire to keep this industry free of such disrupting influences as jurisdictional labor disputes which have been so largely responsible in other industries for strikes, warfare, stoppage of production, loss of wages, and destruction of property.

For years the American Federation of Labor leaders have sought to organize the automobile industry, but without success, because the great mass of employees refused to recognize the Federation as their spokesman, or to pay it dues.

No clearer indication of the wishes of the automobile workers could be found than the results of the recent elections in which the employees, by secret balloting conducted by a governmental agency, elected representatives for collective bargaining

As of March 20, 1935, out of 168,789 eligible voters, 85 percent voted, and of those voting only 7 percent favored the American Federation of Labor, and more than 70 percent voted no labor union affiliation.

The CHAIRMAN. Was that vote taken separately in each plant?

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. By the employees in each plant?

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Was there a direct question put to the employees as to what form of labor organization they preferred?

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the form of ballot, do you remember?

Mr. WECKLER. The form of ballot gave the employees an opportunity to nominate a certain person for their representative. The ballot provided a space to write the man's name in and also a space for his affiliation.

The CHAIRMAN. But it did not put to the employee the direct question of what kind of labor organization he chose?

Mr. WECKLER. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And the reason why Mr. Graham has given us these figures is to show, because they were candidates of the American Federation of Labor, the noncandidates as representatives received that percentage of the vote, and all the other candidates received the larger percentage of 82 out of the whole number; is that correct?

Mr. WECKLER. In other words, 70 percent of the ballots were marked without any affiliation, and 7 percent of the ballots, as Mr. Graham has stated, were marked with an "A. F. of L." mark of nomination.

The CHAIRMAN. So that against the names of certain candidates of certain employees in the organization were the words "A. F. of L."?

Mr. WECKLER. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. And against others what designation?

Mr. SMITH. The voter had to do his own designating. As was said, he said he wanted to vote for a certain man, and then he gave his affiliation.

The CHAIRMAN. Will you read again that statement of the ballot, the result of the ballots?

Mr. GRAHAM. As of March 20, 1935——

The CHAIRMAN (interposing). The election was held in all of the plants at the same time on the same day?

Mr. SMITH. No. Over a period of several months.

Mr. GRAHAM. Over a period.

The CHAIRMAN. Over a period?

Mr. GRAHAM. That is right.

Mr. WECKLER. These are cumulated figures?

Mr. GRAHAM. These are cumulated figures; yes, sir.

As of March 20, 1935, out of 168,789 eligible voters, 85 percent voted, and of those voting only 7 percent favored the American Federation of Labor, and more than 70 percent voted no labor union affiliation.

A great preponderance of workers have indicated a desire to be represented by fellow workers not affiliated with any organization, although members of 14 different labor organizations received votes in the recent elections to determine the representatives for collective bargaining. All groups are accorded proportionate representation in the newly-established bargaining agencies, and are met individually when they so request.

This bill does not give the employees any rights so far as collective bargaining is concerned that are not already granted by section 7 (a) of the National Recovery Act, but the act does endow the American Federation of Labor and other professional labor organizations with more effective means than they have ever had before to impose upon employees their domination as the collective bargaining agency.

Senator BORAH. Mr. Graham, in what respect does the bill do that?

The CHAIRMAN. You may answer that.

Mr. SMITH. May I answer?

Senator BORAH. Go ahead. We can proceed when we get to the other witness later.

The CHAIRMAN. No. He called these other witnesses to answer technical questions which might be asked him.

Mr. SMITH. May I answer?

STATEMENT OF JOHN THOMAS SMITH, VICE PRESIDENT, GENERAL MOTORS CORPORATION

The CHAIRMAN. What is your full name for the record?

Mr. SMITH. John Thomas Smith is my name, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. You may answer Senator Borah's question.

Mr. SMITH. Because in the event of the present bill, or the proposed bill, going through, the question then would be, "What is a unit?" This bill proposes to authorize the labor board to determine the unit on an employer basis, on a plant basis, on a craft basis, or on any other basis.

Now, the difference between that scheme and the scheme that is operated in the case of the automobile industry is fundamentally this, the National Automobile Labor Board, under the terms of the Presidential settlement of last March, took plant by plant and roughly figured out, according to its size, there should be a bargaining agency consisting of 10 or 15, the idea being not to make this bargaining agency large, that it would be too bulky.

And then having made an examination of the fundamental conditions, whether with crafts, unskilled labor, skilled labor, whether they worked in one department or a lot of other departments, then with their own motion, without any consultation so far as management was concerned, fixed certain definite precincts. Then these precincts nominated certain candidates for this bargaining agency, and the two candidates that received the highest number of votes in what was equivalent to a primary on a subsequent date were elected, stood for an election, and the one that received the highest vote was selected, and that was the tentative bargaining agency. But in order to effectuate this proportional scheme and to protect minorities then the minorities that had not been successful in electing candidates, because somebody else got a higher vote, were given the right of representation. In other words, in a plant if the American Federation of Labor elected nobody, but had a third of the votes, then it would get a third of the representation on the bargaining agency, the theory being that the proportional theory in regard to representation, a minority instead of being frozen out, as is proposed by this bill, would have this additional protection. It would have some voice in the bargaining agency.

Now, in answer to the Senator's question, the difference between that scheme and the scheme of this bill in practices is that as the American Federation of Labor will not participate in that sort of an arrangement in practice, it means that when they are in the majority they will endeavor to coerce the management and the minority by one of the things permitted by the bill, in other words, to try to effect a closed shop by this agreement.

I take it that this bill is a step backward so far as 7 (a) is concerned, because 7 (a) provides that a man should not be discriminated against because he belongs to a union or because he did not belong to a union, and therefore that has thrown into legal doubt the validity of the so-called "closed-shop agreement" where some employers and employees prescribed a man must belong to a union as a condition of employment. And by use of that power that is granted by this so-called "majority agreement" in this bill the natural function of the organized-labor leaders would be where they are in a majority to demand that nobody could work unless he belonged to the union, but when they are in the minority then the thing does not function at all, because they do not propose to be outlawed, and in practice so long as they refuse to cooperate and always have the possibility of threatening a strike in the case of any discrimination against them, the practical result of this bill would be to disrupt your organization. In other words, the professional labor organization will respect the majority rule only when they are in the majority; when they are in the minority it does not work.

I am afraid that is a rather long answer, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. I would like to ask about the agency which you have set up for collective bargaining. This agency to which you have referred was set up as the result of a Presidential order or agreement entered into by the leaders in the industry with the President?

Mr. SMITH. Yes, Mr. Chairman; in March a year ago.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that order in writing?

Mr. SMITH. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And it can be put in the record, of course, during the proceedings?

Mr. SMITH. Yes, sir. We would like to have it in.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, briefly stated, just what does it provide, namely, in what way do you proceed to give your employees opportunities for engaging in collective bargaining agreements?

Mr. SMITH. I think this is the way——

The CHAIRMAN (interposing). First of all—pardon me—you deal plant by plant, or do all the employees in the entire number of plants work together?

Mr. SMITH. It is sectionally a plant matter.

The CHAIRMAN. Does each plant elect by secret ballot a representative or representatives?

Mr. SMITH. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And do they meet with their own employer, or do they meet with a committee of the employers of the entire industry?

Mr. SMITH. All of the industrial relations in the automobile industry are on the strict basis of employer and employee.

In other words, there are no general trade agreements in any way.

The CHAIRMAN. So that collective bargaining that is engaged in under this agreement is collective bargaining in each plant?

Mr. SMITH. In each plant.

The CHAIRMAN. Between the employer of that plant and his employees?

Mr. SMITH. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that correct?

Mr. SMITH. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Without regard to the collective bargaining which is going on in another plant?

Mr. SMITH. It is entirely apart.

The CHAIRMAN. In your plant, Mr. Smith, how many representatives have you?

Mr. SMITH. We have many plants. You see the General Motors Corporation has many plants all over.

The CHAIRMAN. In each one of your plants you have a different number of representatives?

Mr. SMITH. They are different in number. There is one that has 7, one 10, one 15, and so forth, in the other large plants, for instance, the Dodge plant. And the Chrysler Co., a very, very large plant, has as high as 53.

The CHAIRMAN. Fifty-three?

Mr. SMITH. The number of representatives is conditioned upon the number of employees that are in the group.

The CHAIRMAN. At these elections these representatives meet among themselves to hear grievances and from time to time present them to the management?

Mr. SMITH. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Who in the management do they present their grievances to?

Mr. SMITH. The various companies have various schemes. So far as the Chrysler Co. is concerned, I think they have a special committee.

The CHAIRMAN. From the management?

Mr. SMITH. From the management; yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. SMITH. And they sit down——

The CHAIRMAN (interposing). With the representatives?

Mr. SMITH. With the members of the bargaining agency.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. SMITH. And they discuss the matters in interest.

So far as the General Motors is concerned, we adopted a different policy. We designate somebody in every plant, who is the contact man, to take up with the representatives of the workers the various questions, and we have a very elaborate system too, which gives the worker, in the individual worker, or any other worker, the right to present any grievance or claim in the regular course of events through the foreman, and up to the highest executives of the corporation. And that is embodied in a printed procedure that has been mailed to every one of our workers. So that any worker in the General Motors Corporation has a right to lay his grievance through successive stages up to the head of the corporation.

The CHAIRMAN. What, if any, financial assistance, or what, if any, financial aid is given by the management to these representatives?

Mr. SMITH. These representatives have not gotten over that hurdle. So far as these representatives are concerned, I think it is only fair to say that the management had nothing to do with these elections.

The CHAIRMAN. We understand that.

Mr. SMITH. They were not asked and they had nothing to do with laying out the precincts. They had nothing to do in regard to compensation. The responsibility for the entire set-up rested on the Automobile Labor Board. Now, immediately after the elections were held the labor board held conferences with these representatives of the workers in order to try to more or less feel their way, because this collective bargaining is a new field, and the thought was that they ought to try to patiently work out something. And they are still in the formative stage.

The CHAIRMAN. Who appointed the Labor Board?

Mr. SMITH. The Labor Board was appointed by the President of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. Did that continue to function after the elections?

Mr. SMITH. That is functioning.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it functioning now?

Mr. SMITH. And is functioning still.

The CHAIRMAN. Are appeals made to them when the management and the employees' representatives are unable to agree?

Mr. SMITH. Yes, sir; that is the normal function, and has been ever since March.

The CHAIRMAN. They have the final say in determining the differences between employees and the management?

Mr. SMITH. Yes. One of the unique things of this automobile settlement is that the determinations of this Board shall be final. In other words, unlike the proposed board here.

The CHAIRMAN. It is the only such Board in the country, I believe?

Mr. SMITH. Sir?

The CHAIRMAN. It is the only such Board in the country, I believe?

Mr. SMITH. I think it is the only one where we agreed in advance to the finality of it.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. SMITH. And, therefore, it is also interesting to observe——

The CHAIRMAN (interposing). Suppose your employees do not accept the judgment of this Board, what can you do about it?

Mr. SMITH. What can we do? Of course, we have no control over the employees, Mr. Chairman. We have to go along and do the best we can. We have to abide by a lot of the decisions of this board that we do not think are right, but still in a situation of this kind we have to abide by them.

The CHAIRMAN. Coming back to this one question, and then I will drop my inquiry. In what manner are these representatives of the employees compensated?

Mr. SMITH. So far as my information goes, the question of compensation has not been worked out. There have been discussions between these gentlemen of the labor board, and there has been so far as I know no rule laid down by the labor board in reference to this question of compensation, because the men themselves are somewhat bothered by it, and because there is a question, for example, where bargaining agents during the regular working hours are discussing problems with the management, and I would say that the general feeling of the management as I know it and of the workers is that it would be most unfair to penalize these representatives by making them lose time which it is true was taken from their regular work, but which was devoted to work of very much more importance perhaps than their regular work. And my own individual opinion is that that certainly is the very least that a representative worker would be entitled to get because of his contribution to this question of employment.

The CHAIRMAN. Nothing in this bill objects to that.

Mr. SMITH. Yes; this bill as——

The CHAIRMAN. On this first?

Mr. SMITH. No; except I——

The CHAIRMAN (interposing). There were cases brought to our attention yesterday where there was a lump sum given these representatives, $25 a week, regardless of the time to be spent. I think such cases would not probably come within the provisions of this bill.

Mr. SMITH. Of course, this is as I say too formative yet. The board has not hardened, because I think that the labor board has not been willing to say that this contribution is right and this one is wrong, and we have taken the persuasive position that that is something that the board ought to determine.

The CHAIRMAN. I think we have a general understanding of the set-up.

You may proceed, Mr. Graham.

Mr. GRAHAM. We believe that any bill which purports to prevent unfair labor practices on the part of employers should likewise prohibit unfair labor practices on the part of labor organizations, which often take forms not amenable to existing criminal or other legal control.

There is no provision in this bill which would protect employer and employees who in good faith cooperate with the Board set up by the Government against labor organizations that are unwilling to abide by an adverse decision.

In the Real Silk Hosiery Mill the National Labor Board held an election at the request of the company, and in accordance with an agreement made between the employer, the Board. the employees' representative plan, and an outside labor union.

The election was held under the auspices and direction of the Board and resulted in a decision in favor of the employees representation group.

The organized union, which had only a small minority of the employees as members, having lost the election, breached its agreement and called its members out on strike, tying up the plants for 7 weeks.

It is clearly the purpose of the bill to vest labor organizations with greater powers, and, in view of this fact, it becomes essential that these organizations be compelled by law to change their structure from the existing loosely organized voluntary association to a duly incorporated organization which, together with its directors. officers, agents, and members, is answerable in law for its acts, and which can be held liable on agreements made by it or in its behalf.

Labor organizations should be required to adopt and use sound accounting methods, subject to examination by appropriate public authority as to all funds received and disbursed. Certainly no organization should be given the rights accorded by this bill, without being held strictly accountable and responsible for the exercise and results of such rights, and without being subject to the jurisdiction and to the orders of our courts.

The one-sided character of this legislation is indicated by the restraints placed upon employers as against the lack of any restraint whatsoever upon labor organizations.

It is only fair, when a law restricts one party, that it also restrict other parties involved.

Section 8 of the act is the "closed-shop" section. It provides that nothing in the act shall preclude an employer from making an agreement with a labor organization to require as a condition of employment membership in such labor organization if it represents a majority of employees. This section does not work both ways. If any other organization than a union organization becomes a representative for collective bargaining, and the union is of the opinion that a strike will not carry out its purposes, it will, no doubt, object to the contract on the ground that the closed-shop agreement was made with an ineligible representation group. The Labor Board will probably hear the case and, following its usual practice, conduct another election, and might possibly conduct one after that until the union is satisfied. There would be a vociferous protest if the employer closed his shop against union members, although the majority of employees prefer nonunion representation, but if the employer closed his shop against nonunion men, the employer would receive the praise of unions everywhere.

We wish to call attention to several specific features of the proposed measure. Take, for example, the definition of the term "employee", as stated in paragraph (3) of section 2 of the bill. It reads:

> The term "employee" * * * shall not be limited to the employees of a particular employer unless the act explicitly states otherwise, and shall include any individual whose work has ceased as a consequence of or in connection with any current labor dispute or because of any unfair labor practice.

It is an open invitation to employees in plants wholly unrelated to a particular plant where no difficulties exist to stir up trouble in that plant. It encourages agitators everywhere to foment sympathetic strikes.

The CHAIRMAN. It has been suggested that that definition of "employee" should be modified so as to exclude an employee who is out on strike, who had committed acts of violence.

Mr. GRAHAM. I certainly think that should exclude a man on the outside.

The CHAIRMAN. You think that, at least, should be done?

Mr. GRAHAM. Sir?

The CHAIRMAN. You think that, at least, that should be done?

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes, sir. Secondly, the bill's definition of a "labor dispute" is also an invitation to those outside of a particular plant, having no relationship whatever to that plant, to foment trouble. Paragraph (9) of section 2 reads:

> The term "labor dispute" includes any controversy concerning terms, tenure, or conditions of employment * * * regardless of whether the disputants stand in the proximate relation of employer and employee.

It is our desire to keep this industry free of interference by agencies and organizations which have ulterior interests to serve other than the interests of our own companies, their employees, and the public.

Third. The bill, in paragraph (4), section 2, defines "representatives" as follows:

> The term "representatives" includes any individual or labor organization.

An employee may designate as his representative a person associated with a labor organization; but if he designates a labor organization, he, in effect, designates the officers of the labor organization as they may be changed from time to time by the vote at the meeting of the labor organization, over which he has no control.

A labor organization is generally made up of employees in several plants and not always in the same area. A labor organization might want to make an example of a particular plant by attempting to impose terms and conditions on that plant, but members of the union working in that plant would be powerless to prevent the union from going ahead on its program if the union could secure the votes of enough members who work in other plants.

The so-called "majority rule" in representation for collective bargaining is one of the most misleading phrases that has ever been injected into industrial relations.

It is contained in paragraph (a) of section 9 of this bill, which states:

> Representatives designated or selected for the purpose of collective bargaining by the majority of the employees in a unit appropriate for such purposes shall be the exclusive representatives of all the employees in such unit for the purposes of collective bargaining.

In determining units for majority rule, the National Labor Relations Board is empowered to decide whether the unit appropriate for collective bargaining shall be "the employer unit, craft unit, plant unit, or other unit."

It is pertinent to inquire whether the American Federation of Labor, which appears as a sponsor of this bill, genuinely favors such majority rule in the automobile industry. If so, on the basis of the elections recently held in the automobile plants, they have no standing whatsoever.

We do not believe that the federation or this bill mean any such thing.

What is more likely is that the federation expects such units to be decreed as will enable it to force itself into the so-called "majority" position; and once it has attained that position, its next step undoubtedly will be to force the closed shop by the same methods.

The inquisitorial powers granted to the Board proposed in this bill would give it unlimited access to almost any company records it chose to pry into.

For example, paragraph (c) of section 10 provides that—

> Whenever there is a charge or the Board shall have reason to believe that any person has engaged in or is engaging in any such unfair labor practice, the Board, or any agent or agency designated by the Board for such purposes, shall have power to issue * * *

Paragraph (1) of section 13 provides that—

> The Board, or its duly authorized agents or agencies, shall at all reasonable times have access to, for the purpose of examination, and the right to copy any evidence of any person being investigated or proceeded against that related to any matter under investigation or in question.

This bill, in paragraph (2) of section 2, excludes "any labor organization, or anyone acting in the capacity of officer or agent of such labor organization" from any of the inquisitions to which employers are subjected by the bill.

The Board is given very broad and arbitrary powers to regulate employer-employee relationships. It is given the power of complainant, prosecutor, and judge, to mediate, conciliate, make inquiry on the complaint or information from any source, conduct trials without proper regard to the laws of evidence.

This bill runs counter to the common-sense theory of mutual interest, which should exist between employers and employees in manufacturing operations.

The bill, in paragraph (2) of section 8 prohibits an employer from making an financial contribution or giving other support to an employees' organization. The only purpose of this section, as we see it, is to outlaw organizations of employees who do not choose to join so-called "recognized labor unions."

So far as elections to determine representatives for collective bargaining are concerned, there is no guaranty in this bill as to fairness and impartiality. The bill, in paragraph C of section 9 states that—

> The Board * * * may take a secret ballot of employees or utilize any other suitable method to ascertain such representatives.

The rule of "and other suitable method" is entirely too vague to be workable and is subject to grave abuse.

Apart from the above considerations, the Automobile Manufacturers Association believes this bill to be especially objectionable, because it would destroy the program designed to accord the workers in their plants full rights, including that of collective bargaining, which has been adopted by this industry and which is now being carried out in accordance with the terms of the President's settlement of March 25, 1934. Industrial relations in the automobile industry during the past year have been conducted under the terms of this settlement. The record of this relationship is set forth in detail in the report of the Automobile Labor Board to the President of the United States on February 16, 1935.

Under the terms of this settlement, all the employees in the industry have been accorded the right of collective bargaining, of freely choosing representatives for purposes of collective bargaining, of protection against discrimination, and of redress of their grievances under section 7 a of the National Industrial Recovery Act.

In announcing this settlement, the President stated emphatically that—

> The Government makes it clear that it favors no particular union or particular form of employee organization or representation. The Government's only duty is to secure absolute and uninfluenced freedom of choice, without coercion, restraint, or intimidation from any source.

The proposed bill is inconsistent with the principles enunciated by the President in his settlement, and in its operation of the bill would tend to disturb the peaceful relations which this settlement has established.

We do not beliew that it is the intention of Congress to repudiate the American principles of fair play embodied in the President's settlement, or to subject the industry and its employees to the agitation and struggle for political and economic power on the part of labor organizers among the automobile workers which would follow from the enactment of this bill into law.

I would furthermore just like to make a plea, in view of what I have stated at the beginning in regard to what this industry has done to aid recovery, that there are in America thousands and many thoustands of small, independent companies, some larger and some smaller than our own company, that have gone through this depression with a real strong heart, carrying on to help bring back prosperity to this country, and that the finances of these particular companies necessarily have been greatly depleted because of this world-wide economic depression.

We, therefore, ask particularly in the name of these smaller independent companies that have done so much to assist in aiding a recovery that nothing be done now to upset these fine relations that we think have existed between our men and ourselves, and which we feel sure will be the fine, wholesome feeling that has characterized that in the past. I thank you.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there a peaceful condition existing in the industry between its employees and the employers at the present time?

Mr. GRAHAM. Senator, I feel that there is. I talked to my brother just yesterday, who is at the plant, in order to be sure. I would not come down here with a statement, for example, that would not be absolutely straightforward. I called him up and he said there was no sign of any trouble in our plants. Now, I think if there had been any trouble, serious trouble, he would know about it.

The CHAIRMAN. So that this arrangement that was entered into by the industry and the President is apparently working satisfactorily and has prevented any strikes or threat of strikes?

Mr. GRAHAM. I certainly think so.

Senator BORAH. Up to this time?

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes, sir; I certainly think so, Senator Borah.

Mr. SMITH. There are a few minor ones.

Mr. GRAHAM. I am referring to our company. There is certainly none in ours, and I would know of any major ones.

Senator BORAH. Have you gentlemen raised any constitutional questions to some of the provisions of this bill?

Mr. SMITH. No, Senator. We have raised none because we take it that that is more or less of an old story as far as the committee is concerned.

Senator BORAH. The Constitution is getting a little jaded.

Mr. SMITH. Because everybody must wonder from a legal point of view as to the basis of the jurisdiction of the bill insofar as it affects the manufacturing industries, which, under a great many decisions of the Supreme Court, some of them fairly recent, it has been decided to be intrastate commerce rather than interstate commerce, and consequently outside of the jurisdiction of Congress, but we refrained from discussing any of those questions, leaving it——

The CHAIRMAN (interposing). That aspect of the bill has been presented to us by distinguished counsel.

Mr. SMITH (continuing). Because we thought that would be taken care of.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Graham, is there anybody else to appear this morning?

Mr. GRAHAM. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. There is nobody else appearing as representing the industry?

Mr. GRAHAM. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You speak for all of the industry?

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes, sir; that is right.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you a brief in addition to your statement?

Mr. SMITH. Mr. Graham would like, I think, to file his brief.

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes; I would.

(The brief referred to is as follows:)

MEMORANDUM ON THE PROPOSED NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS ACT BY AUTOMOBILE MANUFACTURERS ASSOCIATION

The Automobile Manufacturers Association respectfully submits that the proposed National Labor Relations Act, S. 1958, instead of promoting industrial peace would provoke and invite industrial wars.

Instead of clarifying the industrial atmosphere this bill would still further confuse it.

Instead of encouraging employers and employees to settle their affairs amicably it would drive them farther apart.

Instead of helping toward further recovery, this bill, if enacted into law, would substantially impede it.

With this bill on the statute books industry throughout the United States can probably look forward to an epidemic of labor disputes.

So far as the automobile industry is concerned, this legislation is believed to be altogether unnecessary and unwise. This industry in its industrial relations is already subject to Government regulation and supervision under methods imposed by the President of the United States. This arrangement would be wiped out by this bill.

The automobile industry has made an outstanding contribution to the industrial and social development of this country. It is proud that its employees are the highest paid in the country and it has had up to date, relatively little industrial trouble. If this bill is passed insofar as this industry and industry generally are concerned, we can expect to see intensified, the following:

1. A drive by the American Federation of Labor to have itself declared the undisputed czar over industrial and clerical workers throughout the United States, and to force such workers to pay tribute to that organization in order to hold their jobs.

2. Unrestrained and unrestricted intimidation, violence, and other coercive methods against employees who refuse to join labor organizations and the intimidation of employers by references to the so-called "unfair labor practice clauses."

3. Attempts by the American Federation of Labor to impose a closed shop on all industry and make a union card a requisite for a man to earn his living.

4. An autocratic rule of a national labor board over American business with arbitrary powers of inquisition, with power to ignore rules of evidence, to base its findings on rumors and hearsay evidence and to violate other established constitutional safeguards which protect individual rights.

5. Advancement of the interests of labor leaders who apparently now seek legislative sanction of their efforts to dominate all American labor.

Take the definition of the term "employee" as stated in paragraph (3) of section 2 of the bill. It reads:

"The term 'employee' * * * shall not be limited to the employees of a particular employer unless the act explicitly states otherwise and shall include any individual whose work has ceased as a consequence of or in connection with any current labor dispute or because of any unfair labor practice * * *."

It is an open invitation to employees in plants wholly unrelated to a particular plant where no difficulties exist to stir up trouble in that plant. It encourages agitators everywhere to foment sympathetic strikes.

The automobile industry insists on the principle that the labor employed in its plants be free to join or not to join any organization.

Merit, not membership in a union, should always be the basis of employment.

A man's labor affiliation or lack of any such affiliation should have no more to do with his job than his religion or his politics.

We believe this principle is a fundamental American principle.

We are opposed to any legislation which deprives men of their inalienable right to work regardless of the dictates of a labor organization.

We object to the proposed bill because we believe it violates that principle and because it would disrupt the harmonious relations between employers and employees which not only have existed in this industry for many years, but also have proved to be generally satisfactory to the great mass of workers employed in it.

Few, if any, American industries have been less troubled by labor disputes than the automobile industry.

It is our desire to maintain this condition in the interests of our employees as well as the public whose purchase of motor cars makes possible automobile employment.

It is our desire to keep this industry free of such disrupting influences as jurisdictional labor disputes which have been so largely responsible in other industries for strikes, warfare, stoppage of production, loss of wages, and destruction of property.

The bill's definition of a "labor dispute" is also an invitation to those outside of a particular plant having no relationship whatever to that plant to foment trouble. Paragraph (9) of section 2 reads:

"The term 'labor dispute' includes any controversy concerning terms, tenure or conditions of employment, * * * regardless of whether the disputants stand in the proximate relation of employer and employee."

It is our desire to keep this industry free of interference by agencies and organizations which have ulterior interests to serve other than the interests of our own companies, their employees, and the public.

The bill, in paragraph (4), section 2, defines "representatives" as follows:

"The term 'representatives' includes any individual or labor organization."

An employee may quite properly designate as his representative a person associated with a labor organization, but if he designates a labor organization, he, in effect, designates the officers of the labor organization as they may be changed from time to time by the votes at the labor-organization meeting, over which he has no control.

A labor organization is generally made up of employees in several plants and not always in the same area. A labor organization might want to make an example of a particular plant by attempting to impose terms and conditions on that plant, but members of the union working in that plant would be powerless to prevent the union from going ahead on its program if the union could secure the votes of enough members who work in other plants.

We do not believe that it is in the interests of our employees to give legislative encouragement to the sort of incidents that have occurred in San Francisco, in the coal fields, in the building trades, in the Chicago bus strike, in the textile mills, and in other situations in which attempted domination by labor union leaders has caused so much violent coercion and distress to the employees who wanted to work and to the general public.

For years American Federation of Labor leaders have sought to organize the automobile industry without success, because the great mass of employees refused to recognize the federation as their spokesman or to pay it dues.

No clearer indication of the wishes of the automobile workers could be found than the results of the recent elections in which the employees by secret balloting, conducted by a governmental agency, elected representatives for collective bargaining.

As of March 20, 1935, out of 168,789 eligible voters, 85 percent voted, and of those voting 7 percent favored the American Federation of Labor and 70 percent voted no labor affiliation.

A great preponderance of workers have indicated a desire to be represented by fellow workers not affiliated with any organization, although members of 14 different labor organizations received votes in the recent elections to determine the representatives for collective bargaining. All groups are accorded proportionate representation in the newly established bargaining agencies and are met individually whenever they so request.

The so-called "majority rule" in representation for collective bargaining is one of the most misleading phrases that has ever been injected into industrial relations.

It is contained in paragraph (a), section 9 of this bill, which states:

"Representatives designated or selected for the purpose of collective bargaining by the majority of the employees in a unit appropriate for such purposes shall be the exclusive representatives of all the employees in such unit for the purposes of collective bargaining * * *"

In actual practice this means that the labor union accepts the majority rule where it happens to have a majority of the employees in its membership but is not bound by majority rule where the union is in a minority.

In determining units for majority rule, the National Labor Relations Board is empowered to decide whether the unit appropriate for collective bargaining shall be "the employer unit, craft unit, plant unit, or other unit."

It is pertinent to inquire whether the American Federation of Labor which appears as a sponsor of this bill genuinely favors such majority rule in the automobile industry. If so, on the basis of the elections recently held in the automobile plants, the Federation has no standing whatsoever.

We do not believe that either the Federation or this bill means any such thing.

What is more likely is that the Federation expects such units to be decreed as will enable it to force itself into the so-called " majority position."

And once it has attained that position its next step undoubtedly will be to force the " closed shop " by the same methods.

National labor boards apparently find it difficult or seem to be unwilling to state or to interpret this so-called " majority rule."

The National Labor Relations Board evaded the question in the Houde case.

In the Real Silk Hosiery case described below, the employers of a majority of the employees found themselves helpless to prevent a small dissatisfied minority from tying up the plant for weeks.

This bill offers no protection to employer, employee, or the public on this score.

This bill does not give the employees any rights so far as collective bargaining is concerned that are not already granted by section 7a of the National Recovery Act, but the act does endow the American Federation of Labor and other professional organizers with more effective means than they have ever had before to impose upon employees their domination as their collective-bargaining agency.

In this respect this bill is class legislation of the worst kind because its effect is to discriminate in favor of the representatives of a minority of the class which the legislation purports to benefit as a whole.

Insofar as coercion and intimidation are concerned, the bill is wholly one-sided. It sets forth in detail in section 8 what are called unfair labor practices for an employer, but by its very silence lends encouragement to unfair labor practices on the part of labor organizations.

The bill says nothing whatsoever about discriminatory and unfair labor practices, restraint, coercion, or intimidation which are being practiced daily by many labor organizations and their paid organizers. As a matter of fact, the bill impliedly supports labor organizations in such practices.

In the Real Silk Hosiery case the National Labor Board held an election at the request of the company and in accordance with an agreement made between the employer, the Board, the employees representative plan, and an organized labor union.

The election was held under the auspices and direction of the Board and resulted in a decision in favor of the employees representation group.

The organized union which had only a small minority of the employees as members, having lost the election breached its agreement and called its members out on strike, tying up the plant for 7 weeks.

There is no provision in this bill which would protect employer and employees who in good faith cooperate with the board set up by the Government against labor organizations that are unwilling to abide by an adverse decision.

Witness the spectacle only a short time ago in the Supreme Court of Kings County, N. Y., of a labor union of dockworkers attempting to intimidate even the court.

After the court had announced its findings in support of the employer, the union announced the calling of a strike to tie up the piers in New York City, stating that it believed the decision was unfair and would not be bound by it.

We believe that any bill which purports to prevent unfair labor practices on the part of employers should likewise prohibit unfair labor practices on the part of labor organizations, which often take forms not amenable to existing criminal statutes or other legal control.

It is clearly the purpose of the bill to vest labor organizations with greater power, and, in view of this fact, it becomes essential that these organizations be compelled by law to change their structure from the existing loosely organized voluntary association to a duly incorporated organization which, together with its directors, officers, agents, and members, is answerable in law for its acts, and which can be held liable for agreements made by it or in its behalf.

Labor organizations should be required to adopt and use sound accounting methods, subject to examination by appropriate public authority as to all funds received and disbursed. Certainly no organization should be given the rights accorded by this bill without being held strictly accountable and responsible for the exercise and results of such rights and without being subject to the jurisdiction and to the orders of our courts.

The one-sided character of this legislation is indicated by the restraints placed upon employers as against the lack of any restraint whatsoever upon labor organizations. The theory, of course, is that employers are supposed to be protected by the common law.

What protection does the common law offer to the employer against such coercive tactics as the flying motorcade used in the textile strike?

It is only fair when a law restricts one party that it should also restrict the other parties involved.

Recent history is full of evidence of labor's irresponsibility for the results of the exercise of its so-called "rights." For instance:

Jurisdictional disputes in the building trades have been both costly and vexing. Construction of the Federal Department of Labor Building has been jeopardized from time to time by jurisdictional disputes between rival unions. Building operations all over the United States have been similarly affected.

Violence in the Chicago motor-bus strike of last fall was such that three of the officers of the outside union, seeking to organize the company's employees, have been indicted for murder. And this strike grew out of the fact that the motor-bus employees voted under section 7 (a) of the National Industrial Recovery Act, to be represented by a company union instead of by the local union of the American Federation of Labor.

Last July a dispute arose in San Francisco between one union and shipowners concerning the method of hiring men. The parties were unable to compose their differences and the unions called a sympathetic strike of all union members in the area. Members of the unions disregarded their written closed-shop agreements and left their jobs pursuant to this general call to assist the particular union in intimidating and coercing the shipowners and the public.

The strike in the Kohler plants in Wisconsin last July was due entirely to the efforts of representatives of a minority of the employees, members of an outside union, to impose their union upon the majority of the employees in the Kohler plants.

The recent textile strike with its flying squadron of union organizers and pickets, illustrates the lengths to which labor unions go to force men to leave their jobs in a labor dispute.

This bill ignores labor union responsbility for coercion, intimidation, and violence such as have occurred on these occasions. The only restraints in the bill are those imposed upon employers who are held to strict accountability.

Section 8 of the act is the closed-shop section. It provides that nothing in the act shall preclude an employer from making an agreement with a labor organization to require as a condition of employment membership in such labor organization if it represents a majority of the employees. This section does not work both ways. If any organization other than a union organization became a representative for collective bargaining and the union was of the opinion that a strike would not carry out its purposes, it would no doubt, object to the contract on the ground that the closed-shop agreement was made with an ineligible representation group. The Labor Board would probably hear the case and conduct other elections until the union was satisfied. There would be a vociferous protest if the employer closed his shop against union members even though the majority of employees preferred nonunion representation, but if the employer closed his shop against nonunion men; the employer would receive the praise and adulation of unions everywhere.

The inquisitorial powers granted to the board proposed in this bill, would give it unlimited access to almost any company records it chose to pry into.

For example, paragraph (c) of section 10, provides that:

"Whenever there is a charge or the board shall have reason to believe that any person has engaged in or is engaging in any such unfair labor practice, the board, or any agent or agency designated by the board for such purposes, shall have power to issue * * *"

Paragraph (1) of section 13, provides that:

"The Board or its duly authorized agent or agencies, shall at all reasonable times have access to, for the purpose of examination, and the right to copy any evidence of any person being investigated or proceeded against that relates to any matter under investigation or in question."

On the other hand the bill in paragraph (2) of section 2, excludes "any labor organization, or anyone acting in the capacity of officer or agent of such labor organization" from any of the inquisitions to which employers are subjected by the bill.

The Board is given very broad and arbitrary powers to regulate employer-employee relationships. It is given the power of complainant, prosecutor, and judge. It may mediate, conciliate, make inquiry on a complaint, or information from any source. It may conduct trials without regard to the rules of evidence.

This bill runs counter to the common-sense theory of mutual interest which should exist between employers and employees in manufacturing operations. As stated by Federal Judge John P. Nields in the Weirton case:

"Manufacture is a cooperative enterprise. Production in quantity and quality with consequent wages, salaries, and dividends, depends upon a sympathetic cooperation of management and workmen. A relation acceptable and satisfactory to both workmen and management is an essential feature of the enterprise. If satisfactory the court will not disturb it. It is said this relation involves the problem of economic balance of the power of labor against the power of capital. The theory of a balance of power or of balancing opposing powers is based upon the assumption of an inevitable and necessary diversity of interest. This is the traditional Old World theory. It is not the twentieth century American theory of that relation as dependent upon mutual interest, understanding, and goodwill. Furthermore, the suggestion that recurrent hard times suspend constitutional limitations or cause manufacturing operations to so affect interstate commerce as to subject them to regulation by the Congress borders on the fantastic and merits no serious consideration."

This bill in paragraph (2) of section 8 prohibits an employer from making any financial contribution or giving other support to an employees' organization. The only purpose of this section as we see it is to outlaw organizations of employees who do not choose to join so-called "recognized labor unions." Some provision should be made to permit reasonable financial contributions to associations, subject to governmental regulation, if needed, to promote harmonious labor relations between employers and employees.

So far as elections to determine representatives for collective bargaining are concerned, there is no guarantee in this bill as to fairness and impartiality. The bill in paragraph (c) of section 9 states that:

"The board * * * may take a secret ballot of employees or utilize any other suitable method to ascertain such representatives."

The rule of any "other suitable method" is too vague to be workable and subject to grave abuse.

Apart from the above considerations, the Automobile Manufacturers Association believes this bill to be especially objectionable because it would destroy the program designed to accord the workers in their plants full rights, including that of collective bargaining, which has been adopted by this industry, and which is now being carried out in accordance with the terms of the President's settlement of March 25, 1934, which reads as follows:

"After many days of conferring in regard to the principles of employment in the automobile industry the following statement covers the fundamentals:

"1. Reduced to plain language section 7 (a) of N. I. R. A. means—

"(a) Employees have the right to organize into a group or groups.

"(b) When such group or groups are organized they can choose representatives by free choice and such representatives must be received collectively and thereby seek to straighten out disputes and improve conditions of employment.

"(c) Discrimination against employees because of their labor affiliations, or for any other unfair or unjust reason is barred.

"A settlement and statement of procedure and principles is appended hereto.

"It has been offered by me to, and has been accepted by, the representatives of the employees and the employers. It lives up to the principles of collective bargaining. I hope and believe that it opens up a chance for a square deal and fair treatment. It gives promise of sound industrial relations. It provides further for a board of three of which the chairman will as a neutral represent the Government.

"In actual practice details and machinery will of course have to be worked out on the basis of common sense and justice, but the big point is that this broad purpose can develop with a tribunal which can handle practically every problem in an equitable way.

"PRINCIPLES OF SETTLEMENT

"Settlement of the threatened automobile strike is based on the following principles:

"1. The employers agree to bargain collectively with the freely chosen representatives of groups and not to discriminate in any way against any employee on the ground of his union labor affiliations.

"2. If there be more than one group each bargaining committee shall have total membership pro rata to the number of men each member represents.

"3. N. R. A. to set up within 24 hours a board, responsible to the President of the United States, to sit in Detroit to pass on all questions of representation, discharge, and discrimination. Decision of the board shall be final and binding on employer and employees. Such a board to have access to all pay rolls and to all lists of claimed employee representation and such board will be composed of—

"(a) A labor representative, (b) an industry representative, (c) a neutral.

"In cases where no lists of employees claiming to be represented have been disclosed to the employer, there shall be no basis for a claim of discrimination. No such disclosure in a particular case shall be made without specific direction of the President.

"4. The Government makes it clear that it favors no particular union or particular form of employee organization or representation. The Government's only duty is to secure absolute and uninfluenced freedom of choice without coercion, restraint, or intimidation from any source.

"5. The industry understands that in reduction or increases of force, such human relationships as married men with families shall come first and then seniority, individual skill, and efficient service. After these factors have been considered no greater proportion of outside union employees similarly situated shall be laid off than of other employees. By outside union employees is understood a paid-up member in good standing, or anyone legally obligated to pay up. An appeal shall lie in case of dispute on principles of paragraph 5 to the Board of Three.

"In all the hectic experience of N. R. A. I have not seen more earnest and patriotic devotion than has been shown by both employers and employees in the automotive industry. They sat night and day for nearly 2 weeks without a single faltering or impatience. The result is one of the most encouraging incidents of the recovery program. It is a complete answer to those critics who haye aserted that managers and employees cannot cooperate for the public good without domination by selfish interest.

"In the settlement there is a framework for a new structure of industrial relations—a new basis of understanding between employers and employees. I would like you to know that in the settlement just reached in the automobile industry we have charted a new course in social engineering in the United States. It is my hope that out of this will come a new realization of the opportunities of capital and labor not only to compose their differences at the conference table and to recognize their respective rights and responsibilities but also to establish a foundation on which they can cooperate in bettering the human relationships involved in any large industrial enterprise.

"It is peculiarly fitting that this great step forward should be taken in an industry whose employers and employees have contributed so consistently and so substantially to the industrial and economic development of this country in the last quarter century. Having pioneered in mechanical invention to a point where the whole world marvels at the perfection and economy of American motor cars and their wide-spread ownership by our citizens in every walk of life, this industry has indicated now its willingness to undertake a pioneer effort in human engineering on a basis never before attempted.

"In the settlement just accomplished, two outstanding advances have been achieved. In the first place we have set forth a basis on which, for the first time in any large industry, a more comprehensive, a more adequate, and a more equitable system of industrial relations may be built than ever before. It is my hope that this system may develop into a kind of works council in industry in which all groups of employees, whatever may be their choice of organization or form of representation, may participate in joint conferences with their employers and I am assured by the industry that such is also their goal and wish.

"In the second place we have for the first time written into an industrial settlement a definite rule for the equitable handling of reductions and increases of forces. It would be ideal if employment in all occupations could be more generally stabilized, but in the absence of that much desired situation, if we can establish a formula which gives weight to the human factors as well as the economic, social, and organizational factors in relieving the hardship of seasonal lay-off, we shall have accomplished a great deal. My view, and that of both employees and employers, is that we have measurably done so in this settlement.

"This is not a one-sided statute, and organization of employees seeking to exercise their representative rights cannot at the same time be unmindful of their responsibilities.

"Industry's obligations are clearly set forth and its responsibilities are established. It is not too much to expect organizations of employees to observe the same ethical and moral responsibilities even though they are not specifically prescribed by the statute. Only in this way can industry and its workers go forward with a united front in their assault on depression and gain for both the desired benefits of continually better times."

Industrial relations in the automobile industry during the past year have been conducted under the terms of this settlement. The record of this relationship is set forth in detail in the report of the Automobile Labor Board to the President of the United States on Febuary 16, 1935, copy of which is attached for the information of the members of the committees of the House and Senate which are considering the proposed bill.

Under the terms of this settlement, all employees in the industry have enjoyed the right of collective bargaining, of freely choosing representatives for purposes of collective bargaining, of protection against discrimination, and of redress of their grievances under section 7 (a) of the National Industrial Recovery Act.

The proposed bill is inconsistent with the principles enunciated by the President in his settlement, and in its operation the bill would disturb the peaceful relations which this settlement has established.

We do not believe that it is the intention of Congress to repudiate the American principles of fair play embodied in the President's settlement or to subject the industry and its employees to the agitation and struggle for political and economic power on the part of labor organizers among the automobile workers which would follow from the enactment of this bill into law.

The CHAIRMAN. There are three gentlemen here representing the mining interests, Mr. Callahan, Mr. McAuliffe, and Mr. Allen. Will you all please come forward until we can get your names and then find out who will be the spokesman; who will be the spokesman of this group?

STATEMENT OF DONALD A. CALLAHAN, PRESIDENT CALLAHAN ZINC-LEAD CO., WALLACE, IDAHO, AND MEMBER OF THE BOARD OF DIRECTORS OF THE AMERICAN MINING CONGRESS

Mr. CALLAHAN. I have a statement to make, and I think Mr. Allen and Mr. McAuliffe probably have something to supplement it briefly.

The CHAIRMAN. Let us have your full name for the record.

Mr. CALLAHAN. Donald A. Callahan.

The CHAIRMAN. And your residence?

Mr. CALLAHAN. Wallace, Idaho.

The CHAIRMAN. And whom are you representing here, Mr. Callahan?

Mr. CALLAHAN. The American Mining Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the membership of that body?

Mr. CALLAHAN. In numbers it represents approximately 90 percent of the mining industry in the country.

The CHAIRMAN. Mining of all kinds?

Mr. CALLAHAN. All branches.

The CHAIRMAN. Mining of all branches?

Mr. CALLAHAN. All branches; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You are yourself in the mining industry?

Mr. CALLAHAN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Your company is the Callahan Zinc-Lead Co.?

Mr. CALLAHAN. The Callahan Zinc-Lead Co.; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Of Wallace, Idaho?

Mr. CALLAHAN. Of Wallace, Idaho; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. We would be pleased to have your views, Mr. Callahan.

Senator MURPHY. Where do you operate?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; where do you operate?

Mr. CALLAHAN. At Wallace, Idaho.

Senator MURPHY. Are all of your properties there?

Mr. CALLAHAN. Yes, sir; the board of directors of the American Mining Congress has directed me to present to you a statement on behalf of the mining industry which it is organized to represent throughout the United States. Those charged with the responsibilities of management in our industry have considered at length and with care, the startling changes which it is apparently intended to bring about in the relation between employers and employees in the entire industrial structure of this Nation.

In the mining and attendant industrial enterprises of the United States, employment is given to a material proportion of the industrial workers of the country. Upon mining and its attendant industries, directly and indirectly, rests the welfare of about 25 millions of our population. We, therefore, ask your most careful consideration of this statement of position which we present as our firm and considered conviction in the vital matter before you.

The American Mining Congress at its annual meeting on December 14, 1934, adopted the following among other resolutions:

> We believe that labor should be given the right to representation in collective bargaining by those of its own selection; that the plan of proportionate representations of labor in any industry should be recognized; and that the right of the individual, not a member of a labor organization, to conduct bargaining by means of his own choice, shall not be restricted or abridged. We condemn any policy which shall constitute any labor organization, national or international, the sole representative of all those employed within an industry.
> Employees who desire to work should be fully protected by the police powers of constituted government and mob law should not be tolerated.
>
> We endorse the principle that every organization of employers and employees shall be made equally subject to public authority, legally answerable for its own conduct or that of its agents, and equally subject to judicial remedy.

We protest the passage of the National Labor Relations Act, S. 1958, for the following specific reasons:

First. Stripped of all camouflage, the bill is a deliberate attempt to fasten upon industry in this country a system of organized labor affiliated with the national labor organization known as the "American Federation of Labor."

Second. The bill deprives employers of the right to counsel and advise with their employees as to their method of organization for collective bargaining, or of considering the relationship which shall exist between employers and employees in any industry.

Third. The bill sets up a political board subject to influences which have no relation to the problems of industry and confers upon that board powers which rival those granted to the most autocratic bureaus of our present Government.

Fourth. The bill sets up a procedure violating the principles of the orderly adjudication of disputes as they have been recognized in courts of law, grants inquisitorial powers which unquestionably would become powerful agencies of persecution, and places employers, good and bad, upon the defensive in the operation of legitimate and honorable business.

Fifth. The bill provides that representatives for collective bargaining "in a unit appropriate for such purpose" shall be chosen by a majority of all employees in such unit and shall thereafter be the exclusive representatives of all such employees. The "unit appropriate" is to be determined by the Board and the Board may also determine when and under what particular method such representatives shall be chosen. We have failed to find any limitation as to how often elections may be held, or as to how often the Board may change its mind as to the type of unit to be recognized.

To treat these objections seriatim: I know that it has been asserted and will be asserted again, that this bill is not in aid of what is known as "organized labor", but is intended purely to grant a freedom of organization to labor in order that it may treat collectively with employers. The picture of what this bill is intended to bring about has been painted most beautifully in this hearng, but I must beg leave to differ most decidedly and to assert that under the provisions of this bill there will be no company unions and that every liberty and opportunity will be given to paid organizers of federated labor to press into the ranks of their organizatons all employees in the Nation.

Consider the practical working of it: Men employed in a given industry who are not members of union labor and have no acquaintance with methods of organization, who perhaps have not seen any need of it in the past, once this bill has become a law, will have dinned into their ears continuously that it is the desire of the Government itself that they organize and treat with their employers in this manner. They canont even go to their employers for advice and counsel, because the employers will be obliged to tell them that under the provisions of section 8 of this bill it will be an unfair labor practice for them to "dominate or interfere with the formation or administration of any labor organization", et cetera. All the employers can do is to wait until the employees have organized, and then receive complaints if any are made.

But now along comes a labor organizer, representing a giant organization, spreading over the entire Nation, a secret oath-bound organization, if you please, with highly paid officials, district organizations, local unions, a headquarters at Washington, and, above all, a political influence which will be quite powerful with politically constituted authorities having to do with the administration of this act. It is represented by them that through payment of a nominal sum each month the employees of the industry can be organized, and all the strength and might of this tremendous national organization will be at the beck and call of the humblest employee. Perhaps in a state of perplexity the employee will go to his employer whom he has known for years and in whom he has the greatest confidence; he may ask his advice, but it cannot be given—the employer must stand aside and permit the agencies of organized labor to influence and even intimidate his employees with whom he has lived in harmonious relations for so long, and once that is done, the labor disputes envisioned by this act automatically arise.

Once the industry is organized the need is for action, and employees learn from experts just how many grievances they have which they never dreamed of before. It will be like reading the advertisement of a quack doctor and arising from such a study with the firm belief that one is in imminent danger of death. This then will be the first effect of the passage of this bill and it will be done upon the theory that employers of the country generally have been grinding down their employees, taking advantage of their necessities, and imposing onerous and unfair conditions.

I have not overdrawn the picture. These very conditions have been realized to an extent under the operation of section 7 (a) of the National Industrial Recovery Act; they will simply be accentuated in the event this bill is passed and the employer no longer has the right even to counsel and advise with his employees as to the methods of their organization. I say to you that the mining industry of this country does not deserve treatment such as will be imposed if this act becomes a law. It is an honorable business which has paid its employees well, striven to surround them with the greatest safety in a naturally hazardous employment, and provided working conditions which are superior to those found in any other country in the world. During the depression the mining industry has sacrificed much to provide a living wage for its employees. It seems to have earned along with all other employers of the country, perhaps the oppobrium of the Congress of the United States. If there is one dominant note which may be gathered from the entire contents of the bill which your committee has under consideration, it is the false note that employers need to be policed and restrained in their relations with their employees.

This bill sets up a political board. Its members are to be appointed by the President, subject only to the consent of the Senate. They may all be members of organized labor; they may all be employers; or even worse, they may all be men who have earned Government salaries in return for delivering political goods. In this, I am simply giving expression to a sentiment which has been impressed upon me by watching political events over a period of many years. Not only is the board to be political, but its employees likewise are to be political. There is to be no civil service in the administration of this act. The merit required of the employees, attorneys, experts, examiners, regional directors, and what not, is not be reckoned except upon the basis of political expediency or political service. In saying this I am merely taking into consideration the actual language of the bill itself. Any act providing for employment of public officials which places no restrictions upon appointment must be taken as providing for a personnel such as has followed from acts of a similar character.

Having created this political board, the bill goes on to confer upon it certain powers which, to use very mild language, must be considered extremely autocratic. First of all, the board will have authority from time to time to "make, amend, and rescind such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of the act", and these rules and regulations shall be effective upon publication in the manner which the Board shall prescribe. I do not believe the members of this committee are naive enough to doubt that the first effort of this board will be to find many directions in which such broad powers can be exercised. It is the history of boards such as this, that they know no limitations and brook no interference. We will find this simple board of three coming to the Congress, year by year, with increasing demands for appropriations to carry out its far-flung activities and within a short time visitors to the Nation's capital will be pointed out another building filled to overflowing with Government employees engaged in the humanitarian business of keeping the employers of America from violating the four specific inhibitions contained in section 8 of this bill.

Just imagine what a wonderful opportunity there will be for new snooping and prying as the employees of this inquisitorial body go about performing the duties enjoined under section 13 of the act. I ask you in all seriousness, if the honest and conscientious employers of this country, whose name is legion, deserve of the Congress of the United States a measure such as this, which will subject them at all times to inquisitions such as can be conducted under the provisions of this act?

Then again, what about the hearings themselves, where no rules of evidence are to bet taken into account; where hearsay, rumor, or inuendo are to be received and considered on the same basis as statements of fact by witnesses. What about the provision of making a finding of fact based upon such a hearing binding upon a court of law to which the controversy may finally be transferred? What about the power granted to summon a defendant from Maine to California upon a 3-day notice? Surely it is not the intention of the Congress of the United States to crucify all industry because in some instances employers have not dealt fairly with their employees.

It has been said that this bill provides for the rule of the majority and surely that is a good American doctrine. It is, indeed, where opportunity has been given to lay facts before those who are to do the voting. Even in this country I do not think much of the decision of a majority where there has been no honest and free discussion of the issues which are to be decided. In this case, the employer must stand helplessly by, see the paid and expert organizers of labor present their glowing picture of advantages to be gained and then, when but one side of the issue has been presented, abide by the decision of a majority which binds the minority, regardless of its desires. In the language of the resolution of the American Mining Congress, we urge "that the plan of proportionate representation of labor in any industry should be recognized", and that 49 percent, or any other percent of employees should be permitted to do more than simply "present grievances" to their employers. Other spokesmen before your committee have presented this phase of the subject in an able manner. We of the mining industry ask you to give it careful consideration.

Let me conclude by pointing out to this committee the very grave danger of the precedent which may be here established. For years we have heard the complaint of organized labor, that it has been discriminated against politically. It is only within the past few years when abnormal economic conditions brought about an abnormal political sentiment that we have seen organized labor riding the waves of political recognition. The pendulum has swung so far that the small body of men compactly organized in the American Federation of Labor have been able to see realized their dreams of increased membership through their representation that the policy of Government was favorable to their organization. That pendulum may swing backward just as far as it has swung forward. Changing economic and political conditions may bring about the organization of the board, provided in this bill, upon a basis not only not favorable to, but violently opposed to organized labor. Is organized labor ready to accept the implications of such a change in conditions? Is it ready to accept the autocratic domination of a political board such as is provided in this bill, when the personnel of that board may be entirely unfavorable to its ideals? I point this out merely to remind you that you are establishing here a precedent, that you are writing into the law of the land a policy on the relationship between employer and employee, and that this policy is not written for today or tomorrow, but is to have a definite place in the economic and social structure of the Nation for years to come. This bill is not being considered as an emergency measure—it is a bill aimed to determine differences and disputes arising in one of the most intimate relationships existing among our people; it is to be a policy which will change in its administration as conditions change politically and otherwise, and I for one, as an employer and a citizen, don't wish to see such a question raised as a political issue in this country.

I ask you members of this committee, charged with a very grave responsibility, to consider the full consequences for the future as well as for the present of the action which you are asked to take in considering this bill.

May I have Mr. R. C. Allen address you briefly?

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Allen, you may take the stand.

Mr. CALLAHAN. Also, I wish to leave with the committee telegrams received from the industry throughout the country.

The CHAIRMAN. How many of them are there, Mr. Callahan?

Mr. CALLAHAN. Quite a number.

The CHAIRMAN. Several hundred, would you say?

Mr. CALLAHAN. There are probably not that many, but there are 75 perhaps.

The CHAIRMAN. The clerk will take possession of the telegrams. You might put a few of them in the record as typical.

Mr. CALLAHAN. All right. I shall try to select some.

JULIAN D. CONOVER,
Secretary, American Mining Congress,
Washington, D. C.:

We are opposed to the Wagner Labor Relations Act. The powers to be conferred on the proposed National Labor Relations Board exceed what is required to secure fair treatment of labor. Collective bargaining by a bare majority is unfair to those who do not belong to national labor organizations and who do not desire to join such organizations. We believe no person nor committe nor organization has a right to contract for the terms of employment of a third party without the third party's consent. There should be no monopoly of collective bargaining. The bill adopts the false theory that coercion comes only from management. Passage of this law will permit the creation of the greatest political and financial trust ever known.

Washington, D. C.:

The mining industry as a whole, and particularly in this locality, has failed to achieve anything like a return to normal. Relations here between labor and capital here have for the most part been amicable. The passage of the so-called "Wagner bill" could and would only tend to disturb the peaceful relations heretofore obtaining in this district. As it is, few companies are operating and we feel that the passage of the Wagner bill would tend only to incite dissension and distrust between labor and capital, thus retarding the return to normal. We therefore ask that you represent to the committee that the mining industry in New Mexico is opposed to the passage of this bill.

NEW MEXICO CHAPTER AMERICAN MINING CONGRESS,

JULIAN D. CONOVER,
Secretary American Mining Congress,
Washington, D. C.:

The Wagner labor relations bill, if enacted, would be a national economic calamity and an insurmountable obstacle to the return of prosperity. Instead of helping to promote industrial peace, its practical result would surely be further disturbances of conditions, which at the present time are very unsettled, and neither the employee or employer has a feeling of security. The coal industry is now having an exceedingly difficult task in continuing operations, and to be further burdened with the regulations in the Wagner bill would cause additional unrest and expense that will make it almost impossible for many of the mines now operating to continue. The objectionable features which caused the defeat of the old bill have not been eliminated in the new bill. The pending bill gives the majority representatives the exclusive right to represent all of the employees in a unit in collective bargaining, leaving to the minority or the individual only the hope of presenting grievances but without the right to make any bargain about them. Furthermore, it leaves to the proposed Labor Board itself the right of selecting representtives by any method it sees fit, with the proviso that it may have those representatives chosen by secret ballot, but it is not required to do so. The bill does not in express terms impose a closed shop, but it does in express terms authorize it, and its practical application would undoubtedly result in a closed shop. This feature is exceedingly objectionable, as at many operations, including our own, many of the employees object to joining a labor organization and insist that the right of individual representation be retained. The proposed act would practically force the closed shop upon all industry and would cause endless strife in the coal industry in this section of the country. We sincerely hope that you or your representatives will appear before the Senate committee and protest passage of the Wagner labor relations bill by every means at your command.

ously retard the return of a reasonable measure of prosperity. The bill authorizes closed shop, and its practical application would undoubtedly result in closed shop and thereby unquestionably tend to deprive a workman of his constitutional rights and privileges and compel him to pay tribute to others in order to secure employment. The measure imposes heavy penalities on employers for merely discussing with employees the subject of labor organization or for any interference with the activities of paid troublemakers or even of alien and other anti-American agitators or for taking any steps at all to protect themselves against persons attempting to disrupt satisfactory relationships between them and their employees, but does not prohibit representatives of outside unions from enticing or even coercing employees to join their organizations and select such organizations as their representatives for collective bargaining, thus interfering with the employees' freedom of choice both as to union affiliation and selection of representatives. This would be a one-sided law, designed to place the union minority in control without imposing upon it any responsibility whatsoever for its actions, and by placing in the hands of such minority the power to control the action of all others it becomes contrary to the principles of freedom upon which this Government is founded. I am convinced that the passage of this Wagner bill would be a national economic calamity.

Please have our group of metal mines placed on record in vigorous opposition to the so-called "Wagner Labor Relations Bill." Our industry in this field has experienced unusually satisfactory relations between employees and employers for many years past. We have cooperated fully in all governmental programs for recovery and in many instances have assumed substantial losses to do so. Some of our mines have maintained employment at more than 80 percent of normal throughout the depression period and the industry as a whole in this State has maintained employment and pay rolls at from 40 to 60 percent in excess of the extent and amount indicated by production and sales value of ores.

This has been made possible only through sacrifice of capital assets and cash reserves. Market situation of our principal products and prolonged dissipation of our reserves make it increasingly difficult to maintain program we have been following for past several years and additional factors beyond our control such as proposed by Wagner bill cannot fail in our judgment to result in decreased operations. Furthermore, we wish to stress the fact that this industry is meeting constantly increasing competition from production in foreign countries where costs are substantially lower than here and this condition will be intensified to the great loss of American workmen and American producers if the industry in the United States is subjected to the onerous restrictions proposed in this bill. Majority representation provision of bill is an invasion of the right to work and of individual freedom of action. Authority proposed to be given to permanent Labor Relations Board constitutes a dictatorship which men accustomed to the reasonable enjoyment of individual liberty will not permanently endure and which owners of property will endure only until they can employ their capital otherwise. We believe the Wagner bill is a deflationary measure and that its passage will greatly retard recovery in this industry and will complicate and impede operations as long as the bill remains in effect. Eventually you must depend upon industry to overcome the depression and save this country. Then why strangle our one great hope with such vicious and destructive legislation as the Wagner bill seeks. Mr. ALLEN. Cleveland, Ohio.

The CHAIRMAN. And what business are you engaged in?

Mr. ALLEN. I am vice president of Oglebay, Norton & Co.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that a mining company?

Mr. ALLEN. They are engaged in the mining of iron ore in the Lake Superior region and the transportation of the ore down the Lakes, and in the sale of the ore in the trade.

The CHAIRMAN. How many employees have you?

Mr. ALLEN. We employ at the present time about 800 men.

The CHAIRMAN. How many do you employ as a maximum? How many do you have as a maximum number of employees?

Mr. ALLEN. About 2,000 in the mines.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. ALLEN. They are organized in the so-called "company union."

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. ALLEN. And they are organized at each point of production.

The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed.

Mr. ALLEN. We in the Lake Superior region on the iron ranges have never had any labor troubles. In my lifetime there has never been any strike that I know about. The relations between the mining managements and the men have always been cordial and peaceful and direct.

Within the last couple of years, through the so-called "company union", we have merely formalized relations which have always existed in that region.

But—we think in anticipation of the possibility of the legislation here under consideration—determined efforts are now being made to persuade the men engaged in iron mining to joint the American Federation of Labor.

Within recent months a number of the companies have been served with notices by these newly born units of the American Federation of Labor, requesting these companies to recognize them as the sole bargainers for all of the employees. The employees are being importuned to join the American Federation. Impossible promises are being made to them and mispresentations. They are told that the President of the United States desires that they join these units. They say that publicly. They put it on handbills.

The American Federation of Labor is making only one demand at the present time, and that is for recognition of their organization as the sole bargaining agency in that region. Our communities are being split. Social discord is being fomented, and we have there in that region today a condition that has never before existed.

Now, this condition is not something which arises in the natural order of things in that region. These organizers do not live there. They are not known. They come from some other part of the country. They tell our men the troubles which they have, which they themselves have never thought about.

We have not had any trouble throughout the depression. We have spread the work as far as it was possible to do so. We are paying the wages that we paid in 1929. Our working conditions are not subject to fair criticisms, and the living conditions and the social conditions surrounding our operations are not subject to fair criticism and have not been criticized.

I am not here to suggest amendments to this bill. We are opposed to the bill in toto for all of the reasons which Senator Callahan has advanced, and for a number of others to which I would like to speak.

We are opposed to this bill and all legislation of this kind because it drives a wedge between the management and the men.

One cannot get results in production by putting the responsibility in one place and the authority in another place. Mining is a hazardous business. The safety of the men is the responsibility of the management. You cannot protect the works; you cannot protect the lives and the health of these men unless there be discipline in the organization, and there is no discipline in an organization where the authority, as well as the responsibility, does not reside in the management.

If this legislation is passed, we shall have immediate trouble and continued chaos in a region in which for at least 40 years there has been peace and good relations between the management and the men.

We oppose this bill also because if the plans of the proponents of the bill materialize, then we shall have a universal organization of labor under the leadership of the American Federation, or some similar organization, which, in our opinion, is merely the organization of society against itself, an exploitation, if you please, of one element of the population by another organized element of the same population.

We oppose this bill because it will strengthen the hands of the great integrated concern against small concerns. The only advantage which the small concern has today is in the close contact between the management and the men, the increased efficiency, if you please. If you standardize everything, as this bill would do—wages, hours, working conditions, and so on all down the line—and put all industry under uniform regulations and hours, you deprive the small industry of the only advantage it possesses today, of the only means it has of existing today—that is, you deprive it of its greater efficiency. That alone preserves it now. Take that away and it is gone.

We believe in the principle of collective bargaining. By that we mean bargaining by the management with its men, not bargaining with the employees and some other organization, or with the officers of some union who have no other connection whatsoever with the concern with which the bargaining is to be done.

Our system of bargaining is working well. So far as we know, our men do not wish to change it.

I want to say that I am not just speaking for our men. I am only giving you my opinion about that.

Every conceivable thing which concerns the men and the management is brought out, considered, and decided amicably, justly, and fairly. That is the record down to date. But if this bill is passed or any similar legislation, that sort of thing will disappear in the Lake Superior region. We do not like to contemplate it. We hope very much that the bill will not pass and it will be reported upon unfavorably by your committee.

I thank you.

The CHAIRMAN. We will next hear from Mr. McAuliffe. You will try and be as brief as possible, will you, as I have to go to the Senate.

Mr. MCAULIFFE. I question whether it can be read by anybody except myself. It was written by myself hurriedly, and I did not have time to copy it, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well.

Mr. MCAULIFFE. Speaking from the standpoint of one who has maintained close relations with labor and labor organizations as an employee, and as a member of a labor organization, as well as that of employer of labor, for nearly half of a century, I find myself unable to support S. 1958, commonly referred to as "The Wagner Labor Disputes Bill."

My opposition to the bill is due to the belief that it cannot be successfully administered under any form of government short of a military dictatorship (in which case an order or series of orders emanating from a bureau or a commissioner would serve the purpose of the proposed act), that purports to base its findings upon fact and equity.

The bill supposes an exercise of control over all industry. The Nation passed through one such futile, however well meant, experiment, when it undertook to prescribe and make uniform, the personal habits of some 120,000,000 people. I refer to the lamentable failure to enforce the prohibition act, an experiment that cost our people millions of dollars, and thousands of lives; and what was more deplorable, a large part of our population, during the experimental period, developed the belief that all law and all morality could be flouted with impunity. It is axiomatic that a law that is not acceptable to the mass cannot be successfully administered or enforced.

Another and more recent effort to regulate all industry, based on the desire to ameliorate the problems of labor, has suffered, with milder effects, the same character of failure. I refer here to the attempt to codify, regulate, and govern all industry through the National Recovery Administration. This plan to improve industry and make it possible to pay living wages where semistarvation and privation on the part of labor did in some cases undeniably exist, failed to a large extent because of certain fundamental defects, among which I might mention:

It attempted to take in too much territory.

It attempted to apply the same rules to a small business that it did to the largest. In the one instance, perhaps 90 percent of the project was made up of labor, 10 percent other elements. In the other case, 40 percent might be labor and 60 percent capital charges, taxes, sales expense, and so forth.

In establishing rules—made overnight—it was not humanly possible to meet thousands upon thousands of varying conditions, so from necessity blanket rules were made and revolt occurred.

It failed to recognize the fact that much of our national growth was foundationed upon certain local situations, where the conditions as regards cost of raw material, cost of living and consequent cost of labor enabled the business to grow and survive.

It failed to give due weight to the selfishness of humanity, and last but not least it suffered from lack of a constitutional background.

I feel definitely that Senate 1958 will travel the same road, and no betterment will come to labor from it. Much good has come to labor from the approximately 550 codes established under the N. R. A., and there is no legislation now before Congress for consideration, that embraces more of hope and aspiration than did the National Recovery Act. I continuously urge that the way we have traveled for 2 years be improved and strengthened rather than that we blaze a new trail.

Speaking more specifically to the certain features of the bill that in my opinion carry the seeds of failure, I would suggest that it is a partisan measure intended to extend the privileges of labor without attaching any corresponding degree of responsibility. Labor can appeal to the law for redress and while the findings of the Labor Board are made mandatory on the employer, the employees (sec. 12, p. c) cannot be compelled to accept same. The act (sec. 15) actually provides that it shall not be so construed as to restrict the right to strike. I submit that if legal supervision is to be extended to the employees' rights, then similar protection to continue operation under the award made should be afforded the employer. The act attempts to base a most sweeping form of labor dictatorship upon a law which depends upon the theory that (sec. 1) "the free flow of commerce" will be served by according extraordinary and unilateral rights on labor by legislative enactment, and which disregard entirely the fact that the age-old law of supply and demand will always determine the flow of commerce. The act also attempts to establish certain rights of labor without defining what constitutes labor, except in the most general terms (sec. 3).

The CHAIRMAN. Will you suspend for a moment?

Will all of those in the room who desire to be heard today stand up? Who are the men representing the newspapers?

Mr. HANSON. Elisha Hanson, representing the American Newspaper Publishers Association.

Mr. KELLY. Harvey J. Kelly, also representing the American Newspaper Publishers Association.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Hanson and Mr. Kelly.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. I desire to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Cartwright, whom do you represent?
Mr. CARTWRIGHT. The Oklahoma Pipeline Co.
The CHAIRMAN. And this gentleman with you represents whom?
Mr. WHITEHEAD. The Carter Oil Co.
The CHAIRMAN. And who else?
Mr. TITUS. Louis Titus; I represent the petroleum industry.
The CHAIRMAN. You are in opposition to this bill?
Mr. TITUS. Yes, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. There are a number of others in addition to the representatives of the American Federation of Labor. We will have to ask you to suspend and come back at 2:30 this afternoon.
(Whereupon, at 12 noon, a recess was taken until 2:30 p. m. of the same day.)

AFTER RECESS

(The committee reconvened at 2:30 p. m., pursuant to the taking of recess at noon.)
Present: Senators Walsh (chairman) and Murray.
And also: Senator Wagner.
Senator WAGNER. In order to save a little time, Senator Walsh has asked me if I would proceed with the hearing.
Is Mr. Lederer present? (No response.)
Mr. MCAULIFFE. Senator, I had not finished.
The CHAIRMAN. You have not finished your statement?
Mr. MCAULIFFE. No, sir. I stopped about half-way

STATEMENT OF EUGENE McAULIFFE—Resumed

Senator WAGNER. Suppose you continue, Mr. McAuliffe.
Mr. MCAULIFFE. Another and a common weakness of the act lies in the fact that the consumer of the product of the mill, factory, or mine subject to the law, he who pays the bills, is accorded no rights toward a continuing supply of the material or product involved in the controversy; the repudiation of a legal award, sanctioned under the act, damaging not alone the employer but the consumer, who had no place in the proceedings.
Your honorable committee must be well aware of the fact that a large percentage of the labor troubles and strikes which occur are over matters of no concern to the employer, wholly relating to questions of union jurisdiction, many of these cases brought about by the most flagrant forms of racketeering, with murder not an uncommon byproduct.
The act starts too far up the union-labor line to prove successful. I hold that labor should have the freest right to organize for its protection and welfare, but I am one of those who believe that the wholesale unionization of all labor accomplished overnight will only lead to the destruction of the theory of labor organization. I have in mind a labor organization that never attempted the closed shop, content to win membership by a continuous though conservative process of securing improved wages and working conditions; the man who elected to stay without given the same rates of pay and working conditions as his neighbor. That organization made consistent progress until a swollen membership list and a heavy accumulation of cash collected, led it into a series of speculative orgies that equaled in a way any of the flatuant get-rich schemes in 1928 and 1929.

This union established banks, it went into the coal-mining business, flouting and refusing to deal with the United Mine Workers of America, it sunk millions in the Florida land boom, with the result that every enterprise it went into went broke and some of its principals were found guilty and sentenced by the courts. Among the other forms of wreckage resulting from the arrogant labor leadership employed, was the destruction of millions of life insurance held by its members. I have never found that laboring men, even labor officials, possessed either all the virtues or all the frailties of mankind. We are all pretty much alike, and no class should be accorded the absolute backing of the law unless full provision for good conduct is exacted in return.

I am not prepared to yield control of the destinies of labor minorities to an alleged majority. Time and time again so-called "majorities" have proven to be the work of a few aggressive, semicriminal individuals, who by sheer dishonesty and ruthlessness overrode all labor-made laws and regulation.

Section 10, page c, provides that "the rules of evidence prevailing in courts of law or equity shall not be controlling." This provision can only be construed as leaving the way open for partisan and arbitrary control of hearings, expediency to override justice. It is my humble opinion that a case which is not settled right does not stay settled. There doubtless are too many technicalities in many of our court proceedings, but some regularity must be exercised, if not the door is left wide open to civil court proceedings and before we know it the courts will be clogged with labor dispute cases.

I do not like even the theory of the bill as one friendly to organized labor. I would like to save labor from its destructive results. There is room for betterment in labor relationshps, but changes, if they are to be permanent, must be approached carefully. Revolution is destructive, and to put the force and power of the Federal Government behind labor, without at the same time attaching restrictive provisions, would prove suicidal to labor. Only a small faction of the world are safe with power. I would rather incline to the encouragement of labor and capable labor leadership, by giving them a foundation of positive governmental fact-finding upon which to build up theories of human betterment, buttressed with the immediate support of laws, fixing in general terms minimum wages and maximum hours of work. Given the full facts as to wages, hours of work, and so forth, and costs, realization, profit or loss pertaining to the major industries, with a wholly detached and impartial commission to interpret and publicize the facts, the public opinion that makes and unmakes governments will provide deserved betterment for the underprivileged.

No law can be successfully enforced that attempts to put all labor, even in one line of service, on the same earning basis. There are too many small industries to warrant belief in success. Again I will venture the opinion that of the unemployed that exist today, not less than one-fourth of the number are in a way unfit. They cannot earn a full day's wage in a highly competitive world, and their services and their support can only be cared for by individual and flexible labor relationship.

That is all, Senator. Thank you, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you, Senator Wagner, for your assistance.

Senator WAGNER. This was a witness that had not finished his statement this morning.

The CHAIRMAN. The two newspapermen that are here will come forward, please, Mr. Hanson and Mr. Kelly.

STATEMENT OF ELISHA HANSON, ATTORNEY REPRESENTING AMERICAN NEWSPAPER PUBLISHERS' ASSOCIATION

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Hanson, please give us your full name.

Mr. HANSON. Elisha Hanson.

The CHAIRMAN. And you are an attorney representing the American Newspaper Publishers' Association?

Mr. HANSON. Yes; I am an attorney representing the American Newspaper Publishers' Association. That is an organization which has within its members more than 400 publishers of daily newspapers in the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. HANSON. They represent about 80 percent of the total circulation of daily newspapers, that total circulation being above 35,000,000 copies per day. They use more than 80 percent of the total newsprint paper which is consumed in this country, and they employ approximately 80 percent of the total number of employees, and they run into hundreds of thousands.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there labor organizations among the newspaper employees?

Mr. HANSON. There are. There are a great many labor organizations. We have four organizations in our mechanical department. We have the pressmen's union, we have the typographical union, we have the stereotypers union, and the photo-engravers union. We have the truck-drivers union. The newspaper truck drivers have their own union. And there is the mailers union and the paper handlers union. And I think the American Newspaper Publishers' Association was the first national organization of business men to enter into arbitration agreements on a national scale with organized labor. Those agreements run back to 1901, and I believe are the longest that have been in existence since that period.

I do not wish to take up very much of your time, as Mr. Kelly, who is the chairman of our special standing committee which has relations with labor, is to follow me, and unfortunately I have to leave the city in a very few minutes to keep an engagement which I could not cancel.

I do want to call to your attention certain things. The newspaper business is essentially a local business. The paper in New York is not affected by the newspaper in Philadelphia. The newspaper in Philadelphia is not affected by the territory in Baltimore. And there is very little competition between cities even as close as Baltimore and Washington, either for circulation or advertising, or for what have you.

The nature of the business requires steady employment, even in the most abnormal times, when other businesses or industries are able to close down, the newspaper, by the very nature of its business, has to keep running, because when a newspaper plant shuts down it is out of business, and, as Mr. Kelly will point out, the result of that system has been, during this present depression, that the rate of employment and rate of pay in the newspaper business has been maintained at a far higher scale than any other business relatively in the country. In fact, the greater our depression, the greater burden on the publisher, who has to continue because the revenue is decreased and the burden is greater than in normal times.

The newspaper has two sources of revenue, generally speaking; one is circulation and the other advertising. And because of policies which have been in effect in this country for a great many years, circulation revenues are wholly incapable of paying the cost and expense of publication and distribution of the newspapers.

The association which we represent has examined this bill and it is sorry that it cannot give it its support. If it gives it its support, we probably would not be here today.

Unless there are some questions you have of me, I will ask Mr. Kelly to tell you why the association opposes it.

The CHAIRMAN. You may be excused, Mr. Hanson.

STATEMENT OF HARVEY J. KELLY, REPRESENTING THE AMERICAN NEWSPAPER PUBLISHERS ASSOCIATION; ALSO CHAIRMAN OF THE INDUSTRIAL BOARD

The CHAIRMAN. Your full name is Harvey J. Kelly?

Mr. KELLY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Representing the American Newspaper Publishers Association?

Mr. KELLY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And you are chairman of the industrial board?

Mr. KELLY. I am chairman of the special standing committee of the American Newspaper Publishers Association and also chairman of the newspaper industrial board. However, I am appearing solely for the American Newspaper Publishers Association.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well. You may make your statement.

Mr. KELLY. I am appearing before you for the purpose of presenting facts concerning S. 1958, Wagner bill, and its effect upon industrial relations of the newspaper publishing business, so that your decision, when reached, shall be in the light of all the facts and not in the light of a part of them only.

The function of the special standing committee of the A. N. P. A. is to deal with all industrial relations problems of the business arising from contracts or negotiations with union labor. Its three members are the publisher representatives on what is known as the "international arbitration board", a bipartisan board, which has functioned by mutual agreement between the publishers and the unions of the printing trades since 1901. It aptly has been called the "supreme court of industrial relations" in the newspaper publishing business. It is a board of review. Local arbitration boards pass upon disputes in the first instance, under procedure developed by publishers and the printing trades unions in 34 years of industrial relations experience within the business.

Wages rates are high in this business. Average hourly earnings of workers employed by newspapers stand at the top of the list, as may be observed in the National Industrial Conference Board service letter for February or preceding months. The January 1935 earnings of news and magazine workers averaged, for unskilled labor, 50.7 cents per hour; skilled labor, 96.4 cents per hour; against an average for workers in all manufacturing establishments of 49 cents per hour for unskilled labor, and 65.6 cents per hour for skilled labor. Special standing committee data corroborates the National Industrial Conference Board data. It shows an average for all printing trades employed by newspapers of 97.1 cents per hour; skilled news department workers average $1.10 per hour; unskilled, 49.8 cents per hour.

Unemployment has been less among newspaper workers than in other businesses. The employment and pay-roll data of the United States Bureau of Labor Statistics shows that employment and pay rolls in the newspaper and periodical publishing business receded from peak levels only half the recession which was recorded for employment and pay rolls of all manufacturing business.

It might be well to mention also that the character of unionization in the newspaper publishing business is craft unions. There are to my knowledge no plant unions, or owner or rather employer unions within the industry or our business.

It was testified by the spokesman for the Allied Printing Trades Association during the public code hearings that the average wage reduction for all printing trades averaged but 10 percent from the peak, as a consequence of the depression. All of which, it seems, indicates that equality of bargaining power is well developed in the newspaper publishing business.

The alleged purpose of S. 1058 is to effect "equality of bargaining power between employers and employees," but it is silent as to equality of responsibility. We oppose the bill because the methods proposed would precipitate absolute inequality. It would take away contract rights of publishers and leave them exposed to restrictive and costly ex parte laws, rules, and regulations of unions on the one hand, and the inequalities of this bill on the other.

Employers under the bill would have no voice in the matter of their relationship with employees. They would be gagged, handcuffed, and made subservient to a politically appointed board of three, whose findings of fact, limited by the terms of the measure to isues raised by employees only, cannot, under the terms of the measure, be reviewed by the courts.

The bill removes organized labor from the jurisdiction of the courts; it provides that an arbitration award may be entered as a judgment against an employer, but legalizes and thereby encourages ex parte repudiation by labor of arbitration awards; it specifically reserves to labor the right to strike if it chooses without submitting differences to arbitration, or if it disagrees with an arbitration award resulting from an agreement into which it has entered.

There are on file in the office of the special standing committee, 534 contracts between members of the A. N. P. A. and printing trades unions. Of these contracts, 268 provide for arbitration of the terms of the next contract in accordance with the arbitration procedure of the newspaper publishing business.

Under the act the National Labor Relations Board now set up by Executive order of the President for the period of the Recovery Act is made permanent (sec. 3).

The Board is given unrestricted authority to promulgate rules and regulations for its work (sec. 6).

The Board is given superior jurisdiction over all boards and agencies "such as have been or may hereafter be established by agreement, code, or law to deal with labor disputes" (sec. 6 b, 10 a, 10 b).

This provision would violate the agreement between the President of the United States and the daily newspaper publishers who have assented to the Code for the Daily Newspaper Publishing Business. The code as approved by the President expressly provides that it cannot be modified in such a way as to affect any individual publisher assenting to it in the absence of consent by that publisher to such modification. The code contains a complete method for the determination of labor controversies arising thereunder and this method in turn is based upon more than three decades of experience in the adjudication of such controversies within the business itself and wholly free from outside political interference.

Further, these provisions just referred to as well as other provisions of the bill, particularly 12 c, would nullify 268 existing arbitration agreements mutually entered into by publishers and unions of the printing trades. Into the discard would go rulings and precedent established in 34 years of arbitration by mutual agreement. These decisions and rulings were in many instances by a six-man bipartisan board whose members knew the problems of this particular business. In event of deadlock, a seventh and impartial member cast the deciding vote, after being fully advised on both sides of the question by the respective partisan members.

Experience has shown that where the members of a bipartisan board are unable to agree upon a solution of their problem they have always been able to find an impartial man mutually satisfactory and without exception both sides have accepted his award and abided by it.

There is no occasion at this time to enact legislation which in this particular business could serve only to upset such a system and make it possible for the employees who submit their case to arbitration to evade and void the results of such an arbitration, if not pleased with the results, while binding the employer to abide by it or ignore it at his peril.

The rights and obligations of employers and unions in the various cases are clearly defined in these arbitration agreements, but if S. 1958 becomes a law, any union under section 12 c, can nullify any ruling it chooses by exercising its right to reject an arbitration award. The employer meanwhile would be bound by all previous rulings and by such additional rulings as a politically appointed board, unfamiliar perhaps with the industry, might see fit to impose.

Other features of this measure which combine to nullify existing arbitration contracts in the newspaper publishing business are:

Definition no. 7:

> The term "affecting commerce" means in commerce, or burdening or affecting commerce, or obstructing the free flow of commerce, or having led or tending to lead to a labor dispute that might burden or affect commerce or obstruct the free flow of commerce.

Definition no. 9:

The term "labor dispute" includes any controversy concerning terms, tenure, or conditions of employment, or concerning the association or representation of persons in negotiating, fixing, maintaining, changing, or seeking to arrange terms or conditions of employment, regardless of whether the disputants stand in the proximate relation of employer and employee.

Under this measure now before you the National Labor Relations Board is empowered to prevent any person from engaging in any unfair labor practice affecting commerce as defined in section 8 of the bill.

The only unfair practices defined in section 8 are practices of employers. The section as a whole reads—I know you are familar with the section and I will not take the time of the committee to read section 8.

The Board is authorized to enforce the majority rule for the entire unit of the industry, a craft unit, a plant unit, or other unit (sec. 9a, 9b).

The practical effect of this provision is that if 51 percent of the employers of "the employer unit, craft unit, plant unit, or other unit", as the Board may decide, votes to affiliate with a designated union, that union may enforce a closed-shop contract under which the remaining 49 percent of employees who may desire not to affiliate with that particular union or any union will be coerced into union membership.

Senator WAGNER. Mr. Kelly, would you prefer to finish your statement before my asking any questions? If you would, I won't interrupt you.

Mr. KELLY. If it is all the same to you, I would; otherwise you may interrupt.

Senator WAGNER. Whatever you may wish.

Mr. KELLY. I will go through, if it is all the same to you.

There is nothing in this bill which would require a union failing to obtain a majority in an election, to abide by the result of that election and cease its efforts to enforce its wishes upon both the employees who have rejected its program and the employer. The measure can be construed as nothing more nor less than an incitement to agitate and keep industry and business in a turmoil until the unions have attained their objective. This, notwithstanding the guarantees of section 7 (a) N. I. R. A. and the proviso of section 9a of this bill reading:

Provided, That any individual employees or group of employees shall have the right at any time to present grievances to their employer through representatives of their own choosing.

Under a closed-shop contract the union and the employer are the contracting parties. An individual or minority group has no standing under a closed-shop contract. The union officers or duly elected or appointed committees are the accredited representatives of the union. Section 9–a specifically accords to the majority the exclusive right to represent all the employees in collective bargaining in respect to "rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, or other conditions of employment." What else is there for a minority group or an individual to talk about? The proviso is meaningless.

The occurrence of recent months in Cleveland, Ohio, will suffice to illustrate how little unions will regard the rights of individual employees or minority groups of employees to present grievances to their employer.

Nineteen employees of the circulation department of the Cleveland Plain Dealer joined the International Teamsters, Chauffeurs' and Stablemen's Union. A contract in existence between the union and the Cleveland Plain Dealer provides specifically that union membership is not a condition of employment. The 19 employees, being outvoted—concerning the terms of a contract—by a majority of members of the union not employed by the Plain Dealer, withdrew from the union and evidenced a desire to deal directly with the Plain Dealer. Subsequently a mob of some 200 men, led by officers of the union, congregated at the Plain Dealer plant and stopped the delivery of newspapers until these men paid their dues.

In section 13 of the measure the Board is authorized to send its employees and agents on "fishing" expeditions into employers' plants and employers refusing to give up whatever the Board demands are made subject to penalties.

Those penalties may be fines up to $5,000 or imprisonment up to 1 year or both.

There is nothing in the act to require unions to account for the huge sums collected from workers.

The objective of these so-called "investigatory powers" is to enable representatives of organized labor to get, among other things, an employer's financial statement. Assume it is secured and shows a profit, is the National Labor Relations Board as contemplated by this bill then to determine what should be the proper apportionment in wages as between, say, a floor sweeper and a skilled mechanic and a foreman? It is to determine the proper apportionment as between so-called labor and capital? Since Hammurabi the Assyrian and his industrial code, more than 40 centuries ago, men have been unable to agree on that with all of its ramifications of risk, reasonable return, relative skill and worth of labor, management and other factors.

In the newspaper business the International Arbitration Board rule in 34 years of experience is that books of account may not be required in evidence by an arbitration board unless the publisher pleads inability to pay. Union representatives in arbitration which concerns papers, known to be losing money, have testified eloquently that they are not interested in earnings or losses of the employer; that all that matters is the reasonable value of the union man's service as measured by wage rates of other concerns.

In practical application this "investigatory power" (if this bill becomes a law) will result, so far as newspapers are concerned, in pushing over the brink of bankruptcy those papers which are in a financially weakened condition. Competitors and competing mediums, to say nothing of advertisers intent on endorsing lower rates regardless of results, will put on the finishing touches and more sources of legitimate employment will dry up.

The Board provided in S. 1958 is authorized to conduct proceedings without regard to the rules of evidence prevailing in courts of law or equity, and may delegate the conduct of those proceedings to a single member of the Board or a designated agent or agency.

The Board is further authorized to determine a complaint upon the report of its agent or agents without the requirement of taking further testimony or hearing argument. If in the opinion of the Board any person named in the complaint has engaged or is engaging in an unfair labor practice, then the Board is authorized to issue orders.

The facts on which these orders are issued are not subject to review by the courts. The Board may at any time, until a transcript of the record in a case shall have been filed in a court, give "reasonable notice" and in such manner as it shall deem proper modify or set aside, in whole or in part, any finding or order made or issued by it.

No objection not urged before the Board can be considered by the courts unless the failure or neglect to urge such objection is ex-excused "because of extraordinary circumstances.

While any person aggrieved by an order of the Board may obtain a review in any circuit court of appeals wherein the practice was alleged to have been engaged in or where such person resides or transacts business, these facts limit the court's power to review:

(a) No employee individually and no group of employees collectively shall be compelled to render labor services without consent.

(b) Nothing in the bill shall be construed so as to interfere with or impede or diminish in any way the right to strike.

(c) There is no provision in the bill, defining any act of an employee or a group of employees as an unfair labor practice.

(d) Employers have no right to bring complaints.

(e) Employers are bound by the Board's action against them, whereas employees are not.

(f) If the Board had any evidence on which to base an order, irrespective of the rule or preponderance, the court cannot review it.

All of which constitute unfair and one-sided legislation, which amounts, in practical application, to a labor dictatorship.

Declaring its purpose "to promote equality of bargaining power between employers and employees," the measure, if enacted, would forever remove any prestige of equality insofar as employers are concerned.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you have some questions, Senator Wagner?

Senator WAGNER. Mr. Kelly, I understood you to say that in your newspapers now that the large percentage, the majority of your employees today, are in unions.

Mr. KELLY. I think you misunderstood me, Senator, because I made no such statement.

Senator WAGNER. You did not.

Mr. KELLY. The majority of newspaper employees are not in unions. You are talking now of total employees, are you not, total number of employees?

Senator WAGNER. Yes.

Mr. KELLY. I should say between 5 and 10 percent are organized. Now, you understand, I am differentiating between the mechanical departments.

Senator WAGNER. Oh, no; I am speaking of the whole, including the printers and mailers.

Mr. KELLY. Are you confining it? If you confine it to the mechanical departments, printers, mailers, stereotypers, photo-engravers, pressmen, then I should say 80 percent at least are organized.

Senator WAGNER. Yes.

Mr. KELLY. But those departments do not represent more than 10 percent of the total number of employees in the newspaper publishing business.

Senator WAGNER. As to that 10 percent, have you had the experience that you are stating is going to happen here if the workers are given the rights as set up under this legislation?

Mr. KELLY. Why, this is entirely different from our set-up, Senator.

Senator WAGNER. You are dealing with labor organizations though, are you not?

Mr. KELLY. Oh, yes. We are dealing with approximately 50,000 members of organized labor in the mechanical department.

Senator WAGNER. Do you think if this bill is passed, that that relationship will be disturbed of these labor organizations and yourself?

Mr. KELLY. I am positive of it.

Senator WAGNER. Why?

Mr. KELLY. Based on my experience, for the reason that this Board as contemplated in the act supersedes and takes superior jurisdiction over the International Arbitration Board, which has functioned in the industry by mutual agreement for more than three decades.

Senator WAGNER. Of course, Mr. Kelly, this Board only deals with unfair labor practices, which are here enumerated and, after all, if you are actually dealing with a union, recognizing their representatives as the representatives of the worker, I cannot see how this particular legislation affects you at all.

Mr. KELLY. For instance, under definitions numbers 7 and 9 and, of course, you will understand that my remarks are not to be construed as antagonism toward organized labor as such, because I am dealing with them all of the time——

The CHAIRMAN. Anything further?

Senator WAGNER. I would so interpret them, Mr. Kelly. That is why I was anxious to inquire along this line.

Mr. KELLY. I am about to make some statements which are statements of experience and observation.

Senator WAGNER. Yes, sir.

Mr. KELLY. And not antagonisms, because, as I say, I have been dealing with printing trade unions for some 15 years, and number among them some warm friends. But that does not mean we do not criticize each other as to the newspaper's shortcomings.

Senator WAGNER. Oh, no.

Mr. KELLY. From that experience, I should say that when it would be advantageous to do so, union representatives who are opportunistic and alert to every advantage could, under the definitions of 7 and 9, hold that the dispute was threatening to affect commerce because a strike might grow out of the dispute.

Senator WAGNER. Yes, sir; but what—go ahead. It is irrelevant.

Mr. KELLY. Under sections 10a and b they could set up the superior jurisdiction of the National Labor Relations Board over the Board that has functioned so long in the newspaper publishing industry. Once establishing that the Board did have jurisdiction over a particular dispute, the union would be absolved from obeying the arbitration award, unless it was satisfactory, and therein it would differ from our arbitration machinery, in which a violation of an award is the rare exception, not the rule, and it seldom happens. Senator, if you will pardon, let me finish the thought. It seldom happens when an arbitration is due that both parties are ready to go into arbitration, or that both parties want arbitration. It so happens that one side or the other is satisfied with an award. There is nothing to prevent any union printing trades that desire avoiding its arbitration obligation from getting it before the National Labor Relations Board.

Senator WAGNER. Mr. Kelly, it does not deal at all with questions of wages or hours of employment unless it is submitted to them as arbitrators. In that case the arbitration is as a matter of agreement, and both sides agreed to submit it to arbitration, and agreed to abide by that arbiration.

And let me go a step further. You agree to that, do you not, in the legislation?

Mr. KELLY. As far as you have gone I agree with you.

Senator WAGNER. And when a judgment is rendered by those arbitrators it has the same effect as a judgment in the courts of law, and both sides are bound by that judgment.

Mr. KELLY. I fail to read that in the bill, Senator. How do you reconcile that statement with section 12 (c)?

Senator WAGNER. The right to strike?

Mr. KELLY. No. It goes ahead and sets up—I will read you section 12 (c). This is what I construe as tying the employer in making an award, a judgment against an employer, but not against labor:

> In any case in which an award has been made, the Board shall file the award in the clerk's office of the United States district court that has been agreed upon by the parties, or, in default of such agreement, that of the district wherein the labor dispute arose or the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia. Notice of the filing shall be personally served or sent by registered mail to each submitting party. Unless a petition to impeach the award on the grounds hereinafter set forth shall be filed in the clerk's office of the court in which the award has been filed, the court shall enter judgment in accordance with the terms of the award—— and here, Senator, I claim is the joker:

> Provided, That no employee individually, and no group of employees collectively, shall be compelled to render labor or services without their consent.

Senator WAGNER. Of course, that is about in every statute that I have ever seen. We cannot have servitude in this country. We cannot take a man by the neck and say, "You go in there and work." If that is what you have reference to I misunderstood you.

Mr. KELLY. Of course, there is the idea that perhaps we view the thing differently.

Senator WAGNER. I think we do, but that has been accepted so generally I did not think you and I would have any controversy about it.

Mr. KELLY. I think it is highly unfair because it taxes the employer definitely by statutory and by penalty, and encourages, if you please, a run-out on an arbitration award on the part of employees.

Senator WAGNER. That is getting into an entirely different controversy. Let me ask you this, Mr. Kelly. Did you send out to the members of your association a pamphlet giving the members a sort of an instruction as to how to deal with representatives of the guild if they should desire to want collective bargaining?

Mr. KELLY. I am sending out communications to members of the A. N. P. A. all of the time. I would like to see the document. If you have a copy I would be glad to identify it as to whether I sent it out.

Senator WAGNER. No; but my attention was called to a hearing—I think it was in Boston—in which it was disclosed that such a document had been sent out in which members of your association were advised as to how to deal with representatives.

Mr. KELLY. That is rather a broad and comprehensive term. As chairman of the special standing committee my duty is to advise members as to their rights and obligations under contracts where they might assume and in the manner in which a lawyer would advise his clients. We are continually sending out advice where such-and-such a measure is not good for you. Do not accept it unless it is modified, thus and so. I might say that as to any such document as may have been sent out, and I have no doubt that it may have been sent out, and I have no doubt that it was sent out, I would want to identify it before I would admit it, so I would know it was a document from our association.

I am neither admitting nor denying the document you have reference to unless I could see it and identify it. But you will understand that all of the unions are continually sending out advice to local unions as to what they should compel the employer to do.

Senator WAGNER. I did not complain about it, except I was curious, and if you have it with you I would like to see it very much.

Mr. KELLY. If I had all the things I sent out, Senator, there would be a stack that high [indicating].

Senator WAGNER. You do advise them as to how to deal with the representatives of the guild in case they approach the employers?

Mr. KELLY. I do not know as I would want to go as far as saying I advise them how to deal with them. We advise our members under section 7 (a) they must meet and bargain collectively with the chosen representatives of their employees regardless of what department they may come from.

Now, if there is a question of some contract phraseology, such as for instance the contracts which were recommended by the guild at its convention, why, certainly we would analyze that and advise the publishers that they should be on guard against getting into a contract.

Senator WAGNER. Be on guard against what?

Mr. KELLY. We would advise them as to that. Whenever matters of that nature would come to our attention we would analyze them and advise them as to what to guard against in a contract. There is no question about that. There is no secret about it.

By the way, Senator, let me explain that I have heard that referred to numerous times as a secret communication. Now, it is not a secret communication. It is merely a communication that presumably is confined to members of the A. N. P. A., the people who pay my salary.

Senator WAGNER. You earn it. You said something there about a closed shop—that a majority would force upon an employer a closed-shop agreement, I think you said. Now, a closed shop, of course, cannot be effective unless it is a matter of agreement.

Mr. KELLY. There are various ways of getting an agreement, Senator, in dealing with organized labor, as you are very well aware. Take, for instance, with a newspaper.

Senator WAGNER. I am not aware, because as long as you brought up that subject I do not look upon the American worker as a sort of an outlaw.

Mr. KELLY. Neither do I.

Senator WAGNER. All these things that I have heard here—the danger of giving the American workers some right, such as to elect his representatives, and all of that, I have been a little bit chagrined to hear that, because after all the American worker is the backbone of our Nation. When we were in trouble, fighting to save democracy—as we thought, at least—we sent him to the front and others stayed here.

Mr. KELLY. I was with them.

Senator WAGNER. Yes; of course. They went to the front. And they were ready to make the supreme sacrifice to save this country.

They are men of blood, just as you and I. They have aspirations. They have hopes. They want to preserve this country for their children.

As to this idea, if we give them the right to organize together they are going to do something to destroy industry and destroy our country; it just hurts my feelings a little bit, because I have a higher regard for them. And we are told here, why, what that majority is going to do to industry. And what they are also going to do to the minority, as if they were going to crush industry and crush the minority. I think in most cases they are fair-minded men of independent stock. They want to do the right thing. They want to be treated fairly.

I think, so far as this legislation reflects their aspirations, it is simply that desire to be dealt with justly, and that they want the freedom of contract which, under our theory of government, they are supposed to have as citizens. And in bargaining for their services, it seems to me, in order to have any kind of bargaining power they have got to organize in a large plant. I am not speaking of a small plant. It seems to me they have got to organize in order that they may be on an equality of bargaining power. And I am sure you and I agree, Mr. Kelly, on this—that if you or I are one of 5,000 workers in a plant, and we attempted to bargain individually for our services, particularly in times like these, that we are not on a bargaining equality with our employer, and if he desired to—in the majority of cases that would not probably apply—take advantage of us, either one of us, he could say, "Now, you either have to do this or you do not work at all." I have either got to work or starve. But if those 5,000 men are permitted to organize, and then they present through their representatives their claims, they are at least—not altogether—but they approach bargaining equality.

And I should think that that is a right they are entitled to as Americans, and I am sometimes puzzled at the attitude here, frankly.

Mr. KELLY. Senator, since you brought up the subject, I want to say that you are in my opinion looking at the idealistic side to a greater degree than to the practical side.

Senator WAGNER. That may be.

Mr. KELLY. If you will permit me to go along that line very briefly, I realize I am taking a lot of time of the committee, and I do not want to take a lot of time getting off on extraneous subjects arguing on a subject which we could not agree on after arguing all day.

Senator WAGNER. I think we could.

Mr. KELLY. Now, I think organized labor as such is everything you have said it is. But go back over a record of organized labor. Has it demonstrated and used leadership? Has it used superior vision? Has it shown a judicial balance on economic and social problems? Has it furnished those ranks of racketeers, intimidation, and graft? Has it demonstrated an ability to control its followers as to be able to eradicate lawless acts? You understand, it is afflicted by the same frailities of human nature which every other group is afflicted with. But, having demonstrated no better qualifications along that line, why should it be trusted with an authority and a power which would not be given to any other group?

I say, regardless of how meritorious these men are, there would be abuses which would far offset the dream of the idealist, and that it would open the way for abuses which should have some check and restraint in the other side.

As it is, this law completely absolves the labor racketeers; I am not talking about the idealist; I am talking about the racketeer, and you know he exists in the ranks of labor just as he exists every place else. It would create in my opinion chaos in industry, and there should be reciprocal responsibilities for the power which this bill contemplates vesting in that group.

Senator WAGNER. That is just the very purpose of this legislation, to provide industrial democracy.

Mr. KELLY. But it does not, Senator.

Senator WAGNER. Oh, well; that is exactly what it does do.

Mr. KELLY. We differ very materially.

Senator WAGNER. I know, but what we provide here where there is any question as to your representation of the workers you cannot have any more genuine democracy than this. We say under Government supervision let the workers themselves, free from influence and free from economic pressure which an employer can bring, and that you and I agree on too, because after all the job depends upon the will of the employer, let them go into a booth, and secretely vote, as they do for their political representatives, in a secret ballot, to select their choice.

Those men are decent citizens, if I may repeat it again, these workers, and they are not going to select a crook, if they know he is a crook. They are going to select the best representative they can.

Mr. KELLY. It does not work out in practice.

Senator WAGNER. If you have industrial democracy, whatever question you have about the integrity of the labor leaders will, of course, be removed. I do not go to your extent at all, because I have a long experience, too.

Let me say for organized labor that I do not hold any brief for them. They take care of themselves; I do not have to; but I know in all of these forward movements for protective laws, not only for their own members, but for women and for children, all the advances we have made in the States in these beneficient humanitarian laws, it is largely the influence of organized labor that has brought them about. And they have through their organization been able to bring about a better economic day for the American worker. And I think they have played a very important part in our social as well as our economic progress. And I do not think when you read you meant quite all that you said about the activities of the organized worker. However, I am afraid that the Senator here (referring to the chairman) is getting impatient with our debate here on a side issue.

Mr. KELLY. There is one point I would like to touch on if you will permit me, Senator.

Senator WAGNER. Certainly.

Mr. KELLY. And that is speaking of the worker going into the booth free from coercion. I am for that 100 percent. You and I would not be apart at all on that. But where we reach the forks in the trail is when you imply or appear to believe that organized labor will not coerce the unorganized man into the booth to vote as it directs him to vote. In practical application that happens.

When you say, Senator, that these men are going into the booths and elect the right kind of leaders you are closing your eyes to the practical history of recent months and years in that. There is a recognized record of racketeering, which is known to leaders of labor, and if you are very familiar with it you must become aware from your study——

Senator WAGNER (interposing). Of course, I join with you any time to wipe it out anywhere it exists, just as it ought to be wiped out in political life. It is not only there.

Mr. KELLY. Yes; every place. But there should be reciprocal responsibilities to protect the independent worker. Now, protect him from coercion from either side and I will say you are on the right road to industrial democracy.

Senator WAGNER. Mr. Kelly, there was an experience I had where I started with the United Mine Workers, who represented the workers in 28 different mines down through Pennsylvania and West Virginia, and after some persuasion the employers consented that we hold an election under the supervision of the Government, and 15,000 workers voted in that election. It covered 2 days, and they were all working. Wherever the plant was located the election took place.

We did not permit any electioneering within 200 feet of the booths and all of that. We did not need any policemen we did not need any soldiers. There was no disorder of any kind.

When it was all over the employees admitted it was a free, open, and fair election. And the workers elected representatives. There is an experience I had. You have had some experiences. That was one of a number of experiences.

I had another experience up in the Senator's State, at Brockton, where there was a complaint against the head of the national union, and the men wanted to be free of that union. They said he did not represent them. And in that case we gave those 9,000 workers an election, and they elected their own men. They put out the old leaders, and they elected their own representatives, and formed a new union for themselves.

And I think the Senator will admit those workers up there in Brockton come from New England families—way, way back. There are very few foreigners around Brockton.

The CHAIRMAN. Not very close.

Senator WAGNER. They are a very high-class lot of workers, and they did that themselves.

Mr. KELLY. Be that as it may, Senator, what is the objection then to making these bodies responsible under the law just the same as the employer is responsible under the law? I fail to see any fairness that makes it a felony for an employer to violate some real or fancied provision of the act while other men may be violating it with impunity.

Senator WAGNER. What responsibility are you speaking of, what responsibility do you mean?

Mr. KELLY. For labor.

Senator WAGNER. Yes.

Mr. KELLY. Why not make labor responsible to the courts to the same degree that the employer is?

Senator WAGNER. Are they not?

Mr. KELLY. No; not under this act.

Senator WAGNER. You are speaking of this servitude provision, is that what you have reference to, because outside of that they are bound. For instance, if the Board should find there were no unfair labor practices they are bound to that decision. That has the effect of a judgment the moment an order is entered.

Mr. KELLY. No.

Senator WAGNER. Oh, yes; oh, yes.

Mr. KELLY. Let me point out one thing there which I think you are overlooking. You referred to the fact that the economic power vests thoroughly in the employer. I do not think you mean that, Senator, for the reason that regardless of how much wealth he may have, after all, man-power is the only thing that can keep that plan going.

Senator WAGNER. I am speaking of the power over the individual worker. It says to him if it does not like him, "Your job is gone. I am going to put another man in your place"; I mean it has that power. You do not question that control?

Mr. KELLY. No; that happens. But after all that assumes every employer is of that type.

Senator WAGNER. Oh, no.

Mr. KELLY. That does, too.

Senator WAGNER. Legislation like this is always for the minority. The large majority of employers are fair and want to be fair to their workers, but there is a minority who have prevented their workers from organizing, who refuse to deal with representatives, who refuse to put the worker upon a bargaining equality, and legislation is always needed for that minority.

I think, as I recall the history of the newspapers, when their employees were injured in the machine in the printing plants you took care of your workers as a rule. And the workmen's compensation would not have been needed for your particular business. But we had to pass it because so many employers just threw the man right out into the street, after he was injured, and resisted any efforts to collect damages for the injuries received. So we had to pass the workmen's compensation law.

Mr. KELLY. I am afraid, Senator, we could argue all afternoon and we would find ourselves apart on some things.

Senator WAGNER. I can see that. Now, you spoke about the investigation in going in to ascertain how much money a particular newspaper is making. This bill only permits investigations in relation to the subject matter before the Board, that is, as to unfair labor practices.

Mr. KELLY. I know, Senator, but now let us get down to practical application again

A politically created board quite naturally is going to have numerous agents all over the country. By the very nature of the thing it must have. And undoubtedly for the moment let me say there is where your breakdown is going to occur. If this thing becomes a law it will become impossible of adequate administration. But leaving that, you have these agents or agencies that are appointed by this politically created board. It is easy on language as broad and ambiguous as that is to go on an exploration expedition into any plant.

Senator WAGNER. This language is identical with the language in almost any quasi-judicial board that has been set up either by a State government or the Federal Government. They are permitted, of course, to subpena witnesses, make investigations on matters relating to the subject, and there is not any other way to state it.

The moment a witness feels his rights are being invaded and subjects are being investigated which do not relate to the subject you can go into court by simply a refusal to give the particular testimony.

Mr. KELLY. Yes, sir; but how about the publishers, take it generally, the employer, although I am talking for the newspaper publishing industry, the man——

Senator WAGNER (interposing). Yes.

Mr. KELLY. The man whom we familiarly speak of as out in the sticks. I came from the sticks myself, and so I do not mean that in a derogatory manner. But take the employer who has not had a chance to become reasonably familiar with his rights under this law or any other law, and he is shown by an officious representative, and you will admit that some of these representatives of these boards are that way, who comes in and demand something, and the employer says, "you cannot have it." And the representative says, "Here. Mr. Man, you better read this:"

> Any person who shall wilfully assault, resist, prevent, impede, or interfere with any member of the Board or any of its agents or agencies in the performance of duties pursuant to this act shall be punished by a fine of not more than $5,000 or by imprisonment for not more than one year, or both.

Which is a felony.

Senator WAGNER. That same argument could be applied to every Board that a State or Federal Government has set up, the Internal Revenue Department, the Communications Commission, the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Federal Trade Commission. It is the identical provision copied almost word for word from those laws. And why should there be any greater abuse here than in the administration of these other Boards? And that has not been the experience.

Mr. KELLY. All right. As a purely personal expression, because I do not want to speak for my association, on these particular points; I am expressing a personal opinion; but as a purely personal opinion it seems to me you would go a long way toward taking the criticism away from that if you defined the matter of fair practices from the employee so that there would be reciprocal responsibility and penalty, so that Mr. Employer could say, "Here, Mr. Man, you are going too far."

Senator WAGNER. You mean that the employer could interfere with the employees in organizing an association?

Mr. KELLY. No; I mean the representatives of organized labor coming into his plant for the purposes of coercing his employees into membership when they do not choose to join.

Senator WAGNER. I was going to ask you something about the newspaper board. I think you referred to it briefly.

Mr. KELLY. You mean the newspaper industrial board?

Senator WAGNER. Yes.

Mr. KELLY. Now, I was not referring to the newspaper industrial board in my statement.

Senator WAGNER. Yes.

Mr. KELLY. That is, the international arbitration board, which has existed for 34 years in the industry, and it is the supreme court of industrial relations in the industry, created by mutual consent, and is the result of the thought and experience of the best men who could work on it on both sides.

Senator WAGNER. That deals with wages, hours, and conditions of employment generally?

Mr. KELLY. Yes.

Senator WAGNER. Of course, that has nothing to do with this legislation. Are you not a member of another board?

Mr. KELLY. Yes, sir; I am chairman of the newspaper industrial board.

Senator WAGNER. How many members are there on that board?

Mr. KELLY. Before I answer your question, Senator, let me say that any statement I make is an expression of personal opinion, because I am not authorized to speak——

Senator WAGNER (interposing). I am asking for the record now.

Mr. KELLY. This is a matter of personal information.

Senator WAGNER. Is not that a matter of record?

Mr. KELLY. No. But I mean any statements I make are my personal statements, and not necessarily a statement for the newspaper industrial board.

Senator WAGNER. I was not going to ask you to do that.

Mr. KELLY. There are eight members on the board including myself.

Senator WAGNER. That is for representing——

Mr. KELLY (interposing). For representing the employees and for representing the employers.

Senator WAGNER. Exactly. You have a ninth, too, did you say?

Mr. KELLY. We have a panel; that is, provision is made for a panel of five impartial persons mutually agreed upon, and to be drawn by lot, whenever there is a deadlock. Judge Nevin, of Dayton, sat on a recent case in Boston. Prior to that Judge Gaws, of Indianapolis, sat as the ninth member.

Senator WAGNER. I want to ask you this because I think I am correct in my information. When you decide a question, say your board decides a question, it goes to the code authority for enforcement, does it not?

Mr. KELLY. We have not had any cases of refusal to comply with an award yet.

Senator WAGNER. I am speaking now and assuming that the award needs enforcement. You have not the power to enforce your award?

Mr. KELLY. Why, we have no more police power than the National Labor Relations Board, which is none.

Senator WAGNER. I understand that. Who do you rely upon to enforce it?

Mr. KELLY. In which case, that of labor or the employer?

Senator WAGNER. Supposing there was a controversy unsatisfactory to one side or the other. Say that labor is dissatisfied.

Mr. KELLY. If labor refused to abide by the award there would be no way to enforce it.

Senator WAGNER. Has not the code authority the right to enforce it?

Mr. KELLY. I am not so sure. That is a question that would have to go to the code authority. If it were an assenting newspaper who refused to comply with the award most certainly the publisher members on that board would take it up immediately with the code authority to enforce that award on the assenting member.

Senator WAGNER. I say supposing the workers are dissatisfied with the decision, if they wanted to appeal they would have to appeal to the code authority; would they not?

Mr. KELLY. No. The award of the newspaper industrial board is final, just in the same manner that the award——

Senator WAGNER (interposing). Without any enforcing power you have no power to enforce.

Mr. KELLY. We have the same power the National Labor Relations Board has.

Senator WAGNER. That is the reason——

Mr. KELLY (interposing). It would go through the code authority to the proper enforcement officials of the N. R. A.

Senator WAGNER. Who would that be?

Mr. KELLY. I am not an authority on N. R. A. I presume it would be the Compliance Division.

Senator WAGNER. I think you would find that you would have to ask your code authority.

Mr. KELLY. It would have to go through the code authority.

Senator WAGNER. That is what I am trying to bring out. It would have to go through the code authority. And are there any labor representatives on the code authority?

Mr. KELLY. No. And I think I see what you are trying to bring out, Senator, and it does not have a bit of bearing on this case.

The code authority would merely refer it to the Compliance Division, I presume, of the N. R. A.

Senator WAGNER. What I am trying to bring out, Mr. Kelly, is the body, the code authority, to whom this matter would have to be submitted after you decided the case, has no labor representatives on it. That is what I want to find out.

Mr. KELLY. If you are trying to establish the fact that the award of the industrial newspaper board is appealable to the code authority on either side you are mistaken, Senator, because the award is final.

Senator WAGNER. What I say is if you wanted to have it enforced you would have to act through the code authority; wouldn't you?

Mr. KELLY. I presume so, but I am not a lawyer; I do not know. I presume the award would be referred to the N. R. A. Compliance Division through our code authority.

Senator WAGNER. Exactly; and I say that code authority would act——

Mr. KELLY (interposing). Hold on. Suppose on the other hand it did not go through the code authority, it would have to go through the union, so one way is just as expeditious as the other.

Senator WAGNER. Would it not in either case? Suppose the union desired compliance?

Mr. KELLY. Senator, you are getting into a hypothetical question, because in the newspaper industry the failure to abide by an award is an exception, and not the rule. We have had 34 years of an arbitration board whose decision is final. We could count on the fingers of one hand during those 34 years of this arbitration board any decisions that have not been abided by.

Senator WAGNER. How many cases have you before you?

Mr. KELLY. Of what?

Senator WAGNER. Of complaints.

Mr. KELLY. You mean the newspaper industrial board?

Senator WAGNER. Yes. I mean this board that will render labor decisions.

Mr. KELLY. The newspaper industrial board is under the code.

Senator WAGNER. Is that what you call it, the newspaper industrial board?

Mr. KELLY. Yes.

Senator WAGNER. How many cases?

Mr. KELLY. You mean pending now?

Senator WAGNER. How many have you had altogether?

Mr. KELLY. Oh, I would say we have had about 40.

Senator WAGNER. And how many have you disposed of?

Mr. KELLY. Twenty-five, I should judge. You understand that I would want to consult my files. I do not want to answer offhand, but I would say we have disposed of over half the cases that have come before us.

Senator WAGNER. And as to those not disposed of, can you give an estimate as to how long they have been pending?

Mr. KELLY. There are some, of course, that have been pending ever since the board was organized, which was about a year ago, but they are pending due to failure to comply with the rules and regulations of procedure. And in many cases—you will pardon me, if I say, Senator, that I am commencing to sense the source of the information from the questions you ask, and let me say in many cases——

Senator WAGNER (interposing). No; I read this in one of the periodicals. I will give you the source of my information.

Mr. KELLY. In many cases it is failure to comply with the code of procedure, or failure of the interested parties to prosecute the case.

Senator WAGNER. I just wanted the facts.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there any other questions, Senator?

Senator WAGNER. I have none.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Funk.

STATEMENT OF ERWIN FUNK, MEMBER LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE OF NATIONAL EDITORIAL ASSOCIATION

The CHAIRMAN. Your name is Erwin Funk?

Mr. FUNK. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You represent the National Editorial Association?

Mr. FUNK. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Where is your home address?

Mr. FUNK. Rogers, Ark.

The CHAIRMAN. And how many members in the National Editorial Association?

Mr. FUNK. We have about 5,000.

The CHAIRMAN. They constitute the editorial writers of the newspapers of the country?

Mr. FUNK. They are publishers mostly. They are not editorial writers. The name is just a little misnomer.

The CHAIRMAN. I see. You have a statement you would like to make to the committee. Would you like to submit your brief?

Mr. FUNK. It is very brief. It is not very long, Senator.

I want to state just a word in addition, and that is that I received a telegram this morning. Our headquarters are in Chicago. I wired a message in yesterday asking how many members of our association, or how many of our establishments were closed shops. I received a telegram this morning, and it is not contained in the brief here, but about 90 percent of our establishments are not closed shops, so that we do have a little overlapping in our membership with the A. N. P. A., represented by Mr. Kelly and Mr. Hanson.

In my own home State of Arkansas we have 10 newspapers members of our State press association and of the National Editorial Association, which are also members of the A. N. P. A.

I might say that last year I was State administrator for Arkansas for the Graphic Arts Code, and that I have for 40 years been a small-town publisher. I am a past president of the National Editorial Association, and I am appearing as a member of the national legislative committee of that organization. The National Editorial Association has a membership of 5,000 small-town weekly and daily newspapers. Through its affiliations with the various State press associations of the United States, it represents in an advisory and legislative capacity some 10,000 newspapers.

By direction of the officers of the National Editorial Association and the legislative committee, who have made a careful study of the provisions of the Wagner Labor Bill (S. 1958), I am appearing to protest against the passage of said bill.

When the Wagner bill (s. 2926) was introduced last year, the N. E. A. vigorously opposed its passage, and a majority of the State press associations in their annual conventions, or through action by their executive and legislative committees, adopted resolutions opposing the passage of same. And this was done when Mr. Walter Allen was the president, from Brookline, Mass. In our Tennessee meeting of the Arkansas Press Association, and there was only one vote in favor of the bill last year.

Because among other changes, the present bill makes no exceptions for the smaller plants, whereas the 1934 bill exempted from its operation all plants employing less than 10 persons, the N. E. A. considers the present bill even more objectionable than the one it opposed a year ago.

While the bill attempts to convey the idea of "majority rule" by the employees in all collective bargaining, one finds that it authorizes the National Board to decide whether such majority shall be determined by employer unit, craft unit, plant unit or "other unit", without the consent of the employer or a majority of the employees. (Sec. 9-b.)

There is no proviso as to what will happen in case no faction or unit has a clear majority in any election or ballot for a closed shop, but it can be taken for granted that minority units will continue to demand elections and votes on a closed-shop policy for an indefinite period, completely destroying employee morals and making it impossible for an employer to make definite plans for future operations.

In an industry which experiences heavy seasonal and periodic swells as does the newspaper and commercial printing business, it would be quite possible and very probable, that under the protection of this proposed bill, these extra short-time employees would file demands with the National Board or its agents for election of new employee representatives. The Board "may" provide for hearings, and "may" take secret ballots by employees, but the bill allows the Board or its agents to adopt any other "suitable method" it may see fit to use. (Sec. 9-c.) They do not have to leave it to a vote of a majority of the employees.

It legalizes the "closed shop" either for the entire plant or for any special unit therein, and while the bill does not compel an employer to sign such agreement, it specifically states that no section of the bill may be employed to prevent or discourage strikes as a means of enforcing demands of employees. No employee could be warned or discharged for continued agitation for new elections or for a closed shop, regardless of how large the opposing majority.

Section 7 (3) specifically provides that it shall be considered an "unfair labor practice", subject to any or all of the penalties of the bill, for an employer to discriminate, when hiring employees, because of membership in any labor organization.

An employer who refused to hire an applicant presenting evidence that he belonged to a labor organization, would be open to the charge of practicing "unfair labor practices." Employers would have to carefully preserve a record of every applicant for work and be prepared to go before the Board or its agent at any time and place, they might summon him, to explain why he had not hired this or that applicant. There is no limit to the annoyance and expense any attempt to enforce this provision of the Wagner bill might cause an employer. We question the constitutionality of any Federal law that attempts to dictate to an employer who he may hire.

The N. E. A. considers as unfair to every employer and employee lines 18 and 19, page 12, section 10 (c), which read:

> In any such proceedings the rules of evidence prevailing in courts of law or equity shall not be controlling.

Witnesses need not be placed under oath; and while there is a clause making an employer liable for prosecution for perjury there is none holding an employee equally responsible. An employee would not be discharged for perjury in a labor hearing.

We hold as unconstitutional the provision in section 8 (c) which attempts to give precedence to this proposed act over the present or any future provisions of the N. R. A. code agreements or "other statutes of the United States."

Few of the smaller newspaper and commercial plants of this country have company or organized labor associations, and we do not believe that a Federal law to encourage their formation will at this time further the best interests of either employer or employee. We believe Federal endorsement of collective bargaining in these plants will weaken the morale and productiveness of the employees, will result in higher production costs and increased prices to the consumer, and will eventually result in a loss of employment and decrease of wages in the smaller units of our industry.

Most newspaper plants have several skilled employees in each department. In the smaller plants there may be but one or two in this class. Enforced collective bargaining by the more numerous but less efficient employees would undoubtedly result in an effort to bring down the wages of the skilled employees and increase their own. Again we have increased costs and decreased quality production, with the employer headed for bankruptcy. We believe it would tend toward centralization of industry in the large centers where skilled labor could protect itself.

As a matter of fact, we find nothing in the bill that will really benefit the great majority of employees in the newspaper or commercial printing industry in the average small town. Provisions are included which cannot but injure the industry and make it impossible for it to participate to the needed extent in the general return to prosperity.

We believe it gives to the national board undue authority which, through their lack of acquaintance with the internal problems of not only our own industry but that of thousands of other industries of the country, will result in great harm and loss to all of them. It is an utter impossibility for any Federal board to attempt to regulate the intricate relations of employer and employee in the smaller plants of any industry, and any effort to regiment large industries and small industries on the same basis is doomed to failure from the very beginning.

Newspaper wages and hours, outside the larger cities and industrial centers, are to a very large degree dependent upon local business conditions which vary greatly from year to year. It is quite as impossible for fixed wage scales to be arrived at under collective bargaining with employees over any definite period as it is to guarantee any fixed profit for the employer.

Law cannot guarantee wage and hour protection for the employee unless at the same time it guarantees protection for the employer. In the Wagner bill, as we see it, there is not the slightest protection afforded the employer; and when the employer falls, the employee must of very necessity fall with him.

Therefore we beg this committee to report unfavorably upon the passage of the Wagner labor bill (S. 1958).

The CHAIRMAN. Will the representatives from Oklahoma please come forward?

STATEMENT OF CLIFFORD U. CARTWRIGHT, WEWOKA, OKLA., SECRETARY-CHAIRMAN EMPLOYEES' REPRESENTATION PLAN OF THE OKLAHOMA PIPE LINE CO.

The CHAIRMAN. Will you please give your full name?

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. Clifford U. Cartwright.

The CHAIRMAN. Where is your residence?

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. Wewoka, Okla.

The CHAIRMAN. Is this other gentleman accompanying you?

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Is he a representative of the same association?

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. We have come here in connection with practically the same plan.

The CHAIRMAN. Whom do you represent?

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. I represent the Employees' Representation Plan of the Oklahoma Pipe Line Co., Wewoka, Okla.

The CHAIRMAN. What is your name?

Mr. WHITEHEAD. My name is Harold H. Whitehead.

The CHAIRMAN. Where is your residence?

Mr. WHITEHEAD. Seminole, Okla.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the name of the organization you represent?

Mr. WHITEHEAD. I represent the Employees' Plan of the Carter Oil Co., Seminole, Okla.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you an employee, Mr. Cartwright?

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. Yes, sir; I am.

The CHAIRMAN. What is your job?

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. Instrument man.

The CHAIRMAN. Are the employees of this company organized?

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. No, sir; except we have only this plan which I will speak about.

The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. I represent approximately 350 employees of the Oklahoma Pipe Line Co., being practically all of the employees in their employees' representation plan. This plan has been in effect for the past 6 years, and I have been an employee of this company for about 9 years.

I might add that last week I was elected to the chairmanship of this association for the fourth consecutive year, receiving a vote of approximately 98 percent majority.

I have served as secretary-chairman of the representation plan for the past 4 years, and I was requested to come to Washington by the employees association. I, therefore, asked the Oklahoma Pipe Line Co. to give me time off from my regular duties, with pay, and to pay my expenses, which they have allowed.

Mr. Chairman, I want to make it clearly understood that the Oklahoma Pipe Line Co. is paying all of my expenses, and allowing me regular pay.

I did not come here to argue the legal aspects, nor the constitutionality of the pending Wagner Labor Disputes bill, nor to make any attack upon the American Federation of Labor, or any other orgaization, but I came with a common man's view, and with the same spirit and objective as when I enter into our joint conferences, trying to reach a free and mutual agreement, fair to all, not condemning, but rather striving to preserve those grand principles of American citizenship. I do not know, maybe there are cases in need of such a stringent law, but in our case the price is high, and I believe the final result will be the loss of the plan through which we have gained the benefits and privileges which we now enjoy. It would end the steady progress of cordial labor relations, so greatly needed now in our social and economic advances, and tends to destroy merited ambition, which our plan holds as one of the primary factors.

We admit our plan is not perfect, but we have the right to revise and amend it at all times, which we sometimes do. But we do say that it does satisfy us, and that it does freely, kindly, and fairly represent the men, without any burden or pay for those services.

Every employee of the Oklahoma Pipe Line Co. has the right to belong to any organization of their own choosing, free from any form of restraint, intimidation, or coercion. This is one of the original fundamental clauses in our original agreement put into effect long before the N. R. A.

As I said to you before, the bill may be necessary for some organizations, and if this honorable committee believes that this bill should be enacted, I would like to suggest some amendments to the bill.

Under "Rights of employees", section 7, it reads:

> Employees shall have the right to self-organization, to form, join, or assist labor organizations, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and to engage in concerted activities, for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection.

That is all right, but it does not, with all due respect to the unions as a whole, keep them from interfering, which I actually know has happened in many instances, not with my company in particular, but coming from Seminole, and Wewoka, in the heart of the oil fields of Oklahoma, I have seen that happen.

Even last week three or four men that belonged to the local there stopped several trucks of men and caused them not to work, and they in fact lost the time that they could have made.

Senator WAGNER. You mean they threatened them, or something of that kind?

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. Yes; with violence.

Senator WAGNER. You know that your employer has a remedy against that, and many employers have gotten injunctions against that sort of thing.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. I know, but it does not keep them from it.

Senator WAGNER. If you have that right, why should it be reiterated somewhere else?

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. I am not only speaking of violence there, but other activities.

Senator WAGNER. You mean they should not talk to your men at all?

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. We believe in fair play, and we do not take the undue right, as I might say, that I have seen them take.

Senator WAGNER. I will ask you this, if the workers are satisfied with that plan, there is certainly nobody that can persuade them to change it.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. No.

Senator WAGNER. Are you ready to go so far in your ideas of freedom of speech that no other person ought to be permitted even to speak to them?

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. No; I don't mean that.

Senator WAGNER. What do you have in mind?

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. Undue influence; in other words, to threaten.

Senator WAGNER. As I say, you can secure injunctions against those things.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. That is sometimes hard to do.

Senator WAGNER. It would be just as hard, whether it was provided for in this legislation or not. As I say, that right exists, and there have been injunctions issued all over the country, and some of them even went so far that they would not permit the union men to talk to the others, and in one case they prevented even the singing of religious hymns. That is how far our courts have gone in this injunction process.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. The amendment I would like to suggest is taken from part of the amended Railway Labor Act of 1934, page 2, part 3, under "General purposes", which reads as follows:

> Representatives, for the purpose of this act, shall be designated by the respective parties without interference, influence, or coercion by either party.

In other words, it makes it binding, clearly, to both parties.

Senator WAGNER. What that means is this, that a worker cannot interfere with the railway organization in selecting its representatives to bargain, and the railway cannot interfere with the workers in selecting their representatives. That is what you want in here?

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. Yes; something like that.

Senator WAGNER. Would that satisfy you?

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. I believe it would bring out the point there, to make it equal to both parties.

Senator WAGNER. I think you are right. I don't think a worker should interfere with an employer in his efforts to organize a trade association, or a representative who is to represent the employer in dealing with the worker, just as the employer should not interfere with the workers in their selection of their representative. You and I are in accord on that.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. You think such an amendment would be better if it were added to that?

Senator WAGNER. You mean the railway clause?

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. That part of the railway act I read; yes, sir.

Senator WAGNER. That was in the bill last year, but that is not what the employers want. They want something more than that.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. I am not speaking from that side.

Senator WAGNER. I understand that.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. Then on down in paragraph 2 under "Rights of employees", it reads as follows:

To dominate or interfere with the formation or administration of any labor organization or contribute financial or other support to it: Provided, That, subject to rules and regulations made and published by the board pursuant to section 6 (a), an employer shall not be prohibited from permitting employees to confer with him during working hours without loss of time or pay.

I would like to see, in line 24, the words "with him" stricken, so that it would read as follows:

An employer shall not be prohibited from permitting employees to confer during working hours without loss of time and pay.

As it is, it does not provide we can confer among each other.

Then, at the end of line 25 in that paragraph, add the words:

or from paying such other expenses actually incurred by the labor organization in negotiating for collective bargaining.

I believe we should have the right to bargain with our company for existence. I do not mean they should grant us unreasonable sums to carry on our organization, but I do believe that is a part of true collective bargaining, the same as bargaining for wages and working hours, to bargain for cost of holding elections, traveling expenses, and so forth.

Senator WAGNER. I believe you and I will agree on this proposition, that you could not be a very effective representative of the workers if you were paid for the services you rendered for the workers, by the employer with whom you are to bargain.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. I do not quite understand. You mean if I draw a salary just for representing the men, is that right?

Senator WAGNER. Yes; you do not think you would be much of a representative of the worker in those circumstances?

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. He might be, I would not say, but he might not be.

Senator WAGNER. Isn't that a good deal analogous to this, if I am suing somebody and I am also paying the fees of the attorney of the man I am suing? Do you think he will represent his client or represent me?

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. That is a question.

Senator WAGNER. Do you think it is a question?

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. Well, he could be honest; I could not question that.

Senator WAGNER. I know there would be cases where he would be, but we have to take things as they are, and as a general thing you do not think he would be, do you?

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. Do you think it is wrong for us to receive compensation—what I mean, like expenses or time lost while representing the men during working hours?

The CHAIRMAN. Do you think, Senator Wagner, there is any objections to the bill making it clear that the representatives when they meet among themselves can be compensated, as well as when they meet the employer?

Senator WAGNER. It all depends whether you leave the loophole for the payment of money by the employer to representatives of the workers. To me, I just feel that you cannot be a very loyal representative of the workers if you are paid by the other side.

However, I know there is something the committee is thinking about along that line.

The CHAIRMAN. I have a feeling that the employees in such a circumstance, when they begin to suspect that he is not a really honest representative, a good and true representative, they will dump him out or get a new organization.

Senator WAGNER. If I were to judge from this witness, I would not be afraid to trust him, but that is not the rule.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. Thank you, Senator Wagner.

The CHAIRMAN. Haven't you got to rely somewhat upon evolution, that in these company unions they may pay the representatives, and if the representatives are influenced by it the workers themselves are going to turn them out and form another union?

Senator WAGNER. Yes; if they are able to do it.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. Do you think the average working man under modern conditions, and so forth, could for very long swallow this company domination of representatives?

Senator WAGNER. They have been swallowing it.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. Don't you think, today, with all of the other organizations about, they would not stand it for long?

Senator WAGNER. They have no alternative; they vote right at the plant; they are not permitted to vote for anyone, except someone employed there, and that gives the employer a control over the individual, and if he fights too hard he loses his job. Those elections are held under circumstances where it is very obvious it is not a free expression of a choice in many cases.

In some cases it is a free choice, and this bill does not in the slightest interfere where the representation is the free choice of the workers.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. In the first part of the bill you do state that, but it is all lost in the various ramifications after that.

Senator WAGNER. In your opinion, the financial provisions are a little too restrictive.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. In this case it is.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any other objection you have to the bill?

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. Yes; there are some other objections to matters that I think should not be in there.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course, it is possible for somebody to start another organization.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. Yes; of course, it is. Our plan is very simple, but it covers everything, I think.

The CHAIRMAN. While your elections are held annually, the representatives elected and the results of the election are more or less binding upon all of the employees until the employees use some other kind of union?

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. Yes; but they have the right under this agreement to step out. They can belong to another union, if they wish. We make no restriction there at all, and they can be represented in any way they want to.

The CHAIRMAN. Suppose they did join another union, couldn't they elect a majority of the workers, then call a meeting and turn themselves into a branch of the American Federation of Labor?

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. Yes, that is correct; it is up to them to belong to any other organization of their own choosing.

Senator WAGNER. Could they, under your constitution and bylaws, elect an outsider to represent them?

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. Yes, sir.

Senator WAGNER. Somebody who was not an employee?

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. Yes, sir; they can if they so desire.

The CHAIRMAN. That is more liberal than any we have heard.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. May I read that provision to you gentlemen? It reads as follows:

> Future adjustments affecting wages, working hours, and working conditions shall be made in joint conferences between the employee representatives in the division or divisions affected and representatives of the management. If such joint conference fails to agree unanimously as to the fair adjustment the matter shall be referred to a joint conference consisting of all of the employees and management representatives of the company. If this joint conference fails to agree unanimously as to a fair adjustment, an appeal may be made to the board of directors. Should the decision of the board of directors be unsatisfactory to one-quarter or more of the members of such joint conference, the question may be submitted for arbitration to a board composed of three members, one chosen by the employee representatives, one appointed by the management representatives, and the third to be selected by mutual agreement of these two.

Senator WAGNER. Have you a provision there as to qualifications of representatives?

Mr. WHITEHEAD. I believe so.

The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed, Mr. Cartwright.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. Under "Representatives and elections", in section 9, it reads as follows:

> Representatives designated or selected for the purpose of collective bargaining by the majortiy of the employees in a unit appropriate for such purposes, shall be the exclusive representatives of all the employees in such unit.

I would like to insert there the President's own statement to the automobile industry in 1934, which would read as follows:

> Representatives designated or selected for the purpose of collective bargaining shall constitute a bargaining committee. If there is more than one group each bargaining committee shall have a total membership pro rata to the number of men each member represents. Such committee shall represent all of the employees in such unit for the purpose of collective bargaining in respect to rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, and other conditions.

If the President asked that much, and I think it is nothing but fair, then why should we not have it included in this legislation? It will give the right of equal representation to both sides, if there was an organized union, along with our union. In other words, the minority would be represented there, and if we were to be in the minority, we could have equal representation on this board, the same as the union, or vice versa.

Senator WAGNER. I do not want to take that up for discussion, but we cannot agree with each other at all. I think it would make collective bargaining ineffective.

I have examined your representation plan which has been handed to me, and I find there is no qualification in here as to who could represent you, except you could not elect an organization to represent you, it would have to be an individual; would it not?

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. No; we can have an organization to represent us.

Senator WAGNER. I mean, instead of voting for an individual, could the members of your association say that a certain labor organization could be the representative for all of the workers?

Mr. WHITEHEAD. Yes, Senator Wagner; that is on top of the second page, in regard to nondiscrimination. The employees can select anyone to represent them.

Senator WAGNER. I believe you are right about that. That is a very liberal plan.

The CHAIRMAN. This plan of the Oklahoma Pipe Line Co. may be inserted in the record as a part of the statement of Mr. Cartwright, at the conclusion of his remarks.

You may proceed, Mr. Cartwright.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. On page 10 of the proposed bill it provides as follows:

> That any individual employee or group of employees shall have the right at any time to present grievances to their employer through representatives of their own choosing.
> The board shall decide whether, in order to effectuate the policies of the act, the unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining shall be the employer unit, craft unit, plant unit, or other unit.

That is a little stringent, I believe.

Senator WAGNER. How would you word it?

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. I would do it this way—beginning with subparagraph (b), line 5, page 10, to read as follows:

> In case of disagreement the board shall decide by secret ballot in the plant or company concerned before the election of representatives whether, in order to effectuate the policies of this act, the unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining shall be the employer unit, craft unit, finance unit, or other unit.

In other words, before they decide who shall be the representatives, they shall have the secret ballot before the election to decide, and I think that would be more fair.

Senator WAGNER. You mean to decide what the unit of representation shall be?

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. Yes; and who shall represent them.

Senator WAGNER. And as to what sort of election they shall conduct.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. Yes; and not leave it to the board. After all, the employees are the ones affected and not the board, and they should have the right, in my opinion, to decide themselves.

In the case in California with the Shell Co. recently, they held an election, and over the entire State there was a vast majority of nonorganized voters, but in this particular plant or unit there was a decided majority, and the board ruled that constituted the entire State as one unit. That is wrong; if there was a majority there, and they wanted that one particular unit represented in organized labor, that was all right; but why bring in the others?

Further, beginning on line 13, subparagraph (c), it reads as follows:

> In any such investigation the Board shall provide for an appropriate hearing, either in conjunction with a proceeding under section 10 or otherwise, and may take a secret ballot of employees, or utilize any other method to ascertain such representatives.

I think in lines 16 and 17 the words "or utilize any other suitable method" should be stricken.

What other method is more suitable than by secret ballot that is nothing but fair? "Any other method", could mean anything.

On page 11, under "Prevention of unfair labor practices", it reads as follows:

> The Board is empowered, as hereinafter provided, to prevent any person from engaging in any unfair labor practice listed in section 8 affecting commerce. This power shall be exclusive and shall not be affected by any other means of adjustment or prevention that has been or may be established by agreement, code, law, or otherwise, except as provided in section 11.

Now, I think that certainly should be amended by striking out the word "agreement", and the words "or otherwise", so as to make it read, "May be established by code or law, except as provided in section 11."

As it now reads it defeats the very purpose of collective bargaining, in my opinion, and code or law is the only thing that should be provided in those cases.

The same occurs on down in subparagraph (b) on line 16, where the same protest should be followed so as to make it read "code or law."

On page 16, just before subparagraph (j), I would like to change paragraph (j) to paragraph (k) and insert a new paragraph (j), which would read as follows:

> Provided, That any person aggrieved by any order of the Board which would destroy a labor organization, such person shall have recourse to any district court, and the order of the Board shall not be effective pending such hearing.

Then follow with paragraph (j) as it is written and change to paragraph (k).

As I understand it, the circuit court does not take sworn evidence on anything before it. The Labor Relations Board will accept anything, even hearsay, which, in turn, must be accepted by the circuit court in making their decisions. We believe in the United States courts, the district court, they would have to bring positive sworn facts before that court to show that these things have happened. I do not believe a labor organization should be destroyed without such a hearing.

I believe that is all I would like to say, but I would like for those amendments to be considered by you gentlemen.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you, Mr. Cartwright. We will be glad to consider them.

(The joint agreement for the representation plan of the Carter Oil Co., presented by witness, is as follows:)

JOINT AGREEMENT ADOPTED BY THE CONFERENCE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE CARTER OIL CO. AND THE EMPLOYEES, HELD AT TULSA, FEBRUARY 24, 1920, ALL AMENDMENTS INCLUDED

April 24, 1934

1. PURPOSE AND SCOPE

This agreement makes provision whereby elected representatives of the employees shall meet in joint conference with representatives of the management to discuss and to settle all matters of joint interest, such as hours, wages, working conditions, and the adjustment of grievances, subject to review when necessary as provided in paragraph 4 below.

2. ANNUAL ELECTION

An election shall be held annually under the sole direction of the employees for the selection by secret ballot of those who, during the succeeding year or until their successors are elected, shall be the accredited representatives of the employees at all joint conferences and in all matters of collective bargaining and collective dealing between the company and its employees, excepting such employees as may choose to be otherwise represented.

All employees are entitled to vote, excepting those identified with the management, such as officers, managers, superintendents, heads of departments, foremen, and clerical forces.

3. JOINT CONFERENCES

A joint conference of all employee representatives thus elected and management representatives shall be held annually at the call of the president or vice president at a time and place satisfactory to the employees. In addition to this annual conference, a conference of such employee representatives and management representatives in each division shall be held at least quarterly to consider any matters of mutual interest, with such additional joint conferences of one or two or more divisions as the president or vice president or employee representatives of the divisions may request. At all joint conferences the number of management representatives shall not exceed the number of employee representatives.

4. ADJUSTMENTS BY JOINT CONFERENCE

Future adjustments affecting wages, working hours, and working conditions shall be made in joint conferences between the employee representatives in the division or divisions affected and representatives of the management. If such joint conference fails to agree unanimously as to a fair adjustment the matter shall be referred to a joint conference consisting of all of the employee and management representatives of the company. If this joint conference fails to agree unanimously as to a fair adjustment an appeal may be made to the board of directors. Should the decision of the board of directors be unsatisfactory to one quarter or more of the members of such joint conference the question may be submitted for arbitration to a board composed of three members—one chosen by the employee representatives, one appointed by the management representatives, and the third to be selected by mutual agreement of these two.

5. RIGHT OF APPEAL

Any employee who feels that he has been unjustly treated or subjected to any unfair conditions has the right of appeal to the division superintendent in the production department or to the head of such department as the employee may belong to and the higher officials of the company in their order, provided he shall first seek to have the matter adjusted by conference in person or through his regularly elected representative with his immediate superior. Before such appeal shall be taken beyond the division superintendent or the head of a department, it shall first be considered in a joint conference composed of the employee representatives of the district affected and an equal number of representatives of the management. In case such conference fails to agree unanimously as to a fair adjustment, an appeal may be made as above indicated.

6. NONDISCRIMINATION

Each employee representative shall be free to pursue his duties in accordance with his best judgment without fear that his individual relations with the company will be affected by any action taken by him in good faith in his capacity as representative. Each representative shall have the right to take the question of an alleged personal discrimination on account of his acts directly to the management of their order.

No discrimination shall be made by the company or its employees against any employee on account of membership or nonmembership in any church, society, political party, fraternity, or union.

AMPLIFICATIONS OF THE JOINT AGREEMENT ADOPTED BY EMPLOYEES AND MANAGEMENT OF THE CARTER OIL CO.

As an amplification of paragraph 4 (wage adjustments) of the joint agreement, and as the accepted basis for consideration of wage adjustments, it is the company's policy to pay at least the prevailing scale of wages for similar work in the community. In making such adjustments consideration is also given to changes in the cost of living as reported by the Bureau of Labor Statistics of the United States Government.

As an amplification of paragraph 5 (right of appeal) of the joint agreement it is agreed between the employees and the management that as to discharge without notice:

A. The following is a list of offenses for which an employee may be discharged without further notice:

1. Violation of any law. Special attention is called to the following:

(a) Carrying concealed weapons; fighting or attempting bodily injury to another; drunkenness; conduct which violates the common decency or morality of the community.

(b) Stealing, making fradulent records, or malicious mischief resulting in the injury or destruction of property of other employees of the company.

(c) Cruelty to animals the property of other employees or of the company.

2. Violation of the following safety rules:

(a) Carelessness in regard to accidents and safety of fellow employees.

(b) Violation of rules governing employees in repairing or oiling of moving machinery.

(c) Smoking or carrying matches other than safety matches or having open lights or fires within prescribed limits where such practice is forbidden.

3. Failure to immediately report accidents or personal injuries to delegated authority wherever possible.

4. Insubordination (including refusal or failure to perform work assigned) or use of profane or abusive language toward fellow employees or officials of the company.

5. Absence from duty without notice to and permission from immediate superior, except in case of sickness or cause beyond his control of a character that prevents his giving notice.

6. Harboring a disease which on account of his own carelessness will endanger fellow employees.

7. Falsifying or refusing to give testimony when accidents are being investigated, or false statements when application for employment and physical examination is being made.

8. Neglect or carelessness resulting in damage to company property or equipment.

9. Obtaining material at warehouses, plants, or stations or other assigned places on fraudulent orders.

10. Sleeping while on duty.

11. Offering or receiving money or other valuable consideration in exchange for a job, better working place, or any change in working condition.

12. Introduction, possession, or use on the property of the company of intoxicating liquors.

13. Habitual use of habit-forming drugs or their introduction or possession on the property of the company.

B. For other offenses, not on the above list, an employee shall not be discharged without having first been notified that a repetition of the offense will make him liable to dismissal. Such notice may be given by the foreman or superintendent, who shall forthwith send a copy of such notification through channels to the president.

C. Foremen or superintendents finding that the interests of the business require the suspension of any employee for any offense, or require his dismissal for the commission of any of the posted list of offenses or for the commission of any other offense after warningi notce has been given, shall report the case fully through channels to the president. The president, after investigation, may approve the actual or proposed suspension, or arrange to transfer the employee, or if the facts warrant, discharge him. In case an actual suspension is not approved, the employee shall be reinstated with full pay for the period of suspension.

D. A list of suspensions and discharges together with the reason therefor shall be compiled in the president's office monthly.

NOTE.—This is to be posted in stations and other suitable places throughout the field.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Whitehead, do you desire to make a statement?

Mr. WHITEHEAD. Yes, Mr. Chairman; I would like to say a few words.

STATEMENT OF HAROLD H. WHITEHEAD, SECRETARY-CHAIRMAN EMPLOYEES' REPRESENTATIVES OF THE CARTER OIL CO., SEMINOLE, OKLA.

The CHAIRMAN. Where do you live, Mr. Whitehead?

Mr. WHITEHEAD. Seminole, Okla.

The CHAIRMAN. By whom are you employed?

Mr. WHITEHEAD. The Carter Oil Co.

The CHAIRMAN. In what capacity?

Mr. WHITEHEAD. I am a pumper in occupation, and I am our secretary-chairman of the employees' representatives of my division.

The CHAIRMAN. You have a similar organization to the one described by the last witness?

Mr. WHITEHEAD. The same thing, practically.

The CHAIRMAN. How many members are there in that organization?

Mr. WHITEHEAD. In the State, 1,150 employees.

The CHAIRMAN. Is your testimony similar as that of the last witness?

Mr. WHITEHEAD. Yes; other than that, I would like to point out the benefits, since the question was asked as to how much authority and how far the employees' representatives would go in order to get the benefits in settling grievances. We have settled these grievances from time to time, and no employees have lost their jobs on account of that. We have had the plan over 14 years.

The CHAIRMAN. You have had entire satisfaction in settling grievances?

Mr. WHITEHEAD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The plan is satisfactory to your men?

Mr. WHITEHEAD. Yes, sir. I was elected February 28 by the employees' representatives as their secretary through balloting in locked balloting boxes.

The CHAIRMAN. I suppose you are appearing here for the purpose of trying to have this bill, if enacted, to have no provisions that would affect your organization?

Mr. WHITEHEAD. Yes, sir; the same as Mr. Cartwright represented.

The CHAIRMAN. We thank you for your appearance before us, and we will consider your suggestions.

The labor men who are here will please come forward, those representing the workers in Pennsylvania.

STATEMENT OF THOMAS BRESLAN, REPRESENTING BEAVER LODGE OF THE AMALGAMATED ASSOCIATION OF IRON, STEEL, AND TIN WORKERS, LODGE NO. 200, ALIQUIPPA, PA.

The CHAIRMAN. Will you state your full name for the record?
Mr. BRESLAN. My full name is Thomas Breslan.
The CHAIRMAN. Where do you reside?
Mr. BRESLAN. Aliquippa, Pa.
The CHAIRMAN. By whom are you employed?
Mr. BRESLAN. The Jones & Laughlin steel plant.
The CHAIRMAN. Are you employed there now?
Mr. BRESLAN. Yes, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. Accompanying you here are some other gentlemen?
Mr. BRESLAN. Yes; six, altogether, of us.
The CHAIRMAN. Do you want to put their names in the record?
Mr. BRESLAN. Yes, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. Will you please state their names?
Mr. BRESLAN. They are Harry Phillips, Oliver Atalah, Mike Keller, Tony Riccitelli, and John Feola.
The CHAIRMAN. You are all workers in this plant, and you belong to what organization?
Mr. BRESLAN. We belong to the Amalgamated Association of Iron, Steel, and Tin Workers, Beaver Valley Lodge No. 200.
The CHAIRMAN. How many members have you in that lodge?
Mr. BRESLAN. We have 5,450 members, signed up.
The CHAIRMAN. How many are there in the whole plant?
Mr. BRESLAN. Six thousand five hundred, the last statement we had.
The CHAIRMAN. Have you had an election for the purpose of determining who is to represent the workers there?
Mr. BRESLAN. No, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. Why has there not been any election?
Mr. BRESLAN. The trial board turned it down in Aliquippa, the labor board.
The CHAIRMAN. The labor board in your district?
Mr. BRESLAN. Yes.
The CHAIRMAN. Is there any other group negotiating for collective bargaining?
Mr. BRESLAN. The company union representatives up there.
The CHAIRMAN. They were here yesterday?
Mr. BRESLAN. Yesterday or the day before.
The CHAIRMAN. And they claimed to represent a majority of the workers?
Mr. BRESLAN. They claim to represent 90 percent.
The CHAIRMAN. You claim to represent a majority of the workers?
Mr. BRESLAN. And we have the books and papers here to show it.
The CHAIRMAN. When was the last election held?
Mr. BRESLAN. In the company? It was last June.
The CHAIRMAN. Did the members of your organization vote in that election?
Mr. BRESLAN. They had to vote.
The CHAIRMAN. Did you elect any of your members?
Mr. BRESLAN. We were not organized at that time.

The CHAIRMAN. You have been organized since last June?

Mr. BRESLAN. Since July; we started.

The CHAIRMAN. When is the next election?

Mr. BRESLAN. I could not tell you when it is.

The CHAIRMAN. They have one once a year?

Mr. BRESLAN. One once a year, I believe.

The CHAIRMAN. Can't you go in at the next election and ballot for your men and elect them, and then take over the whole organization?

Mr. BRESLAN. We will pretty near have the whole employees in the mill anyhow by that time.

The CHAIRMAN. I take it you think your employers ought to negotiate with you rather than with the representatives who appeared here 2 or 3 days ago. Is that right?

Mr. BRESLAN. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. Isn't that an easy way for you to get a hold, in the next election to elect your own men, then call a meeting of all of the employees and show that you are in control of a majority of the plant?

Mr. BRESLAN. The company representatives are not allowed to hold any meetings with the men.

The CHAIRMAN. If you have a majority and get control of all of the representatives, you can call a meeting, you haven't got to be bound by the company?

Mr. BRESLAN. Yes; you are bound by the company. These representatives down here are claiming 90 percent, and they never call any meeting.

The CHAIRMAN. What will there be at the next election, which will come in June, perhaps, in 2 or 3 months, to prevent you from electing your own men, then, after they are elected, call a meeting and start your organization?

Mr. BRESLAN. We have started our organization now.

The CHAIRMAN. Then you have your regular organization, and you can have it to do your collective bargaining?

Mr. BRESLAN. If you take a ballot, you are voting for a company union. It says that right on the bottom.

The CHAIRMAN. The moment your representatives who are elected are all from your union, you can then be in control of the representatives for negotiating with your employers, and you can go to the employers and show that you represent a majority of the workers and all of the representatives are elected by your union.

Mr. W. C. HUSHING (registration representative of the American Federation of Labor). Mr. Chairman, may I say something here?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly.

Mr. HUSHING. I want to explain what is in point here. On last Tuesday certain employees of Jones & Laughlin Corporation came from Aliquippa, Pa., and appeared before this committee as representatives of the company union, and they claimed to be representing 90 percent of the employees.

The CHAIRMAN. They were elected last June?

Mr. HUSHING. So he states, but I do not know anything about that. They came here without any instructions whatsoever from the employees, because I understand from these men that the company union representatives are not permitted to hold meetings of employees but only meetings of the representatives held with officials of the company, and at that time they received their instructions from the officials of the company.

Now, what may happen next June is not in point here. The committee is considering reporting out a bill and these company union representatives came here at the instigation of the company and made certain statements which these gentlemen desire to refute.

The CHAIRMAN. All you want to do, then, is to show that they do not represent a majority of the employees, and that you are in favor of this bill?

Mr. HUSHING. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. I thought you wanted to get recognized as the representatives of the employees for the purpose of collective bargaining.

Mr. HUSHING. The point is they do not want these company unions to come down here and make it appear the employees of that company are not in favor of this bill, when they have the books with them, if you care to look at them, to show that they have 5,450 men in the employ of this company, and 500 additional not employed on account of lack of work.

The CHAIRMAN. The point I am making is, if you have that number of men you ought now to be doing the collective bargaining and not the other organization.

Mr. HUSHING. Certainly, that is correct.

Mr. BRESLAN. They are doing that, and they are coming down with a statement against the Wagner bill, also.

The CHAIRMAN. They were asked in the examination if they represented the employees, and they stated they did not, that there had only been a meeting of the representatives and they were only instructed by the representatives. There is no evidence from any of the groups that there was any instruction that they represent all of the employees. I do think they gave the impression they were instructed to appear for all of the employees.

Senator WAGNER. You had no meeting of any kind where you gentlemen had a chance to express your views about this legislation?

Mr. BRESLAN. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. They practically all admitted that; but they did inferentially lead you to believe all of the employees were in favor of continuing their present plan.

You say there are 5,000 of your employees that are in favor of the bill and who repudiate the statements made by the others that the employees want to continue the union. Is that right?

Mr. BRESLAN. That is correct.

Senator WAGNER. You have the book with you to prove the membership in your organization?

Mr. BRESLAN. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. RICCITELLI. Mr. Chairman, about the next election, they might hold the next election in the mill, and the election will be on company property; all of the employees will be driven to the polls, whether they want to vote or not. There has been discrimination from the beginning; and, in fact, there are even men fired for nothing; and, in fact, we have some cases where men have been fired just lately for the least little thing, without any reason whatsoever. Our men are scared; and they have—this company—spies all over the street following us.

The day they found we were going to start to Washington the company fellows were following me personally, and I can verify that statement, from corner to corner until I got into the car and we started on our journey from there over here.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the reason why this bill is being agitated and being offered here, because it is seeking to prevent men from being coerced by the employers because they choose some other kind of organization than the employers want.

Mr. RICCITELLI. We have two men here who were beat up by the company men.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Phillips, did you want to make a statement?

Mr. PHILLIPS. I want to say we would never get a fair count on an election in the mill under present conditions that exist there. To explain why, the representatives that are now in power are switched around to count every one of the votes, together with the timekeepers, who are just young fellows.

The CHAIRMAN. When this bill is passed you will have an opportunity to ask for an election, under the terms of the bill, that will be free from domination of the employer. That is one of the reasons why you favor this bill, as I understand it?

Mr. PHILLIPS. Yes, sir; it is.

Mr. BRESLAN. We want to show you they have not got 90 percent, and they are against the bill, while we have over 5,000 men that are in favor of it.

The CHAIRMAN. As I recall, they gave evidence that there was no such substantial number of fellow employees connected with an organization other than their own.

Thank you, gentlemen, for your appearance, and the information you have given us.

At this time I desire to have inserted in the record a telegram I have received today, together with a note which is attached thereto, in connection with the hearing on this bill.

(The said telegram and note attached thereto are as follows:)

MARCH 29, 1935.

WILLIAM CASH,
Willard Hotel, Washington, D. C.:

Eight hundred and ninety-one for strike; 11,516 against strike. Please call me 11:30 a. m.

FRED CLIMER.

THE WILLARD HOTEL,
Washington, D. C.

Mr. CHAIRMAN: At yesterday's hearings a committee representing the Goodyear Industrial Assembly, who were here to oppose the Wagner labor disputes bill, brought up the point that the labor union of the Goodyear Local 18282, and which was represented here by John D. House, had asked for a strike vote to be taken Sunday, March 31.

The employees asked that such a vote be taken also. Which was done by the Goodyear Industrial Assembly by a secret ballot. The results were 811 for a strike and 11,516 against.

The union's only grievance was refusal of recognition by the Goodyear management.

THE GOODYEAR INDUSTRIAL ASSEMBLY OF AKRON, OHIO, Employees of the Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., Committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The hearing will be adjourned until 10 o'clock next Monday morning.

(Thereupon, at 5:15 p. m., the hearing was adjourned until Monday, Apr. 1, 1935, at 10 a. m.)

NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD

MONDAY, APRIL 1, 1935

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION AND LABOR,
Washington, D. C.

The committee met at 10 a. m., in room 318 Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

Present: Senators Walsh (chairman), Black, Murphy, Murray, and Metcalf.

Also present: Senator Wagner.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will please come to order. Will Mr. Lederer please come forward.

STATEMENT OF E. R. LEDERER, CHAIRMAN OF LABOR SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE PLANNING AND COORDINATING COMMITTEE FOR THE PETROLEUM INDUSTRY

The CHAIRMAN. What is your full name, please?

Mr. LEDERER. E. R. Lederer.

The CHAIRMAN. And what is your residence?

Mr. LEDERER. At the present time, Washington, D. C.

The CHAIRMAN. What is your permanent local residence?

Mr. LEDERER. Fort Worth, Tex.

The CHAIRMAN. You are vice president of the Texas & Pacific Coal & Oil Co.?

Mr. LEDERER. Yes, Mr. Chairman; but I appear here for the planning and coordination committee of the petroleum industry, which is the code authority of the petroleum industry.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you represent all of the members of that code authority?

Mr. LEDERER. Yes, sir. I do not represent the individual company at the present time, at all.

The CHAIRMAN. How many persons are governed by that code authority?

Mr. LEDERER. One million two hundred thousand employees.

The CHAIRMAN. How many different companies?

Mr. LEDERER. Supposedly all of the enterprises in the industry, which is something over 3,000.

The CHAIRMAN. You desire to make a statement in opposition to this bill.

Mr. LEDERER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed with the statement.

Mr. LEDERER. Mr. Chairman, and gentlemen of the Senate Committee on Education and Labor, I have been requested by the planning and coordination committee, representing the code authority for the petroleum industry, to present to you the attitude of the petroleum industry toward the Wagner bill, S. 1958.

As you gentlemen know, the petroleum industry is composed of many thousand units operating either in one, several, or all branches of the industry; that is, production of crude oil, transportation, refining, and marketing. The size of these units varies from the small producer on one lease to large companies owning thousands of barrels of daily production, distributed all over the producing fields of the country. Only large companies can engage in transportation of crude oil, because it requires a very large investment. In refining we find plants ranging from 50 barrels a day crude capacity, with the most modern up-to-date efficient equipment, which represent investments of many millions of dollars. In the marketing branch, we find the small filling station operator, medium-size distributors, generally covering just one or two States with either wholesale or retail operations or both, and the large distributors, operating in many or most of the 48 States of the Union. The industry has 320,000 oil wells producing under proration—in most districts—about 2½ million barrels of crude a day. Of these wells, 250,000 represent settled production, averaging not much over one barrel of crude per well a day, and employing approximately 60 to 70 thousand men. These wells are the backbone of the industry, because they will produce a long time after the 70 thousand flush-wells have exhausted their production.

We have about 640 refineries and 313,000 retail outlets, beside 20,000 wholesale distributing plants. All these units are owned by individuals or smaller companies and only 22 corporations can be considered as the real major integrated companies, covering with their various operations the entire United States.

This industry employs approximately 1,200,000 persons, receiving a total monthly pay roll of about $130,800,000. It is the only industry which, even during the depression, has maintained its sales level practically even and has shown a small increase during the last 2 years. I am also safe in stating that this industry has always maintained more regular operations and fewer disruptions in employment than any other industry. Labor relations in the industry have always been harmonious. Strikes of considerable size have been unknown, and only since the inception of the code have we experienced sporadic strikes in the industry. This very fortunate relationship between employer and employee in our industry can be attributed only to the consideration and understanding which employers and employees have shown for each other.

The majority of our employees make a fair living, and I know, especially during the last lean years, in the smaller units, employer and employee shared frequently the income from the business so that both could subsist. Even the medium-size and larger units have continued their operations, in spite of heavy losses, often only in order to maintain their employees on the pay roll. The labor turnover in our industry is very small, with the exception of a few migratory crafts like drillers, rig builders, and part of our unskilled labor. The skilled employees, obtaining comparatively high wages, are settled and stay with their companies and employers.

Under the National Recovery Act the industry has its own oil administrator, the Secretary of the Interior, who delegates most of the details of supervision to the Petroleum Administrative Board. Our labor conditions are regulated by the Petroleum Labor Policy Board. I am glad to state that during the 18 months of the existence of the Petroleum Code our relations have been mostly harmonious and based on mutual understanding.

Our industry, like all other industries, although unaccustomed to regimentation before the advent of the code, managed to adapt itself quickly to the new trend, and has cooperated in most cases whole-heartedly with the administrator. We have reabsorbed, during the year of May 1933 to May 1934, 217,200 persons, an increase in employment of 39.5 percent, and taking May 1929 as 100 percent, our employment has increased to 107.7 percent. The pay roll is practically equal to the 1929 pay roll, and in "real wages", it is 107.2 percent. In 1930 the percentage of labor costs of total refinery operations, for instance, was 17.24 percent. In the first 3 months of 1933 it was 27 percent, and in the first 3 months of 1934, 32 percent. The average working week of all our employees in the different branches is approximately 39 hours, ranging from 36 hours in the operating branches to 48 hours in filling stations. Our minimum wages are almost at the top of all code wages, and wages for skilled men are based on a percentage average of about 80 percent of 1929, or peak, weekly earnings.

Labor disputes in our industry since the enforcement of the code have not been, in most cases, of a serious nature. Of course, it is only human that certain employers insisted on their former paternalistic privilege of dealing unhampered by outside influence with their employees. Others again were confronted with an increase in operating expenses which ranged anywhere from 20 to 40 percent, in the face of very low values of the finished products, produced from crude, that they either had to cease their operations or take their employees in their confidence and arrange with them, through collective bargaining, hours and wages not exactly in conformity with the code. Complaints about such arrangements came mostly from outside sources, and when brought to our attention could be settled under section 4 (a), article I of the Petroleum Code, providing exceptions for such extreme conditions. Sweat-shop conditions have never existed in our industry and "stretch-out" or "free-wheeling", over which complaints have been made very frequently, has been explained by respondents in most cases as being due either to extreme economic conditions, changes in operating conditions, or technical progress, which will never cease and very often means the end of an old-established handicraft.

I have imposed on your patience in order to give you this very brief picture of our industry so you can appreciate that labor conditions in our industry, as a whole, have been favorable, and labor organizations have not recruited many members in the four branches of the industry. Even at the present time the many local unions which have been formed under the auspices of the International Association of Oil Field, Gas Well, and Refinery Workers of America have a comparatively small membership, and are concentrated only in the larger centers of the industry, which are not very numerous.

In most of the major companies the employees have formed councils or representations which are not commonly called "company unions"; their employees receive 1 or 2 weeks' vacation at full pay according to length of service; most companies of any size at all have group insurance and other benefits for their men, safety organizations, and are most anxious to maintain healthy and safe working conditions. Large and small producers have always maintained houses on leases. In the larger producing areas you will find well-equipped camps, and smaller or larger colonies near refineries, when they are situated any distance from the nearest town, where the employees live in comparative comfort, at low rent and a very nominal charge for utilities.

Naturally, we have no accurate information, but before the Cole committee Mr. Fremming, president of the International Oil Workers Association, stated that his association numbered 81,000 members, which would be only from 6 to 7 percent of all persons employed in the oil industry; but probably several thousand service-station employees belong to Service Station Attendants Unions in a few of the large cities, and a number of mechanical employees belong to craft unions.

The majority of the industry has not shown serious resistance to section 7, article II of our code, which is identical with section 7 (a) of the National Industrial Recovery Act. From my experience on the labor subcommittee, I know that violations have been mostly based on misinterpretation or the wrong attitude by either labor or local management, and through the good services of the petroleum labor policy board and our labor subcommittee, we have been able, in most cases, to arrange an amicable settlement.

I am not qualified to enter into the legal aspects of the Wagner disputes bill. I can only look at it from the practical point of view, and after studying the bill, visualize its consequences in our own industry. The President probably recognized that the petroleum industry was unique and different in its many ramifications, and placed it under a separate administration; therefore, a standardization of all industry as proposed by this bill seems practically impossible to us. We have found it necessary so many times in order to maintain smaller units and employment therein alive, to ask for and receive exceptions, that an iron-clad law like this bill proposes will mean the death knell of many small enterprises and consequent unemployment. The larger units cannot absorb all these men who will be thrown out of work, and these men with their families will increase the number of unemployed and become a burden to public charity.

I can further interpret this law only as placing the United States Government behind the American Federation of Labor, that is, in our industry, the International Oil Workers Union, representing at present only a very small minority of our employees, will become the ruler of labor and influence all labor relations, in spite of the statement of the N. R. A. Administrator that "this administration is not to be used for unionizing any industry." (Release No. 5, June 20, 1933.) The "company union" will be outlawed, and all the benefits which such organizations actually have for their employees will cease and the men enjoying them will be deprived of these advantages.

Of course, I realize other bills pending which are intended to protect them ultimately against unemployment and private old-age relief, et cetera, but I am not so sure these general relief bills will be an adequate compensation for the loss these men will suffer. It is only natural that existing labor organizations will take the fullest possible advantage of this bill and force, by all means, those employees in the industry who do not belong to the union at present to join. We have heard about intimidation and coercion by employers and have been branded as violators and lawbreakers so many times that this bill will impair our integrity and honesty only further and very unjustly so. I can assure you from my own experience and knowledge that coercion and intimidation have been applied much more frequently and often very forcefully by employees who have been harangued by fiery orators, often not even belonging to the industry, and I am afraid such methods will be used to much larger degree in the future if this law goes into effect in its present form. Not that it is the intent of the law nor the intent of the officials of the Oil Workers' Union, but they cannot control ambitious and misled members far away from headquarters.

Subdivision 3 of section 7 of the bill states that it is illegal for an employer to discriminate in hiring men, but goes on to state that a closed-shop contract is not discrimination; this seems very inconsistent to us, and certainly can be interpreted as opening the door for the controversial "closed shop" contract.

The "majority rule" propounded in this bill seems to us very un-American and the forerunner of the "closed shop", which, according to previous statements made by highest authorities of the National Recovery Administration, was supposed to "have no agreed meaning and no place in the dictionary of the National Recovery Administration."

It certainly seems to be coercion of the cruelest kind to force a minority, unwilling to pay the dues and submit to the bylaws of labor organization, either to join in order to be permitted to earn a livelihood or to be deprived of a job.

In the strife for superiority which is bound to come, the old-established and fine spirit of loyalty to the company and its products, which, in my opinion, is one of the greatest assets an employer could create and possess, will be extinguished. Instead of it, a broad and deep gap will be forced between employer and employee, and this bill will have to bridge it. I do not believe it will be successful in accomplishing this, because the harder the law infringes on our idea of liberty the more firmly people will turn to evasions, subterfuges, and chiseling, which were created by previous impossible and unpopular laws.

Subdivision 2 of section 8 of this bill would work a hardship on the industry as a whole should the Board be in the least unfriendly and rule in such a manner that all employees would be conferring during the full working hours on all working days with the management without arriving at a settlement, which, in fact, would constitute a strike financed by the company.

Subdivision 3 of the same section would work a hardship on any minority for the same reasons. They may present grievances but cannot elect representatives or make agreements.

Subdivision B of section 9 could be used by an unfriendly Board to cause independent unions or nondominated existing "company unions" to lose an election and create a condition where the industry would not know with which organization to conduct negotiations.

Subdivision D of section 10 would tend to keep disputes constantly open, harass the employer and deprive him of time and thought to do constructive work and build up his business, which is most necessary in order to keep employees on the pay roll.

Subdivisions F and G of section 10 throw all established practice and precedents overboard and vest this Board or its local boards and agencies it can create with legal authority and power of enforcement superior to that of any existing labor board or agency.

This bill can be so interpreted that nothing can prevent strikes; it will not be necessary for employees to give notice or consent to attempt an amicable settlement before striking.

The decisions of the Board are not controlled by legal evidence, but such evidence as the Board may develop can be based on rumors, hearsay, exaggerations, and so forth. The courts will have to accept such evidence developed by the Board or its agencies and therefore cannot consider questions of law.

We consider it as very arbitrary that the Board should be empowered to amend complaints and award restitutions without regular court proceedings provided by constitutional laws.

Under subdivision C of section 12, it seems that industry is bound, but labor is explicitly released from being amenable to the proposed law.

Section 13 permits unnecessary meddling in private business, could cause the flouting of trade secrets, and result in making public knowledge all details of the employer's business which unscrupulous competitors might be very anxious to know; in fact, this section might place all industries in the status of public utilities.

Section 15 simply places employers at the mercy of any labor group which might find means to take undue advantage of the provisions of the bill.

Samuel Gompers himself, the greatest leader labor ever had, stated on August 20, 1922:

> Whenever governmental industrial courts or tribunals are set up, the principle of litigation is substituted for the principle and practice of negotiations, conciliations, and joint agreements, which obtain wherever voluntary relations exist between workers and employers. A spirit of enmity and suspicion is substituted at once for the spirit of cooperation, conciliation, and mutual agreement * * *. This principle is wrong and the practice is disastrous.

It seems that all the burden under this bill is placed on the industry and the employers. Our existing laws, I am told, have not much power to reach labor organizations, in case they should abuse their economic power and strength this bill intends to give them. The American Federation of Labor and their affiliated or subordinate labor organizations are voluntary unincorporated associations. They are accorded certain privileges and exemptions in various acts of Congress, though suable according to decision of the Supreme Court in the case of the United Mine Workers of America v. Coronado Co., in which Chief Justice Taft observed that it would be unfortunate that an organization with as great power as this international union, with a membership of 450,000 at that time, could use its assets free from liability for injuries by torts committed in course of such strikes and that such organizations are suable in the Federal courts for their acts and that funds accumulated to be expended in conducting strikes are subject to execution in suits for damages committed by such unions. However, not all labor organizations are that large or have sufficient funds so that even a successful suit could not reimburse industry for the damage done to factories or other enterprises by sabotage. Repairs to such destruction are frequently very costly.

We have no law to prevent frivolous, unjust strikes, and I personally heard it frequently stated by officers of international unions that sometimes important decisions in controversies must be left to the local unions and that the members of these locals are beyond the control of the international headquarters.

If this law is intended to give labor organizations such a far-reaching authority, it certainly should provide also for full responsibility of the individual labor organization. Our existing laws provide that individuals, corporations, and trade associations, through their members, can be sued for damages and prosecuted for violations of the law, but as I understand the situation, it would be futile to attempt to sue either one of the international associations or unions and certainly much more so, small local unions. So far, the employer is the only responsible party.

As the bill stands now, it will, in our opinion, encourage disputes and strikes, unrest, and disrupt the progress industry has made in reemployment and the improvement of our economic situation. Apparent stability labor relations have reached under our code, will certainly be disturbed, and additional demands, which most of the units in the industry cannot meet under existing economic conditions, will be made upon industry.

Since the courts have held lately that the production of commodities, regardless of the ultimate disposition, is intrastate and not interstate commerce, this bill when passed will force the industry to break up into State units, just sufficiently large to meet the demands within the individual States, and divest itself of any interstate status.

Business has been in a quandary over national legislation and policies in the past, but depending on the apparent desire of the administration "not to rock the boat" has recently taken some heart, and this reaction is noted in the upward swing. You cannot bludgeon violators who abuse labor by such bills as this, as it strikes not only at the culprit, but penalizes the upright, law-abiding companies; and I am convinced that the latter form the large majority in our industry at least. The passage of this measure will certainly retard recovery by the uncertainty of its effect on industry in general.

In connection with the foregoing statement, I desire to submit the following statistical data showing labor conditions in the petroleum industry in 1929 and May 1934, as reported to the National Industrial Recovery Board during the hearing on employment provisions in codes of fair competition, beginning on January 30, 1935, to wit:

1. Working hours as prescribed by the Petroleum Code.

Thirty-six per week for nonclerical employees in oil-field, pipe-line, and refining operations.

Forty per week for nonclerical employees in marketing operations other than service stations.

Forty per week for all clerical employees in all operations.

Forty-eight per week for all employees in retail service stations.

2. Minimum hourly rates for unskilled labor in—

(a) Oil field, pipe line, and refining operations range from 45 cents in the South to 52 cents in North and Pacific coast.

(b) Marketing wholesale operations: 40 cents in the South and 47 cents in North and Pacific coast.

(In both group minimum full-time weekly earnings range from $16 in the South to $18.75 in the North and Pacific coast.)

(c) Retail marketing (filling stations): Minimum weekly wages range from $14 to $15 per week, according to the population.

(d) Bureau of Labor Statistics average weekly per capita earnings in oil field and refining operations from September 1, 1933, to November 1, 1934, $25.43 to $28.43.

3. Total employment as of May 1934.

In all branches of the petroleum industry, 1,197,000 persons; total monthly pay roll, $130,779,000.

4. Reduction of hours per week of all classes of workers as compared with 1929, 16.7 percent.

5. Increase in employment in May 1934, compared with May 1933 (before code), 39.5 percent—compared with May 1929 as 100 percent, 7.7 percent.

6. General average of "real wages" (equivalent purchasing wages) relative to 1929 as 100 percent, 107.2 percent.

7. Reemployment from May 1933 to May 1934, 217,200 persons.

8. Increase in pay rolls during same period at the rate of $230,000,000 per annum, or 17.3 percent, or 1.33 cents per gallon gasoline sold.

9. Percentage of labor cost of total refinery operating expenses of 44 refineries in the Middle West and Southwest:

First 3 months, 1933, 27 percent; first 3 months, 1934, 32 percent; total United States in 1930, 17.24 percent.

10. Net return shown by standard statistics for 18 major companies: 1929, 8.39 percent profit; 1930, 2.50 percent profit; 1931, 2.25 percent deficit; 1932, 0.30 percent profit; 1933, 0.78 percent profit; 1934 (6 months), 1.13 percent profit.

11. Wholesale commodity index for January 1935 (1926=100): All commodities, 78.8; petroleum products, 48.8.

Senator WAGNER. Have you completed your statement?

Mr. LEDERER. Yes, sir.

Senator WAGNER. I want to ask some questions. Are you a member of the code authority?

Mr. LEDERER. I am chairman of the labor subcommittee, devoting my entire time to this important problem, and I live here in Washington.

Senator WAGNER. Are you one of the code authority of this industry?

Mr. LEDERER. No; I am not one of the 21 members of the planning and coordination committee, but I am authorized to represent, as chairman of the labor subcommittee, the planning and coordination committee here at this hearing.

Senator WAGNER. I understood you to say that in the beginning you were connected with the code authority.

Mr. LEDERER. No; I am chairman of the labor subcommittee of the planning and coordination committee of the industry, which is the Code Authority of the Petroleum Industry.

Senator WAGNER. Are you connected with the administration of the code in any way, officially?

Mr. LEDERER. In the governmental administration?

Senator WAGNER. You have a code, have you not?

Mr. LEDERER. We have a code; and under this code two agencies were set up, one by the President in representing the industry, which is called the "Planning and Coordination Committee", to which I belong as chairman of the labor subcommittee; and the other is the Petroleum Administration Board under Mr. Fahey, and a separate labor-policy board consisting of Dr. Stocking and two others.

Senator WAGNER. Do you believe in labor organizations?

Mr. LEDERER. I believe in them if they are properly managed. I believe they are beneficial if they are properly managed.

Senator WAGNER. Your observations did not indicate that.

Mr. LEDERER. I do not want to create an erroneous impression. I was asked the question if I am for the bill or against the bill, and I am not here to express any more than my opinion. I believe labor legislation is necessary under existing conditions. The industry is just as much socially conscious, and entertains just as much feeling for the employees as the labor organizations. Our relations with labor organizations here in Washington, and while I am still active in the industry, have been satisfactory.

Senator WAGNER. I have asked you a simple question, as to whether you favor labor organizations; do you or do you not? Can you answer that?

Mr. LEDERER. I can answer it in saying labor organizations are good, but I consider labor organizations also what you call now the "company unions", which are not under the coercion or any possible influence of the management, but created by free will and managed by representatives of the employees selected by themselves without any coercion or intimidation. I, of course, consider them also labor organizations.

Senator WAGNER. What in this bill would prevent the creation of such labor organization? What provision in this proposed bill would prevent the creation of such an organization as you speak of, as being the free choice of the workers?

Mr. LEDERER. The provision in here which in our opinion more or less legalizes the closed shop.

Senator WAGNER. Let me ask you candidly, is that the provision of the law which you say would be destructive of the so-called "company union", and not dominated?

Mr. LEDERER. This provision, in our opinion, more or less legalizes the closed shop.

Senator WAGNER. Is that the provision of the law which you think is destructive of the company union plan?

Mr. LEDERER. I gave in my brief several points of objection.

Senator WAGNER. I listened patiently to what I regard as clear misinterpretation on your part. That is a matter of opinion between you and I, and I will not ask you any questions if you do not want me to.

Mr. LEDERER. Yes; I would be glad for you to ask the questions.

Senator WAGNER. I am asking a very simple question, it seems to me, what provision of the bill is destructive of these unions you just spoke of that you favored.

Mr. LEDERER. I feel especially that the part of the bill which covers the closed shop is dangerous.

Senator WAGNER. Can I have this answer from you, that it is the provision of the closed shop which is in this act that you say you oppose as being destructive of these company unions?

Mr. LEDERER. Yes.

Senator WAGNER. The bill as it reads now simply permits the closed-shop agreement to be made where they are made now. What State are you from?

Mr. LEDERER. Texas.

Senator WAGNER. Are closed-shop agreements legal in Texas?

Mr. LEDERER. I am not a lawyer, I could not answer.

Senator WAGNER. I might say to you they are legal in most States, or in many States. This closed-shop provision in the bill is all a matter of agreement, and no employer needs to enter into a closed-shop agreement unless he wishes to.

Mr. LEDERER. No; but it is the desire of the labor organizations to force the employer into it.

Senator WAGNER. We have many States now which recognize a closed-shop agreement as a legal institution.

Mr. LEDERER. The industry opposes a closed-shop agreement.

Senator WAGNER. In what way does this proposed legislation change the status of things at the present time? Are there not a number of closed-shop agreements outstanding today, which are made as the result of agreement between the employer and employee?

Mr. LEDERER. I do not believe they exist in our industry.

Senator WAGNER. If they do not, there is nothing here to force them upon industry, because it provides that not only must the employer, those you represent here, agree to it, but a majority of the workers must agree to it before it becomes legal.

Mr. LEDERER. Senator Wagner, from my own experience in the field, where I have always been very close to labor, having been one of them and worked my way up—for 31 years I have been in the oil industry, I know it is not what the word of the law is, it is not the intent, which is absolutely sincere we have no doubt, but it is the consequences of misinterpretations which are already under the National Recovery Act and our code, are being placed on the law, and which, certainly to a large degree will be read into this law, if it is passed.

Senator WAGNER. I just stated a moment ago that the closed-shop agreement, under this bill, must be consented to and agreed to by the employer before it can become legal, which is the law today in most of our States where closed-shop agreements are recognized. It is a matter of agreement and cannot be forced upon anybody.

Mr. LEDERER. You remember, sir, the decision made by our own labor policy board, for instance, in the Magnolia case, where the union insisted upon an agreement. You can also take into consideration the Shell case in California just recently, which had been operated like the Magnolia, under a company council, and recently an election was held at the Shell Co., and by changing the method in which the votes were counted certain branches of the industry showed a majority of their employees wanted the council to continue, where others wanted union representation, but by taking the vote, by the decision of the labor policy board, over the entire State, and not by branches, I believe that a majority of 51.6 percent were found to vote for the union to make an agreement with the company as to working conditions, and forced those employees, in spite of the fact they were in the majority in the production department, for instance, or in the designing department, or any other department, to submit to having the union representation.

Senator WAGNER. I do not know what that has to do with the question. I do not want to question you at any great lenth, if you mean what you say that your whole position in this long statement you read is based upon the closed-shop provision in this act.

Mr. LEDERER. Yes; and all of the power which the new Labor Relations Board will have. I covered many points in my statement, not only the closed shop.

Senator WAGNER. What other particular provision is there in the bill to object to?

Mr. LEDERER. We object to the power which this bill, in our opinion, without consulting any attorney, gives to the Labor Relations Board. This Labor Relations Board can create agencies and other boards, and they can hear evidence, not legal evidence as we understand it which is heard in court, but they can present evidence which is based on rumors, hearsay, exaggeration, and then amend a complaint and render judgment, thereby, in our opinion, giving that Board the authority of a court.

Senator WAGNER. That is the other objection?

Mr. LEDERER. Yes.

Senator WAGNER. I might tell you that the Interstate Commerce Commission Act has a provision like that, the Federal Trade Commission Act has a provision of that kind, the Communications Commission Act has a provision of that kind, that the Board is not bound by legal rules of evidence, and I think every public-utility commission act of any State in the country has a similar provision, so as not to strictly bind the board in ascertaining the facts.

Would the fact that has been accepted as a universal rule in the establishment of these quasi judicial bodies change your mind about that?

Mr. LEDERER. No, Senator, it would not. We do not want to be a public utility.

Senator WAGNER. Every act where we created a quasi-judicial body like this, has a similar provision. For instance, the Federal Trade Commission has such a provision, and you know something about that.

Mr. LEDERER. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Are they bound by the rules of evidence?

Mr. LEDERER. I would not dare to argue with you about that, Senator.

Senator WAGNER. I am telling you we followed in that regard what has been the universally accepted rule in the establishment of these boards. Would you favor the bill if it limited the board to the taking of legal evidence?

Mr. LEDERER. I would favor labor legislation which will clear up and strictly define the relations of employer and employee, which is fair and just to both parties.

Senator WAGNER. Perhaps we can get at it in this way. You said you favor section 7 (a), and included it in your code?

Mr. LEDERER. Yes, sir.

Senator WAGNER. What is there in 7 (a) that is not in here, or what is there in here which is not in 7 (a), except we provide for enforcement. It may be some would like to have section 7 (a) set forth, but without any attempt to enforce those provisions?

Mr. LEDERER. There is no use making a law without providing for enforcing it, and that is one of the greatest disadvantages as to the Petroleum Code, it has permitted certain members of the industry—not speaking about labor, but in general—to go on and violate the code and profit by it, while the conscientious law-abiding companies have suffered.

Senator WAGNER. I agree with you, that has been one of the difficulties.

Mr. LEDERER. That is correct. I am sorry I am taking up so much of your time with my statement.

Senator WAGNER. No; I am being enlightened. I do want to ask you a few questions, unless I should annoy you, and then I will stop.

Mr. LEDERER. No, not at all. I cannot argue with you about legal questions, but practical questions I can.

Senator WAGNER. Under 7 (a) workers should have a right freely and without interference from the employer, to choose their representatives whoever they may be, you believe in that?

Mr. LEDERER. Yes. I just want to say what we resent is interference by outsiders. We do not hesitate at all, and in fact actually have practiced for many years collective bargaining, even if it was not called that way, through committees and plant representatives.

The employee in our industry is well trained and intelligent men, and can take care of themselves, and in fact we want them to appoint intelligent men to represent them, so that we can sit with them across the table and put our financial statement on the table and say, "Boys, here is the result, if you do not believe our auditors, hire your own, and come in and check ours." All of these statements of large earning are confined to 16 or 18 of the so-called "major companies", the smaller one in the balance of the industry, which I tried to picture here to you this morning, as shown during a recent survey which Secretary Ickes had made, a loss of $140,000,000 to $180,000,000 in 1934.

I personally have intervened as the chairman of the labor subcommittee in many cases of complaints, and I am here to tell you I found our employees reasonable, and I have been able to make adjustments and give them back pay, where it was justified.

Senator WAGNER. I do not criticize that at all; in fact, I compliment you for having that relationship; and this bill is not intended to disturb that relationship at all.

Mr. LEDERER. But we are afraid it will disturb it.

Senator WAGNER. How will it do that?

Mr. LEDERER. By outsiders coming in.

Senator WAGNER. That cannot happen unless you give to the workers their free choice, and unless they have an election in which the employer does not dominate it at all but is the free choice of the worker, as to whether they select somebody from the outside or somebody from the inside. Isn't that what is provided in here?

Mr. LEDERER. Yes; but we prefer to deal with our own men who know the business.

Senator WAGNER. I am beginning now to understand your position. You are afraid that if you have an independent election the workers may select somebody from the outside to deal in their behalf rather than one of your employees?

Mr. LEDERER. No; we are not afraid of that, because we know that in most cases where the employees are left alone they will select their own men.

Senator WAGNER. Then there is not a thing in this bill to interfere with that; but, on the contrary, it protects you, because if there is a dispute as to who shall select the representatives, you have an election under governmental supervision, free from electioneering or anything of that kind, where a man walks into the booth and selects his own representative. That is what I call the tenets of democracy.

Mr. LEDERER. Yes; and expression of principle.

Senator WAGNER. I know this is not true in your case, but it is a ground of opposition of many that they want to confine the bargaining agency to somebody in the plant; and you recognize the fact that, in some cases at least, where the man is an employee who is dealing in behalf of the other employees there is that economic advantage the employer has, that if he does not like the individual he can say you are finished, your job is gone.

Mr. LEDERER. There is the Executive order by the President which prevents absolutely discrimination against any employee because he makes a complaint or is a witness, or directly or indirectly acts upon his fellow workers.

Senator WAGNER. Outside of the closed-shop agreement you spoke of, I have not as yet found out what there is in this bill which will destroy this company union, which you prefer.

Is that the provision you are apprehensive about, or is it something else in the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. As I interpret your objections, you have the impression that it seeks to regulate your relationship with your employees as the Government regulates the public utilities?

Mr. LEDERER. Yes, sir; that is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. And you do not want to be treated as a public utility?

Mr. LEDERER. That is correct; and if I may make one more statement, we feel our industry, being split up, scattered about and decentralized all over the country in so many large, small, and different sized enterprises, cannot be regulated and thrown into the hopper with other industries.

Senator WAGNER. Supposing, under the provisions of your code—I do not mean you individually—but suppose some one of the employers would deny the workers the right to an election to choose representatives, as you and I agree they are permitted to do under section 7 (a), what remedy have the workers?

Mr. LEDERER. That has happened, they appeal immediately to the labor policy board of the Department of the Interior, and they send a representative or agent down there to conduct the election, and in 10 days in case it was an adverse judgment the employer not agreeing with the stipulations of the code, then the case was turned over to the Department of Investigation, the Department of Justice.

Senator WAGNER. Supposing the employer refuses to hold an election or would not permit an election to be held, what would happen?

Mr. LEDERER. The Secretary of the Interior, the oil administrator, can turn the employer over to the Department of Justice for prosecution, and the nearest Federal district attorney takes him into court for violating section 7, article II of our code.

Senator WAGNER. In this case the Labor Board would hear the complaint, and the Labor Board would order the election to be held. That is the only difference.

Mr. LEDERER. If we understand the set-up of the Labor Board in this bill, it can be very unfriendly and a disturbing element in the industry.

Senator WAGNER. Is that what you are afraid of, it may be unfriendly?

Mr. LEDERER. Furthermore, we feel if we have to deal with representatives of our employees through local unions or international unions, we want them to be on the same level with us as far as the law is concerned.

Senator WAGNER. Of course, there was a case in which the steel board ordered an election to be held, and it has been in court for 7 or 8 months, and that is what happens when you go into the courts for review.

Mr. LEDERER. That is a matter for the wisdom of our Senators and Representatives, when there is a weakness in the law they can change it.

Senator WAGNER. That is what I am trying to do, I see that weakness.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there anything further, Mr. Lederer?

Mr. LEDERER. No, Mr. Chairman; I have nothing further to say.

The CHAIRMAN. Is Mr. Donald Comer present; please come forward, Mr. Comer?

STATEMENT OF DONALD COMER, OF BIRMINGHAM, ALA., REPRESENTING THE COTTON TEXTILE INSTITUTE

The CHAIRMAN. Your full name is Donald Comer?

Mr. COMER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And you reside where?

Mr. COMER. Birmingham, Ala.

The CHAIRMAN. What is your business?

Mr. COMER. Cotton manufacturer.

The CHAIRMAN. Where is your plant, in Alabama?

Mr. COMER. Yes, sir.

The Chairman. You are here representing the Cotton Textile Institute?

Mr. COMER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. How many manufacturers are there in that institute?

Mr. COMER. About 1,200.

The CHAIRMAN. Does it include the manufacturers from all sections of the country?

Mr. COMER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed.

Mr. COMER. I am not here to oppose the purposes of the Wagner bill. As an employer, I am anxious for every assistance toward a harmonious and successful operation of the business with which I am connected. I am just as anxious—just as eager as anyone to find a better means and method for accomplishing this result. As long, however, as we are dealing with plans made by human being, certainly there can be differing of opinions as to the best ways of doing things. I am sure that those who are proposing this particular plan are willing to ascribe to its opponents motives just as free from self-interest as their own.

One of the strongest arguments for delay in such legislation is the facts that there is an assumption of inimical interests between all employers and employees, and that all such relations must be regimented, right now, by law.

The Congress has constantly complained against lobbying by organized minorities, and it is the support of an organized minority today that is giving the strongest backing to this bill. If there could be the free choice that is proposed in it—if the employees of this country could have freedom of expression and protection from every outside selfish influence—then there might be justification for an attempt to hurry legislation in a matter like this, but records of the past clearly prove that this is utterly impossible. We all know that organized minorities have been most vocal in Washington, while the unorganized majorities, as a rule, have no special pleaders. There is a long road of education, of trial, and error ahead of the great army of people who work in this country. There are no doubt many of them who feel that there should be more ways than one available for arriving at a fair and satisfactory working relationship.

Senator WAGNER. You do not expect me to advocate it be made Republican, do you?

Mr. COMER. Maybe we can have some other party.

Senator MURPHY. Of course, you mean nationally; you do not mean just the State?

Mr. COMER. Yes, sir. Senator Black, I am not asking you to agree to this.

Senator BLACK. I don't think you want the Republican Party to run the United States, do you?

Mr. COMER. No, sir; I do not. I think the present administration, the present Democratic Party, has given to the South the first and only opportunity of economic freedom we have had since the Civil War in its program of giving us parity prices for our cotton.

President Roosevelt, on May 7, 1933, in speaking of our industry, the cotton-textile industry, said he felt sure that 90 percent of our employers were anxious to conduct their businesses honorably and fairly. One of the values which he mentioned at that time that would come from majority control was "to prevent an overproduction that would result in unsalable surpluses."

We feel that the Cotton Textile Code in establishing its four rules, provided adequate protection for this majority and adequate prevention against exploitation by the minority. These four rules established a minimum age, a minimum wage, a maximum week hour, and provision against uncontrolled production. General Johnson said that in these rules N. R. A. accomplished more than organized labor had done during its entire existence.

There is no one in this country happier over these gains than the textile industrial leaders, and they want them protected by the continuation of N. R. A. I am speaking about my own industry, because it is the one I know most about, and I speak of our code because I am a member of the code authority.

Maj. George Berry, president of the International Pressman's Union and division administrator of the N. R. A., and one of the ablest labor leaders in this country, in July 1934, at the Blue Ridge Industrial Conference, said:

> I have repeatedly paid my compliments to the courage, vision, and patriotism—the sort of patriotism I love to think about—of the men and women of the cotton-textile industry who were willing to meet this issue as the first ball to be pitched. These cotton-textile people walked up and said, "Try it on us." I have said to these gentlemen, "You have courage. It is inevitable that you will suffer in consequence, because until all these other industries will have established some minimum in their business you will not be able to come out." They said they realized that, and they took it.

Every condition of operation—every relationship between employer and employee cannot be covered either by code procedure or by legislation. Codes cannot and were not intended to regulate all trade, wage, and operating conditions. The Textile Code was intended to do just exactly what it has done—limit hours, ages, and wages, and to allow freedom from coercion in collective bargaining, and leave the adjustment of some things to local conditions and competition. In the playing of the game, after we have established some fundamental rules, opportunity must be given for competition and freedom of initiative. Crowding for advantage may be making haste slowly. Long ago Aesop told this story in the fable of the dog who dropped the piece of meat that he had in his mouth in anticipation of the larger-looking piece shadowed in the water.

I'd like to review the changes in our industry just in modern times. David Livingstone at 10 years of age worked in a British textile mill from 6 a. m. to 8 p. m. Henry M. Leland, in later life known for years as "Detroit's first citizen", in telling how he became a child laborer, said:

> After my father's health had broken, our family moved from Vermont to Massachusetts. My mother worked out a fair subsistence for her large family by keeping boarders and by the help of the older children in the mill—but the meager income from the long hours in the mill, 12½ hours daily, would hardly keep body and soul together.

William Gregg, when he built the Graniteville Mills in South Carolina, ran these mills as much as 14 hours a day, at 10 cents to 50 cents a day—6 days a week—and Dr. Broadus Mitchell, who wrote the story, says that the employees found that better than tenant farming.

In March 1933 cotton mills in New England States were operating 48 to 54 hours a week, and in Southern States 55 to 60 hours a week, and some adult wages were as low as $5 and $6 a week.

These are conditions that we moved away from over night and I think I am safe in saying that notwithstanding this tremendous comparative improvement that came by code agreement in July 1933 that there has been more dissatisfaction because of the lure of still greater advantages attractively presented in the shape of proposed legislation, or broadcast by some recklessly eager, irresponsible, and self-appointed leader.

This bill today seems to carry with it more suggestion of continued conflict than of harmony. We seem to be thinking more of the right to strike than of the right to work. The accent is more upon rights than upon obligations and responsibilities. We seem to be thinking more of the right of forcing some employees upon employers than of working toward a condition where employers are anxious to employ, and where both groups would be free from coercion.

Our industry gladly joined the "new deal"—and furnished 140,000 new jobs and increased its pay roll from $12,000,000 a month to over $26,000,000 a month. In many instances it more than doubled the hourly wage rate, and because of that, as prophesied by Major Berry, we found the product of our looms out of price parity with the other things that can take the place of cotton.

The CHAIRMAN. What has been the average increase in the price of different varieties of cotton cloth since the N. R. A.?

Mr. COMER. The stable cloths have more than doubled.

The CHAIRMAN. They have increased as much as 100 percent?

Mr. COMER. Yes, sir. Because of this, with other factors, of course, entering in, our export business of 550 million yards a year has declined to 200 million yards, and is continuing to shrink. We have lost 20 percent of our domestic market to such substituting fibers as rayon, jute, seisal, and paper and to increasing imports from Japan.

Senator WAGNER. Was that manufactured with our cotton?

Mr. COMER. It may be so, because Japan takes about 40 percent of our cotton against 60 percent of India cotton; but this year, their requirements will be 25 percent American cotton and 75 percent foreign cotton. So it is a fair chance Japan is shipping into this country goods made of India cotton.

Senator BLACK. What percentage is that imported from Japan of the total consumption of the country?

Mr. COMER. Japan consumes, so far as our records show, about 3 million bales?

The CHAIRMAN. No, Mr. Comer, what percentage of the cotton cloth imported is that of the total consumption?

Mr. COMER. I mentioned these figures as an indication of the trend, but not so much as they might affect the industry.

Senator BLACK. I wondered if you had the percentages.

Mr. COMER. No; I have not.

Senator MURPHY. I would say, Mr. Chairman, it was testified before the agricultural committee that our exports of cotton to England were declining, particularly in the last years, and the raw cotton that used to go to England most of it now goes to Japan, and that Japan was taking from England the production of textile goods.

Mr. COMER. Japan has taken all of our export business to the Philippine Islands which we had previous to the N. R. A., and that is about 150,000,000 yards of cloth.

The CHAIRMAN. And also a good deal of our export business to South America.

Mr. COMER. Yes, sir.

Senator MURPHY. You say Japan is taking England's export trade, largely?

Mr. COMER. Yes; to India and Africa.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you finished with your discussion of that question of imports from Japan to this country, Mr. Comer?

Mr. COMER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. May I ask two questions?

Mr. COMER. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there not a provision in the National Recovery Act which permits the Administrator to limit the imports into this country, and even to place an embargo on imports if the industry can show that those imports are interfering with the proper operation of the code set up under the N. I. R. A.?

Mr. COMER. Yes; the N. I. R. A. provides machinery for doing that very thing, but it is so slow.

The CHAIRMAN. Has your industry made any effort on that line?

Mr. COMER. Yes; we have, but we succeeded in doing only one thing, and that is stopping the importation of rugs from Japan. We stopped those at the instance of a manufacturer of rugs in New England and Mr. Calloway's bill in Georgia.

The CHAIRMAN. That requires action by the President.

Mr. COMER. I think it does.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course, with a recommendation from the National Industrial Administrator.

Mr. COMER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Some of the industrialists in my State have been urging legislative action, and I have pointed out to them that there is an administrative action that can be had, and we have transferred our legislative powers in that respect to administrative officers of the Government.

Mr. COMER. I would like to say in that respect the Philippine Legislature was agreeable to raising its barrier high enough to prevent this substitution of Japanese cotton goods for our goods, but for some reason it was stopped by our Government, so our people are told.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; I understood that assertion has been made, that there was some interference by a department of the Government that wanted suspension until such time as certain international trade agreement had been entered into.

Mr. COMER. That is correct; but in the meantime we continue to take the Philippine sugar, coconut oil, and rope.

As an illustration of what this means, in January 1934, 30,378 square yards of cotton cloth were imported from Japan. In January and February 1935 they sent 10,289,000 square yards, a gain of over 15,000 percent. To cap the climax, our industry was subjected to an uncalled-for and unwarranted general strike attempt, which brought forth the following statement from General Johnson:

> The present strike is an absolute violation of our understanding, and I must say with all the solemnity that should characterize such an announcement that if such agreements of organized labor are worth no more than this one, then that institution is not such a responsible instrumentality as can make contracts on which this country can rely.

Because of this loss in our natural markets, both at home and abroad, and because of consumer resistance to the "out of parity prices" of cotton goods, and because of increasing imports, our industry today finds itself harassed within and without. Under these conditions is it to be wondered at that investigation by the Federal Trade Commission finds our business operating at a loss? How much happier I would be today if I were here testifying in support of a bill that had for its purpose a plan for finding farm benefits other than from a processing tax.

Senator MURPHY. Would you repeat what you said about the processing tax, please?

Mr. COMER. How much happier I would be today if I were here testifying in support of a bill that had for its purpose a plan for finding farm benefits other than from a processing tax.

I am delighted to have the farm benefits for our southern farmers, but I think of all the people we are seeking to give relief to out of the Public Treasury, and all of the people who need it most, it is our tenant farmers in the South; but find the money for them only by taxing that which they raise, seems to me to be so much out of line of the way and the place to get the money.

Senator MURPHY. What alternative plan would you suggest?

Mr. COMER. I understand your present Public Works bill for $4,000,000,000 carries with it a Senate amendment providing money can be used from that even for farming benefits.

Senator MURPHY. You would use that?

Mr. COMER. I would use that in preference to a processing tax, and I would use money from any other public source than a processing tax on cotton itself.

Senator MURPHY. Of course, you know that processing tax is to give the producer the benefit of the tariff?

Mr. COMER. Yes, sir.

Senator MURPHY. Your preference to the processing tax is taking something in the way of an appropriation by the Federal Government. Do you approve of Senator George's proposal that we give the producer the parity price, and as to what we sell abroad under the parity price, we make up out of the Federal Treasury?

Mr. COMER. I would not go that far. I think we should give the farmer the parity price for the cotton consumed in this country, then for cotton he raises for export, I think that ought to be sold possibly at the world price.

Senator MURPHY. How would you take care of the difference between that and parity?

Mr. COMER. That is the farmer's own program. If the world price was not satisfactory, he would not raise cotton other than for home consumption?

The CHAIRMAN. How much of the 100-percent increase in the cost of cotton cloth since the N. R. A. and the A. A. A. can be attributed to the processing tax, and how much to increase in wages, if you can tell that?

Mr. COMER. There has been quite a dispute between processors and the Agricultural Department on that question. They have gone so far as to say to the consumers of this country, "Take a pair of cotton overalls and weigh it, and if it weighs 1 pound, there is only 4⅕ cents process tax in that process." I think that is exactly wrong. I think the processing tax of 4⅕ cents per pound when I open it at my mill must pyramid through my selling agencies, through the manufacturer, the wholesaler, and through the retailer, and when it finally reached the consumer that 4⅕ cents a pound I think is likely to be a great deal more.

By law I am compelled not to tell you how much that should be; they will put me in jail, they say, but I am sure that like every other craft going into manufacture and distribution, it pyramids through all of these sources of distribution.

The CHAIRMAN. In general it is a substantial increase.

Mr. COMER. As much as 20 percent some cost accountants have figured. Another thing about the processing tax is it deals with pounds instead of percent; therefore the man who is least able to pay it, who has to buy a heavy pair of overalls or a heavy shirt, is the one who pays it instead of the man who buys a white shirt, or a handkerchief, and I think if we are going to collect a processing tax, it should be a sales tax at the point of consumption rather than at the beginning.

The CHAIRMAN. How much of that percentage of increase is attributable to increased cost of labor, if you can state?

Mr. COMER. Labor costs have doubled in my mills.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you mind telling the committee what your own processing tax amounts to in a month or a year?

Mr. COMER. Our own company spins about 125,000 bales of cotton, and we pay $21 a bale processing tax, so that our company pays something over one-fiftieth of all the processing taxes paid.

The CHAIRMAN. How much does that amount to?

Mr. COMER. Over $2,000,000 a year.

The CHAIRMAN. How much is your gross business?

Mr. COMER. The gross business at the present prices is about $20,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN. So that you have to pay about 10 percent of your gross business in processing taxes?

Senator MURPHY. Have your earnings been more or less?

Mr. COMER. They have been less. We have quit speaking about earnings.

Senator MURPHY. Take the period since the processing tax, has it been better or worse?

Mr. COMER. It has been worse.

Senator MURPHY. What is the condition of the producer of cotton?

Mr. COMER. Better, but the story is, what has made it better? He has been getting 12 and 12½ cents a pound for his cotton, and the Government has bought the surplus and now owns it.

Senator MURPHY. Have you measured the producers' benefit in terms of percentage?

Mr. COMER. He has been given a hundred million dollars benefit, I presume. That is what has been collected, and I presume it has been given to him.

The CHAIRMAN. That does not mean cotton alone?

Mr. COMER. Yes; cotton alone. They have collected something over $100,000,000 on processing taxes for cotton alone, and that is presumed to have gone to the cotton farmer.

Senator MURPHY. Besides that benefit, he got the benefit of the higher price.

Mr. COMER. Yes, sir.

Senator MURPHY. So that the program has succeeded in giving the producer a higher price.

Mr. COMER. Yes, sir. I do not think the processing tax has been the reason for the higher price. I think the higher price came because the Government pegged it at 12 cents.

Senator MURPHY. And with that the allocated 20 percent of increase in the cost of cotton goods due to the processing tax?

Mr. COMER. That is right.

Senator MURPHY. Of course, the Government at that price puts a plank under the market, and is holding today approximately how many million bales of cotton?

Mr. COMER. About 6,000,000 bales.

Senator MURPHY. And it will continue to hold them until it finds a market for them.

Mr. COMER. Yes, sir.

Senator MURPHY. For the purpose of developing information for the committee, and for myself, it should prove interesting, I have heard it said that the textile strike was a blessing in disguise for your industry, because it effected a decrease in production more rapidly by permitting practice of what was on the market. I noticed in yesterday's New York Times that there is a code limitation agreed on to have some 25-percent reduction in production.

Mr. COMER. That is right.

Senator MURPHY. Is the condition of the textile industry attributable to overproduction?

Mr. COMER. May I tell you first, a little story?

Senator MURPHY. Surely.

Mr. COMER. I am chairman of the rural rehabilitation program of Alabama, and in my State we had to do last year with some 25,000 farm families out in the country, and we selected out of a that number 6,000 we thought had the possibilty of making an independent farm and home, and to prove they were in earnest about their own condition we said, will you take a steer, and go over and take 10 acres of land and make a living. Six thousand of them took the steers and went on the 10 acres. As chairman of the committee it was my duty to visit some of these people, and I did, and I found that the chief concern of these families was where they could get enough cotton cloth, a few yards of cotton cloth so that the little girls or boys could be decently clothed to go to school.

I am going to quote Miss Perkins, she said the South was a good market for shoes, you remember. She told me it was a good market for everything, and the South has a potential buying power so far beyond the rest of this country, if we could only rehabilitate this rural population in our section, what we could do toward buying things this country is piling up in the warehouses, is tremendous.

Think of a woman wanting 3 yards of cloth for a dress for her little girl and could not get it.

Senator MURPHY. Of course, the problem is to create that purchasing power. Let me say in that connection, that the development of the A. A. A. program all through the grain belt, gave us an increase in price for grain, corn, oats, hay, and everything else, and this resulted in increased purchasing power, of your cotton cloth among other things, and to the prosperity of your section.

Now, the farm manufacturing industry had nothing in inventory at all and they are going out and have been going out since last fall, supplying farm machinery tractors and things of that sort.

A shoe manufacturer at home said to me that he had orders ahead for 2 months to keep him at capacity.

In your opinion are we producing purchasing power by inducing a rise in the price of these commodities? Is that principle basically sound?

The CHAIRMAN. It has not worked out that way in the cotton-textile industry?

Mr. COMER. Mr. Hopkins asked me a question like that, and I told him I thought our code should deal with four things only, and that was, ages, wages—that is minimum wages and maximum hours—and some machine-hour control for a while. I dislike the idea of controlling production but as a temporary thing it may do.

Senator MURPHY. That is as far as I want to go with it.

Mr. COMER. I think you have got to have some rules of the game, and there has got to be something left in order that the man with the most initiative, and the man who can produce most economically can get some measure of reward.

Speaking about the South again, and comparing Iowa with Alabama, the tools of Alabama farms is $130 by the 1930 census, and $1,200 in Iowa; the Alabama farm home is $400 and the Iowa farm home is $2,400; the Alabama farm income is $300, and Iowa is $1,800, and those ratios are the same between the two States as to education, automobile ownership, as to income tax, and is about the same as to preachers, teachers' salaries to a large extent.

Senator MURPHY. For the time being you are for the A. A. A.?

Mr. COMER. Yes; and let me say this, I do not want the A. A. A. to license me without my consent.

The CHAIRMAN. I assume you are for it, if at all, on the previous statement you made distinguishing between paying a processing tax on cotton for domestic purposes and for exportation. Did you not make a distinction?

Mr. COMER. I did not think the benefit of producing a parity price for cotton for domestic consumption should be had from any process tax if it could be had anywhere else.

Senator WAGNER. In talking to one of our foreign investors not so long ago he gave it as his view that one of the reasons why the market for cotton in foreign countries is greater, is because those countries have been unable to sell commodities to us; we have not given them the wherewith to buy our cotton, and that is one of the reasons for this shrinkage.

Mr. COMER. The Secretary of Agriculture says that, but I have said to those gentlemen, when you say something must come into this country in order that more cotton shall go out, please tell us what it is you want to bring into this country.

Senator WAGNER. That is a difficult question.

Mr. COMER. Yes. I think cotton has lost its market in the world because we pegged it at 12 cents, and the world knew all they had to do was to sell it at $11.95.

The CHAIRMAN. The Secretary of Agriculture made a radio talk last week very strongly urging the increase of imports in order to increase our exports.

Mr. COMER. Yes; I remember that.

The CHAIRMAN. We will now recess until 2:30 o'clock.

(Whereupon, at 1:15 p. m., the hearing was recessed until 2:30 p. m., of the same day.)

AFTER RECESS

The committee reconvened at 2:30 p. m., pursuant to the taking of the recess.

Present: Senators Walsh (chairman), Black, and Murray.

Also present: Senator Wagner.

Senator MURRAY. You can resume the stand, Mr. Comer.

STATEMENT OF DONALD COMER—Resumed

Mr. COMER. Senator, may I just before returning to my manuscript and in order to make the record a little clearer on one of the matters we discussed this morning say a few things right here in that respect?

Senator MURRAY. Certainly.

Mr. COMER. We discussed the processing tax this morning. My idea was that the processing tax coming one month after the increased cost incident to N. R. A., followed by the advance of raw cotton from 6 cents up until 12 cents, that all three of those things entering into the cost of cotton goods put cotton goods out of parity with things that ordinarily substitute for cotton.

Senator MURRAY. Yes.

Mr. COMER. Now, we can say that the processing tax was the last straw that broke the camel's back, or we can say it was the N. R. A. cost, or we can say it was the advance of cotton itself. All I know is today the industry is in the most distressed condition that I have ever known and I, and my family before me, have all been cotton spinners as well as cotton farmers.

As to where we shall find the money to take the place of a processing tax on cotton to pay farm benefits, Senator George has an amendment attached to the present Public Works Bill, permitting money from that particular fund to be used for that purpose. I think, as I said this morning, that the money can be found from anywhere to better advantage than from the tax on the cotton itself. But if cotton is to be taxed in order to pay this farm benefit, then I was trying to say that the $21 a bale, collected at the point of mill opening of the bale, might conceivably become $42 a bale before the consumer bought the goods. So that in order to get the $120,000,000 benefits needed for the cotton program, for the farm-benefit program, rather, the consumer may conceivably be paying twice that much for the cotton goods. And that is certainly burdening the flow of cotton goods, and it is certainly disturbing the best customer of the cotton farmer, who is the cotton spinner. Therefore, it would be so much better to collect the $120,000,000 needed by percent of the value of cotton goods at the point of consumption rather than the $120,000,000 at the beginning with the pyramiding in between. That was the point that I was trying to make.

Then I was trying to make this point also, that in a processing tax dealing with food products like wheat and meat and corn, that if the consumer is driven away from those particular products he still has to eat. He may go to rice or potatoes, or he may go to goats instead of hog meat, but he is still buying what the farmer raises. But on a processing tax on cotton, if the consumer resists he turns to rayon, or to jute, or to seisal, or to paper.

Now the processing-tax law provided those things that take the place of cotton goods shall be immediately burdened to compensate for the processing tax on cotton, but they have not carried out that provision of A. A. A. They put some compensating tax on jute and paper, but not enough.

They started out to put it on rayon, and the rayon people were willing to pay it. But they looked around and said, "It is true we do compete with mercerized cotton goods, but we also compete with silk goods. And if you are going to burden rayon goods to compensate for the processing tax on cotton then you must burden silk to compensate for the processing tax on rayon. And so away the program went, broadening out and becoming just impossible, and today we have no compensating tax on either rayon or on seisal, although the farmers are plowing with seisal rope instead of cotton rope, and they are using rayon instead of cotton, and they are using paper bags, paper strings, jute bags, and jute strings instead of cotton, as the result of which we have lost 20 percent of our domestic business in cotton.

The question was asked today whether a strike did not come at a time when the mills were glad to shut down. The mills were glad to shut down. And they are right now going on a program of 25 percent curtailment. It is not because of the fact necessarily we have our overproduction. It is because we have lost some of these markets I have spoken about. And we are still hoping this administration will correct some of these injustices and that it will not continue to penalize the first industry which stepped up and said, "Burden us with these N. R. A. costs, burden us with the processing tax in order to pay farm benefits, but hurry and increase purchasing power somewhere else, to buy our higher-priced cotton goods." And today we have not yet done that. And so we are asking today again for a program of settlement in order that all mills may shut down, all machinery may shut down alike. Some of us have been shutting down, we are having to shut down, and we are going to continue to have to shut down, but it is not because of seasonal depression or slacking of the cotton goods business, it is because of the things I have just mentioned.

Senator MURRAY. That is a very clear explanation of it.

Senator WAGNER. I do not want to pursue that too far, because really it is not relevant, but when we have an authority I suppose everybody wants to take advantage of the occasion to get some information out of you. I was going to ask you do you believe in the so-called "debenture plan", and would you regard that as favorably as the processing tax plan?

Mr. COMER. The Secretary of Agriculture of the State of Texas, Mr. McDonald, has a program which I think ultimately will be the right plan, and that is to provide by benefit for a parity price for the cotton that is consumed in this country, and allow any other cotton that they want to grow under control of some sort to go at world prices.

I thought last year, Senator, and I have always thought, that when we curtail our cotton crop that we should have asked the rest of the cotton-producing countries to join with us. We did in sugar and we did in wheat, but we did not do it in cotton, and the result is we went through the embarrassment of providing at world's prices 23,000,000 bales of cotton, curtailing our own crop, and by the Government taking 6,000,000 bales of cotton off the market at 12 cents.

Senator WAGNER. Mr. Comer, is there not something to the proposition that we not accepting the goods of other countries, to whom we have sold cotton in the past, that they were compelled to curtail their purchase of cotton from us because they were not able to get any credit in this country?

Mr. COMER. Senator, the exports of most all other things, a great many other things, have increased; during the time cotton exports have decreased instead of exporting cotton and cotton goods our exports of cotton ginning machinery to Brazil alone in 1933 were $65,000 and increased in 1934 to $555,000.

Senator WAGNER. They are producing it in other countries producing cotton?

Mr. COMER. Yes, sir. They can do it and they are doing it. And if we try to make our parity prices for home consumption the world's price we will lose our cotton market for the world. We have got to divide our cotton into two groups, one for home consumption and one for foreign consumption.

Senator WAGNER. I did not understand that plan you just suggested. How is the cotton grower going to become compensated for the cotton he sells at the world price?

Mr. COMER. He will take the world price for it.

Senator WAGNER. How is that?

Mr. COMER. He will take the world price for it. He will compete with the world if he wants to.

Senator WAGNER. He can afford to do it?

Mr. COMER. He does not have to. He can do that if he wants to.

Another thing that happened in cotton growing last year was in the control of hogs and also the control of hog fat, which resulted in cottonseed last year bringing $50 a ton because there was cottonseed oil in it. And that amounted to $25 a bale. So if they keep on reducing the production of hog fat in this country the cotton farmer will have two things to sell, cotton and cottonseed too, which helps his situation.

Senator BLACK. Mr. Comer, as I gather it, what you favor is a bounty to the cotton farmer paid out of the Treasury for all cotton sold in the domestic market, leaving him free to sell his surplus cotton on the world market?

Mr. COMER. Either free or under some kind of pool arrangement. I really think it ought to be pooled in some sort of fashion, but to have it sold at world prices.

Senator BLACK. As is gather further, you are opposing the processing tax largely on the ground it is a sales tax on cotton products alone?

Mr. COMER. And the fact that they have not been able to burden those things which take the place of the cotton.

Senator BLACK. I said a sales tax on cotton alone.

Mr. COMER. Alone, yes.

Senator BLACK. And I also gather in one part of your objection that it was based on the fact that it was taxing commodities that the poor people chiefly buy.

Mr. COMER. And at a pound price, which makes the higher tax on the heavy work shirt and the heavy overalls, and an infinitesimal tax on the woman who wears the artistic or the sheer dress.

Senator BLACK. That necessarily gets down to the general taxing problem, and I judge from that you would favor taxing those less able to pay?

Mr. COMER. I am.

Senator BLACK. And not by imposing a sales tax on the necessities of life.

Mr. COMER. I am, and my father was before me.

In fact he said when Governor of Alabama that you cannot get money except from the people who have it.

How much happier I would be today if I were here testifying in support of a bill that had for its purpose a plan for finding farm benefits other than from a processing tax, a plan for the protection of our home markets against the importations from Japan, a plan for regaining our lost Philippine market, a plan for establishing a parity as between cotton and those things which can and do substitute for cotton. I would like to join with the supporters of this bill in helping Senator Bankhead with his program for giving tenant farmers a fair chance of becoming home owning and farm owning. And if we could just lift the purchasing power of the Southern farmer to an equality with that of the Ohio farmer, some of these things we are worrying about today would not be troubling us.

I believe if and when a majority of the industrial workers wish or need the purported benefits of this bill they will be quite able to get them without this or similar legislation.

N. R. A. and our code have already provided definite and marked benefits for our industry and before endangering these gains by crowding further right now, if all industry and the supporters of this bill would join together in one single and determined purpose of rural habilitation, particularly in the South, all of us would more surely and in a more orderly way get indirectly every desirable value claimed under this and similar bills.

With our ports closed to immigration, with the economic condition of our farmers lifted, the question of industrial relations wouldn't need all the outside attention that is being presented today.

There has been one question raised, I understand, during this hearing, that the majority of the employers have the right under their code and under N. R. A. to compel the minority to conform, that that has been one of the arguments used. Is that so, Senator Wagner?

Senator WAGNER. That was not quite it. The statement was made that the association, the American Association of Manufacturers as part of their platform adopted a majority rule so far as it affected industry. I happen to have it here. May I read it here?

Mr. COMER. Yes, sir; I would be glad to hear it.

Senator WAGNER [reading]:

> Under appropriate safeguards the approved competitive practices and prohibitions submitted by the properly defined majority group, trade, or industry should be binding upon a minority.

That is their platform, and it was adopted.

Mr. COMER. I would like to say first that I am not a member of the National Association of Manufacturers. I am a member of the American Cotton Manufacturers Association, and of course a contributing and supporting member of the Cotton Textile Institute, which supports the textile code authority. Here is what I would like to say about my organization. I cannot speak for other people; I can only speak for myself and for my organization, so far as I know.

Organizations of employers in our industry, in my experience of them, have been only for the purpose of what is good for every part of the business, good for both employers and employees. We join together for protecting our natural markets, for resisting unfair taxation, for demanding equitable freight rates, for seeking new uses for our products, and so forth. The only time we ever got together in 100-percent accord was in operation under our code and in every provision of our code first consideration was shown for the employee. He was protected in age, wage, and hours of labor. The owner was to wait for a subsequent sharing from indirect benefits. The control of industry by majority action under code procedure has to have the blessing of N. R. A. Refused the sanction for curtailment for the last 9 months, our industry has been forced into overproduction and operation at a loss. The minority interests have always been given the opportunity of a full hearing, as a result of which in many cases they have been given many exceptions for themselves, either individually or in groups. In the interests of the minority, N. R. A. has overruled more than once the wishes of the majority. Those who are attempting to legislate for our industry should read Lancashire Under the Hammer, a story of textiles in England.

In July 1933 the Avondale Mills, of which I am president, had 2.5 million pounds of manufactured cotton goods in our warehouses—a normal stock. Today we have over 12 million pounds. Included in this inventory value is 5 cents per pound processing tax, over $600,000, 13 cents for raw cotton as well as the cost incident to the shorter hours and higher wages. We have borrowed all the money we dare borrow. There is no market for these goods even at less than cost. We have not been able to pass them on to a consuming public, and this is making it very difficult for us to continue to maintain an operating schedule. There is tremendous concern for the unemployed of this Nation and in this we join, but we should have an equal concern for the safety of the jobs of those who continue to still find employment.

I have never faltered in my support and enthusiasm for the benefits that came to the people who work in our mills under our textile code. I desperately wanted shorter hours and higher wages. I worked constantly for them for years before they came.

Senator WAGNER. May I interrupt you there?

Mr. COMER. Yes, sir.

Senator WAGNER. I was going to say this, that if all employers were like you this legislation would not be here at all.

Mr. COMER. I thank you, sir, for the compliment, but, Senator, there are lots of them like me.

Senator WAGNER. I know there are.

Mr. COMER. Lots of them like me.

Senator WAGNER. I know. They are a majority I should say, but that does not solve the problem.

Mr. COMER. I would like to say this, that I believe that as a cross-section of our society there are just as many people in my group trying to do the right thing as there is in any other group.

Senator WAGNER. Yes; it is the small minority that causes the damage, but that group has got to be dealt with.

Mr. COMER. I think that is why we got our code, that is why there was sufficient need of a code, and why our industry asked for it, and 95 percent of our industry wanted a code before 1933. We were trying back in 1930 and 1928, Senator Black, I think you can say, to get some of the benefits that have now come through other procedure.

Senator BLACK. I think you were in the minority, Mr. Comer, in trying to get shorter hour and much higher wages.

Mr. COMER. Senator, we had half the spinners of Alabama behind that request for a 48-hour week.

Senator BLACK. About half of them?

Mr. COMER. Yes, sir; about half the spinners of Alabama alone. I do not know how much over the rest of the country.

Senator BLACK. When you went to the meeting I think I saw a speech you made in the meeting of the Textile Association, or some association it seems to me, like up in North Carolina, where you advanced the idea of a national law probably for shorter hours. It did not get a very good reception, did it?

Mr. COMER. We were asked, a committee from Alabama, of which I was the chairman, to make a further investigation, not only dealing with the question then of shorter hours, which we proposed at that meeting, but also the question of a minimum wage.

Senator BLACK. Yes.

Mr. COMER. Before we got time to make a report or make the study we had a change in administration and had an opportunity to come through other procedure.

Senator BLACK. You were a pioneer so far as that section down there is concerned as to getting a regulation of hours and better pay for employees through a national law, were you not?

Mr. COMER. I was one of them, Senator.

Senator BLACK. Certainly in the textile industry.

Mr. COMER. Yes.

Senator BLACK. And there were two others with you?

Mr. COMER. Scott Roberts and Judge Stokeley.

Senator BLACK. Scott Roberts and Judge Stokeley?

Mr. COMER. And Fred Tyler, of Anniston.

Senator BLACK. Four of you?

Mr. COMER. Four of us. We were the committee.

Senator BLACK. And so far as wages and hours are concerned you have been and are now heartily in favor of minimum wages and a national regulation of hours?

Mr. COMER. Senator, I had reached the point where I did not want to continue spinning cotton under conditions operating back under our previous hours and wages, so unsatisfactory and yet under competition impossible to escape.

Senator BLACK. You found your competitors would use these longer hours and lower wages?

Mr. COMER. We found, like Mr. Roosevelt said, in many industries the minority which prevented voluntary group action to prevent those things, but that minority I won't say they were bad, Senator, as they felt like group action voluntarily could not control it, and they felt like it had to be by some national law. I think they felt that if it could be done that they would have been glad to have consented. I do not think we had a minority preventing this industry from abuses which we had been suffering under for so long; I mean in hours and low wages.

Senator WAGNER. I do not know whether you remember when the silk strike was on. I was chairman of the National Labor Board.

Mr. COMER. Yes; I remember you were.

Senator WAGNER. A duty they handed me, and I happened to make an investigation of the conditions, and I was surprised to learn in some instances they were paying skilled workers, like weavers, $6 and $8 a week, and worked them long hours, and they attributed it to the unfair competition of competitors, that dragged them down to that level. That was a terrible exhibition of exploitation.

Mr. COMER. They claimed, whether reasonably or not, that they could not control that because of violation of the antitrust law.

Senator WAGNER. Yes.

Mr. COMER. That was the reason that these minorities gave us from time to time that we enter into an arrangement where we would not violate that.

Senator WAGNER. I think that is true.

Mr. COMER. That is right. And we have to admit they were sincere in their position.

Senator WAGNER. I think that is true. But the exploit spreaders were not sincere, were they?

Mr. COMER. I think we have reached a time in our society where, with public opinion and with code procedure, that the opportunity for exploitation is fast dwindling to just normal operating conditions.

Senator WAGNER. Up to the time of the N. R. A. I should say there was a great deal of it still.

Mr. COMER. Yes, sir; I admit that, sir.

Senator WAGNER. I take it you are for the extension of the N. R. A.?

Mr. COMER. Yes, sir. I worked constantly for these shorter hours for years before they came.

I feel that with the gains in hand we should give our industry a chance to become adjusted to these gains. I am terribly distressed when I see anything attempted that I think might endanger what by comparison has been so newly and wonderfully accomplished. If there is something better ahead—and there is—let's let it come through education and experimental proving, not by statute. In the meantime, there should be more than one yardstick for better industrial relations.

As I stated when I appeared before your committee last spring, we are all of us—whether manufacturers, employees, lawmakers, or administrators—deeply concerned in finding the best formula for the best interests of the millions who toil with their hands and with their hands and heads. More advance has been made in the last 2 years, measured from the point we started at to the point we have finally arrived at, than has been made in any similar period of time within our memory. It is my earnest conviction that real progress always has to come by steps that we are prepared to take. I hope this committee can see the reasonableness of gradual progress, and I maintain that our present duty is to consolidate and make permanent the advance already achieved before undertaking another experiment by statute before we have realized the possibilities inherent in the present law. This is my sincere conviction. It is not presented for the purpose of haggling over phraseology or of seeking to maintain any reactionary status quo.

Is it asking too much to say let us continue to work under section 7 (a) of the National Industrial Recovery Act? Let some continue to use the American Federation of Labor unions. Let some continue to use so-called "company or employee unions." And while we are all seeking to find a better way the efforts of each of these several groups will continue to stimulate and prove out the best in all of them.

Senator WAGNER. Of course, there is nothing here to prevent that. If the workers as a result of their free choice adopt the so-called "representative plan" there is nothing to prevent them from adopting it except of course there is this limitation on the financing of it by the employer. There is not anything else in here that——

Mr. COMER (interposing). Senator, I know, but you are trying with all of your heart to help an industrial condition in this country; I am too. But with all my heart I believe that we have made all the progress in that respect in the last 2 years under our code that we ought to attempt by statute right now.

I am not complaining about your bill. The time might come when I would say I would like to help you with your bill; but I know that we have made progress in the last 2 years. I believe that a statute such as you are now talking about right now might endanger some of the good and some of the advance that we have already accomplished. Now that is an opinion, but I just ask you to take it for an honest opinion.

Senator WAGNER. Of course.

Mr. COMER. From a man who has the same purpose and the same motive you have.

Senator WAGNER. I know that. We differ upon that.

Mr. COMER. I understand you.

Senator MURRAY. Mr. Comer, we thank you for your statement and will insert it in the record.

Mr. COMER. All right. Thank you.

Senator MURRAY. Is Mr. C. A. Higgens here?

I am also a vice president of the Hercules Powder Co.

Senator MURRAY. You desire to make a statement?

Mr. HIGGENS. Yes, sir; a very brief statement, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. This is Mr. Higgens. Your full name.

Mr. HIGGENS. Charles Alfred Higgens.

The CHAIRMAN. Your residence?

Mr. HIGGENS. Wilmington, Del.

The CHAIRMAN. And whom do you represent?

Mr. HIGGENS. The Manufacturing Chemists Association.

The CHAIRMAN. How large an organization is that?

Mr. HIGGENS. According to the code, around 350 companies, with over 90,000 employees.

The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed.

Mr. HIGGENS. My own company, the Hercules Powder Co. and its wholly owned subsidiary, the Paper Makers Chemical Corporation, operates 32 manufacturing plants, located in practically every section of the United States, and at present employs approximately 3,200 pay-roll workers.

Some of these plants are small, employing less than 20 men; others are large, having in some cases more than 600 individuals on the pay roll. All classes of labor are represented—skilled, semiskilled, ordinary labor (male and female), colored and white.

The company realizes that its successful operation depends largely upon the enthusiasm and loyalty of its workers, that it is good business to maintain such working conditions as will promote a feeling of security and satisfaction on the part of its emloyees, and that the interests of company and men are, in the broad sense, mutual.

Senate bill 1958, introduced by Senator Wagner on February 21, 1935, is intended to promote equality of bargaining power between employers and employees, to diminish the causes of labor disputes, and to define and prevent those unfair labor practices which mitigate against the rights and welfare of the worker.

We are in favor of the purposes cited, but we are definitely of the opinion that the bill, as written, will not only fail to accomplish the intended objective, but will have the opposite effect, that it will increase the causes of labor disputes and deprive the worker of his individual rights to which he, as a free American citizen, is entitled.

The bill clearly endorses and makes compulsory the principle of majority rule for purposes of collective bargaining. While this is the political principle on which our government is based, it is beset with practical difficulties when applied to many industrial establishments in this country.

For example, many of our southern plants employ a large number of colored workers. In some cases such workers are in the majority. It is not difficult to foresee the possible consequences of any attempt to apply and enforce the majority rule provisions of the Wagner bill at plants where such conditions prevail. Today harmony and understanding exist between workers of the different races, and such problems as do come up are handled promptly and efficiently by existing intraplant organizations.

The rights of minorities are given little thought in the bill as drawn. Section 8 states that if the majority of employees so desire it may be a condition of employment by agreement that all employees must be members of such organization as is representative of such a majority. This means that every worker within such a unit may have to pay tribute and be subject to the rulings of an organization perhaps far removed from the scene of their employment, and whose interest in his direct and individual welfare may be remote.

Then there are cases of labor organizations whose membership is restricted. Under such conditions an individual trying to find work may find it impossible to engage in the kind of work he desires and for which he may be best fitted.

Then too the recognition of individual merit of workers may be made practically impossible if by chance the majority of the group in which such an individual is working adopts seniority as the criterion of advancement, or other possibly illogical basis for employment.

Section 8 of the bill attempts to define unfair labor practices on the part of the employer. These definitions are so vague and indefinite as to make almost any natural human relationship between an employer and an employee susceptible of adjudication as an illegal act.

Senator WAGNER. Could I interrupt you there, or would you rather finish?

Mr. HIGGENS. Certainly.

Senator WAGNER. Would you rather finish?

Mr. HIGGENS. No, sir.

Senator WAGNER. Those are the same enumerated unfair labor practices which are now in the Railway Labor Law, and apply to all of the railway workers in the country, which is well over a million, and there has been no difficulty in interpreting what these words mean. As a matter of fact—I do not want to go into details—the courts, the Supreme Court has passed upon the identical words, and the Supreme Court did not have any difficulty in finding out just exactly what they mean. I thought you might want to know they are the law of the land so far as the railway workers of the country are concerned.

Mr. HIGGENS. Thank you, sir.

The inevitable effect of section 8 will be to diminish the highly desirable personal relationship of management and men that has resulted from years of close working contact.

From our experience in industrial operations, we believe that labor disputes—in plants such as ours—can best be settled on the spot by the people whose interests are mutual and whose knowledge of the facts is intimate. Long-distance jurisdiction or arbitration by Government boards or outside labor organization is generally inimical to the prompt and satisfactory settlement of problems which are purely local in character, and in which the human element always predominates.

We are also of the opinion that the interests of employees as well as of employers would be better served if cognizance were taken in the bill of the possibility of unfair labor practices on both sides. The present bill defines unfair labor practices on the part of employers only. But most of us have heard of cases where promoters and agents of labor unions have coerced workers into forming or joining organizations for which the employees have seen no need and which have resulted in loss for both employee and employer and profit to the promoter.

We will not attempt at this time to discuss the question of the legality of the bill nor its encroachments upon what we consider the individual rights of every American citizen, but are merely trying to mention a few of the practical difficulties of the bill from our experience as employers of all kinds of labor.

The Wagner bill, as written, is, in our opinion, unfair to both employees and employers. It will have the direct effect of aggravating those conditions it is intended to improve, and retard recovery. That is all.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Shapiro, you will come forward, please.

STATEMENT OF HAROLD ROLAND SHAPIRO, NEW YORK, N. Y.

The CHAIRMAN. Your full name is what?

Mr. SHAPIRO. Harold Roland Shapiro.

The CHAIRMAN. You are an attorney at law?

Mr. SHAPIRO. I am an attorney at law.

The CHAIRMAN. Of 74 Trinity Place, New York?

Mr. SHAPIRO. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. Who do you represent here—yourself?

Mr. SHAPIRO. I represent myself. I am professor of administrative law in the New York Law School, and have come here solely in the interests of patriotism, and in an effort to contribute something toward the solution of a most pressing industrial problem.

The CHAIRMAN. We would be pleased to have your views.

Mr. SHAPIRO. At the outset may I express my congratulations to Senator Wagner upon his masterly bill. It is unusually clear, and from the administrative viewpoint represents a distinct advance.

This morning I heard a gentleman bemoan the fact that the bill outlaws the company union. While the bill does not say so its effect upon the company-dominated union would seem inevitable. Certainly, company unions, by furnishing all employees of an industrial unit with a common forum and a common organization, have been potentially, at least, excellent breeding grounds for outside union. So that if the Wagner labor disputes bill does not have the tendency to outlaw the company union, it seems, in the nature of things, that the inroads of Communists and other so-called "left" unions will sooner or later result in management preferring to affiliate with a conservative labor organization like the A. F. of L. as the lesser of two evils.

Therefore, it would be wisest from a long-range view-point to recognize the inevitability of the outside labor union in industry, and to regard the Wagner bill as an attempt to assuage employer and labor pains during the period of adjustment. In effect, this means that industry and its present employees, as well as those who would like to join a labor union at some future time, must be protected from the little bit of bad in every good little closed shop.

Of all the classes of forgotten men aided by past legislation, none has been so helpless and inarticulate as the individual member of a union local, whose silence has been due to an economic helplessness arising from fear that he may offend the officers of his union.

Many a union-man would rather bear the ills he has in the union than lose his union card by daring to protest openly at union meetings against the mistakes or injustices of a small minority which perpetuates itself in union offices.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you not think the N. R. A. and the codes adopted under it has been helpful to all members of the laboring class?

Mr. SHAPIRO. I believe that the N. R. A. has had a considerable effect in aiding labor, particularly unorganized labor, in that employers who have not been unionized have been particularly fearful of the possibility of unionizing, and have therefore paid their workers the minimum wage. To the extent that coercion and intimidation may have been practiced by union subordinates in forcing workers to join a union, and I do not pass upon the moral validity of that practice, the practice has not always ceased after the industrial unit has been organized. In some cases the boss or foreman has merely been superseded by a union delegate as the economic threat to the worker. Although many a union man is silently suffering, he will not appear before a Senate committee, or any other committee, under the present system of union control, for fear of reprisals, not from his fellow-workers, but from the self-perpetuating hierarchy which inevitably persists where there is no legal restraint.

Viewing the tendency of the Wagner labor disputes bill to develop closed shops, I look ahead at the date of the young men, who are not old enough yet to join any of the new unions, and who, because they were not in " on the ground floor " when the union was soliciting members, may find themselves plumb out of luck later. Many a union's closed shop has degenerated into a situation wherein persons on the inside look out for themselves, have denied admission to eligible workers for no better reason than that they decided to close the membership books. Certainly, it is not part of our American plan to perpetuate a system which copies from the placards of the factory gate, " No fellow workers wanted."

I speak, therefore, not in opposition to the bill, but ask that it be amended in behalf of the countless numbers of economical lost sheep who would rejoice in their union membership if a general house-cleaning of unfair labor practices could be effected inside the union. It is only fair that union labor officials who make a bid for the favor of government employees and nonunion employees should at least do as much as industry has done in its own internal relations and in its dealings with labor, namely, to come clean and undertake to stay clean when they come awooing for majority rule. The greatness given to labor would prove a boomerang and destroy many of the unions through the perpetuation of the past methods of some union leaders, unless adequate safeguards are given to them as the greatest favor which friends of the labor movement could give to an organized labor they desire to grant progress.

Corporate directors are charged with specific duties and liabilities by statute for the protection of stockholders, creditors, and the general public. Public utilities and even the stock market is under Government supervision. Trade associations have been ineligible to represent their industries under N. R. A. unless they have revised their constitutions and bylaws to meet N. R. A. requirements, and eliminate the inequitable restrictions on membership, discrimination against small enterprises, or tendencies to monopoly. Code authorities are subjected to a strict accounting of funds and accountability for the powers they have been delegated. Industry is subject to numerous labor regulations under N. R. A. Codes, Federal and State statutes, and municipal ordinances, and must either clean house through the N. R. A. or look forward to being purged of unfair methods of competition by some other governmental body.

But American industry cannot continue to exist half-regulated and half-free. What is sauce for the goose must become sauce for the gander. Labor unions must be regulated or allowed self-regulation under Government supervision in order to protect the unions and union membership from abuse of power. I am, therefore, proposing that the unions be permitted some measure of self-regulation, and that pending the adoption of such a proposal in which unions will be permitted to come to Government in like manner as industry members have done to N. R. A. and submit codes of labor ethics under the guidance of consumers and industry, that pending the occurrence of such event that unions as a condition precedent to the granting of any rights to majority rule shall be required to submit and abide by certain fair-trade practices. First, most urgent is the regulation of the union's internal set-up. Union officials should be required to keep adequate books and proper bank accounts, to give bond for the proper care of money in their custody and control. To this end periodic audits of all income and expenditures should be made mandatory. Such audits would become a powerful weapon in helping eliminate union tribute to underworld racketeers in situations where Government agencies hitherto have been powerless.

Second. Annual elections by secret ballot under Government supervision would eliminate the fraudulent elections which sometimes perpetuate faithless union officials in power.

Third. It should be a serious offense to take strike money from sick- or death-benefit funds, except by extraordinary authority from the membership.

Fourth. Since "closed shop" can become an economic threat to qualified workers who are not union members, a union should be prohibited from imposing inequitable restrictions on its members or on admission to membership by demanding excessive initiation fees or exorbitant dues, or otherwise to exclude workers who meet the reasonable educational or similar qualifications for the trade.

These are the words of Samuel Gompers himself:

> Suspension or expulsion should be prohibited except for traitorous conduct proven upon a fair trial.

And, further, union members should be protected by law when making complaints for violations of these provisions. And I believe that the Wagner labor disputes bill would cover these particular points if these amendments were included.

The union's relations with employers and nonunion employees: Because the power to call or call off a strike becomes an instrument of oppression and betrayal in the hands of unfaithful union officials it should be illegal for a labor union to strike or to call a strike until the rank and file have had an opportunity to give the question adequate consideration and to vote on it by secret ballot without interference, restraint, or coercion either from anyone within or outside of the union.

Then the following, which is perhaps more controversial, and which is not necessarily so much a part of the plan that it should interfere with the legitimate order if it is not considered favorably by the committee:

Section 7 (a) of the N. I. R. A. should be amended to read substantially as follows:

> That employees shall have the right to organize and bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing and shall be free from interference, restraint, or coercion of employers of labor, or their agents, or of labor organizations, or their agents, in the designation of such representatives or in self-organization or in other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection.

The CHAIRMAN. What change would you make in 7 (a)? What change did you propose in section 7 (a)?

Mr. SHAPIRO. The change in 7 (a) was that they shall be free from > interference of employers or their agents, or of labor organizations or their agents.

Jurisdictional disputes: Samuel Gompers declared that jurisdictional disputes between rival unions were a greater menace to organized labor than hostile employers. The toll exacted from employers, workers, and consumers through stoppage of work is at least equally severe. Jurisdictional disputes should be placed under the compulsory jurisdiction of impartial tribunals, appointed by the President. And a final bargaining is made in one of the sections of the Wagner labor disputes bill.

Regulation of labor unions along the lines I have indicated might not be palatable to all of the industrialists whom I have consulted, nor to all union leaders.

One business man's main objection was that it might make labor union honest and thereby improve their chances to organize those who have feared loss or injustice from selfish union officials.

In that respect, if I may without mentioning the name, I have here a part of a communication which was signed by the director of personnel service of an enterprise in response to the request for an opinion from the head of the organization.

> It is my further thought—says this opinion of the director of personnel service, > that the abuses which the labor unions themselves are inflicting on their membership through the misuse of the funds and through coercion are bound to result eventually in the break-down of the entire organizations. On the other hand, if we attempt regulation of these organizations, which will require them to make proper accounting of their funds and cause organization more effectively in order to bring this about, we will be making a substantital contribution to their cause. Consequently, I believe—says this director of personnel, > that we should concentrate on the building of our own organization under the present law and let them do likewise.

Now, when I told one of the leaders of industry, whom I happened to meet in Washington months ago, this discussion, this very nature of matter of my plan, he reminded me of Hamlet, who, when informed that the world was going honest, replied, "Then is doomsday near."

Another leader of industry felt that labor leaders could never be made honest through codes. But if that was true the same thing would apply to any efforts to make business men honest. He further felt that any code from the present administration would be a "stacked deck" against the employers. A third employer argued that employees should rather be persuaded by fair treatment that they had nothing to gain by joining a labor organization.

The fourth industrialist would object on the ground that codification of labor unions would foster "class conciousness."

One of these men told me personally that an article in The Nation pointing out certain of the abuses on the part of labor leaders has been circulated in large numbers throughout the West by employers, so that the employees should be properly educated with regard to the lack of need of joining a labor union.

However, I was surprised at the number of industrial executives expressing themselves that they felt that labor union regulation, if it could be attempted under what they referred to as the "present labor administration" in Washington, would be a consummation devoutly to be wished. Frankly, I was surprised when one nationally known figure, who is respected throughout the land, declared,

> It seems to me inevitable that if labor unions are to enjoy statutory sanction they cannot hope to escape the same degree of governmental supervision to which industry is subject.

Now, regardless of what might motivate an employer to favor labor union regulation, it is my view that labor should be regulated for their own good, and for the perpetuation of the union-labor idea, for the protection of the large number of nonunion employees who will brought into unions inevitably under the provisions of the Wagner disputes bill, and for the protection of the general public which suffers whenever there is maladjustment in industry. Certain it is that if labor unions were subject to the controls I have outlined, it would result in happier days for the rank and file of labor unions and the employers alike.

I am not talking of imposing a code upon labor. I am asking that labor be accorded the same privilege of presenting its own code at least to the extent of giving labor the opportunity of setting forth what in its mind are the greatest abuses within labor organizations, so that a house cleaning might be effected comparable to what is happening in bar associations, in various other professional groups and throughout the length and breadth of the land for the protection of large groups of so-called "forgotten men."

It was Mr. Justice Cardozo, who, in a decision in the Bulk Sales Law Case which reversed a previous view of ruling of the court of appeals, said that the needs of successive generations may render restrictions imperative which seem vain and capricious to the vision of times past.

The day has come when the union worker, the inarticulate union worker, who frequently has been silent because of fear to speak, because of the fact that persons in union offices have perpetuated themselves, and without the same restraint which is required of other groups, shall be given this Magna Carta of labor which should be recognized and protected by the Government in their efforts as members of a union to survive in what may be eventually the only source of employment, or the only means to employment that may be available to such union members.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Davis, will you please come forward?

STATEMENT OF WILLIAM H. DAVIS, CHAIRMAN SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON THE GOVERNMENT AND LABOR OF THE TWENTIETH CENTURY FUND, INC., NEW YORK, N. Y.

The CHAIRMAN. Your full name, Mr. Davis?

Mr. DAVIS. William H. Davis.

The CHAIRMAN. You are an attorney at law?

Mr. DAVIS. I am an attorney at law.

The CHAIRMAN. And residing in New York City?

Mr. DAVIS. In New York City.

The CHAIRMAN. Whom do you represent, Mr. Davis?

Mr. DAVIS. I come here as the chairman of a committee that was appointed by the Twentieth Century Fund, Inc. Shall I tell you who they are?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAVIS. The Twentieth Century Fund, Inc., is a fund established by Mr. Filene, of Boston, for the purpose of investigating controversial subjects of public interest.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Edward Filene?

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Edward Filene. And one of the subjects of investigation on this year's program was the subject of labor and government. And the process of investigation is to appoint a research staff. A staff was appointed in this case under the supervision of Mr. Evans Clark, who is the manager of the fund, and under the immediate direction of Mr. Bernheim, Mr. Alfred L. Bernheim; and the research staff proceeded to gather its material, and in accordance with the custom of that fund a committee was selected and named.

The function of the committee is only to consider the material that is assembled by the research staff, and to express its own views on that material. The committee has no power over the staff at all. It merely takes that material and examines it and reports on it.

I was made chairman of the committee, I think, because I was located in New York and most of the other members were outside of the city.

Mr. William L. Chenery, the editor of Collier's Weekly, was a member, and Henry S. Dennison, president of the Dennison Manufacturing Co., and former chairman of the Industrial Advisory Board of N. R. A., Mr. William M. Leiserson, chairman of the National Mediation Board for the Railroad Industry, and formerly connected with the Labor Board established under N. R. A., of which Senator Wagner was the head, Prof. Sumner H. Slichter, who is professor of business economics at Harvard University, and Mr. John Winant, who was former Governor of New Hampshire, and chairman of the President's Committee to Investigate the Textile Strike and author of the Winant Report, and that committee after studying these data collected by the staff, and as the result of many conferences with one another, arrived at recommendations on the basis of this material.

Those findings and recommendations were embodied in a document which I shall be very glad to leave with the committee, if they want it.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the document deal with this bill?

Mr. DAVIS. Not directly, but as the result of those findings and recommendations, and because they deal with the same subject matter as the bill, the findings and recommendations were completed just about the same time that Senator Wagner introduced the bill.

There was so much similarity between the recommendations and Senator Wagner's bill that that led the committee to make a direct comparison between the two and to formulate recommended changes in the Wagner bill as it is now proposed.

I have prepared a statement at the request of the committee, that is of the committee of the Twentieth Century Fund, a statement which specifically recommends changes in the bill and states briefly in each case why we think those changes should be made. The Senators will understand that I am appearing here as the spokesman for that committee, and that these recommendations are unanimously agreed to by the committee and are not emanations from my own knowledge of the subject which is in fact much less than that of most of the members of the committee. My own familiarity with the subject is really from my experience with N. R. A. I was director of compliance there for a while and had experience with that.

The committee's study of the facts that have been collected by this research staff led directly to the conclusion that the most immediately pressing problem is the fostering and development of collective bargaining, and it was apparent that that involved immediately an adequate assurance to the employees of the free exercise of their right to organize and to select their own representatives so that in the process of collective bargaining the employees' representatives might be as free from employer influence as the employers' representatives were free from employee influence.

It was clear that for successful bargaining the two parties must be represented by equally free agents and a study seemed to make it equally clear that the policy of section 7 (a) of the Recovery Act, which had been repeatedly declared by Congress in other acts, had been defeated in practice by a confusion of functions and the overlapping of authority and the deficiency of power in the national and industrial labor relations agencies that had been created under and in connection with the act.

The deliberations and study of the committee in the light of these facts, which I may say were quite independent of anything that was going on here in Washington, and we had no knowledge of what Senator Wagner was going to do, but it turned out when the two things were published almost simultaneously that the committee had been following a course of reasoning and had come to conclusions which were fundamentally in accord with those thoughts expressed in the Wagner bill.

The CHAIRMAN. When did your committee function?

Mr. DAVIS. The findings and recommendations which were the act of the committee were published February 26 of this year.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you not have before you the Wagner bill of last year?

Mr. DAVIS. It was before us, Senator, of last year, yes.

The CHAIRMAN. You had the benefit of all that?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes; we all knew that; yes. For instance, the committee recommended the reaffirmation, as Senator Wagner did, of the right of the employee to organize and choose his own representatives uninfluenced by employers. And they also recommended the creation of an independent, semijudicial Federal Agency with genuine powers to enforce its own decisions.

And the committee also recommended, as Senator Wagner did, that the choice of representative should be by the so-called "majority rule."

Agreeing this far with Senator Wagner's bill, that is agreeing fundamentally as to the means of curing the deficiency of power that had been disclosed in practice under the N. R. A. and in section 7 (a) of the Recovery Act, the recommendations of the committee went beyond the Wagner bill in three particulars. They evidenced a greater, or they attempted perhaps, I should say, a greater concentration and a cleaner separation of functions. That is, the committee felt it was of paramount importance, and could not be overemphasized, and apparent from experience that the functions of mediation and all that goes with mediation, arbitration, and investigation by Presidential authority, if that is desirable, that all of those things should be rigidly separated from the law enforcement function of this proposed agency. I cannot say that too strongly; that is, that every step in our study of this research material, which by the way I shall be very glad to furnish to the committee, as some of it is now in shape, which the committee can have, if they want it, but at every step we seemed to encounter this same necessity.

And, secondly, we thought that the grant of power to the committee should be somewhat more comprehensive, and that should be effected by a more comprehensive definition of unlawful practices.

In the recommendations of the committee, published on February 26, 1935, those recommendations did not disclose the form of machinery that Senator Wagner had proposed—that is, the form of declaring by law what were unfair labor practices, and then giving to this board or commission the power to issue cease and desist orders. We were not so specific as that. But following that thought and in proposing amendments to the bill the committee felt that there should be a broader definition of unlawful practices, and we felt, rightly or wrongly, that there was a certain ambiguity in some of the phraseology of Senator Wagner's definition in his section 8 that could be improved upon. So that was the second head of our recommendation.

And the third was a suggestion intended to offer a positive inducement to labor and industry to enter into collective agreements by means of permitting the registration with this proposed board, or commission as we prefer to call it, of agreements that have been entered into, so that if both parties wanted to register these agreements with the commission that the commission would have power to issue cease and desist orders in support of those agreements.

The CHAIRMAN. Would it have power to issue such orders against employees?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes; either employers or employees.

So, specifically, if the Senators care to have them, we recommended that the name of the proposed agency be changed to the Federal Labor Commission, instead of the National Labor Relations Board. Now it may seem to you gentlemen a little meticulous for this committee to be recommending a change in the name of an instrument of the Government of this sort, but the committee felt very deeply on the subject of divorcing this proposed board, or commission, from all mediation functions. And the name of the Labor Relations Board has become so tied up in the public mind and in practice with mediation functions and the proposed functions of the Board, or of the bill, provided for in the bill are so analogous to the powers and functions of the Federal Trade Commission in a different field that the committee felt it would really be worth while to recommend seriously a change in the name so as to emphasize by the name, Federal Labor Commission, this same sort of semijudicial independent law enforcement function that is represented by the Federal Trade Commission in another field. And that by throwing away the name National Labor Relations Board, it might be hoped to throw away with it these functions of mediation which the committee thought the Board ought not to have, and which it is not given by the bill as we understand it.

Then along that same line and for the same purpose we proposed that section 12 of the Wagner bill, which empowers that proposed board to appoint others to act as arbitrators in labor disputes, should be omitted from this act, because the committee believes that the arbitration provisions of the proposed section 12 of the Wagner bill might appropriately be included in a separate act of Congress providing for the creation of a new Federal mediation agency, or the strengthening of the existing Federal mediation agencies in accordance with recommendation three of the committee's findings, our recommendations of February 26.

To make my ideas and the committee's perfectly specific on that subject, it is our feeling, and this was the unanimous feeling, and the various members of the committee had had experience of the same difficulty from different angles. For instance, Mr. Leiserson from the angle of the Labor Board, and then from the Mediation Board of the Railway Act.

Senator WAGNER. He was also chairman of the Petroleum Board.

Mr. DAVIS. And chairman of the Petroleum Board. And he had been in intimate contact with the whole story. I think Senator Wagner will agree that Mr. Leiserson was in as close touch as anyone with that story.

Senator WAGNER. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS. I myself had had the experience in the attempt to enforce N. R. A. generally as compliance director. And students of the subject like Professor Slichter, who had been observers merely from the outside, and Mr. Chenery, who has had practical contact with labor relations in the printing industry, and is a student of the subject, and Mr. Dennison, who had been on the Labor Board, I think, at one time as the representative of industry, and, of course, Governor Winant, who had this practical study and experience, we all felt that this mediation function, this attempt to be both a mediator and a law officer, was what had gotten the Board into great difficulty in the past. And, as I say, to make this thing specific in the minds of the Senators here, our recommendation comes to this, that these field agencies of the National Labor Relations Board, the so-called "regional boards", should not be agencies of any such board as is proposed by the Wagner bill, that is, any board with power, and that those agencies are in fact, as I think Senator Wagner will agree—he knows the story pretty well—are in fact mediation agencies and not law enforcement agencies at all. If they have a problem of law enforcement in the National Labor Relations Board it comes up to Washington. It is never settled in the field. So that I say that those field agencies belong to the mediation service, and not to the National Labor Relations Board, as proposed by Senator Wagner's bill, which ought to be a law enforcement agency.

And for that reason one of the things we recommend is the elimination of section 12, unless the Senate should think it advisable to include in the act a complete restatement and a fixing of the status of the Federal Mediation Service, or the conciliation service of the Department of Labor. The point the committee has in mind is the complete separation of the two, administratively.

The CHAIRMAN. If a complaint originated under this law relating to an unfair labor practice would you in the first instance have mediators of the Department of Labor make an investigation, and say an adjustment could be reached, and in the event that no settlement can be had provide them for the making of the complaint to this Board through the Department of Labor, or through any aggrieved party?

Mr. DAVIS. I think I would do just that, Senator. The machinery, that is, the administrative machinery——

The CHAIRMAN (interposing). Pardon me. You would try to narrow all of the activities of this Board or Commission to sitting in judgment on complaints that had merit, or that have some substance behind them, and finding the facts and issuing its orders to cease and desist?

Mr. DAVIS. With the exception that I would not deprive the Board of this power of holding elections.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; I meant that. I should have included that.

Mr. DAVIS. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. But you would not have this board send out investigators or agents or conciliators or mediators into the field, but only permit that to be done by some other department of the Government, or the Department of Labor, and permit the board simply to act as a fact-finding body or court to issue orders?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes; that is, if there was a charge that there had been interference that is a violation of the act, if that came initially to this board I would have them refer that to the mediation service as the first step. Of course, these are problems, Senator, of timing. These things are always difficult and involve administrative cooperation of the best kind to get efficient results.

But I think I agree completely—that is, my answer to your question is completely yes, if I understand it.

The CHAIRMAN. I was quite impressed, Senator Wagner knows, with that aspect of the subject last session. I did not know whether we could report the bill with that in it or not.

Senator WAGNER. Of course, mediation and conciliation should be kept in the Department of Labor; I agree with that. We do not attempt to bring that function under this board at all. They have to stay under the Department of Labor. But if you restrict the board or the commission, whatever you want to call it, and say that it cannot send anybody out to take testimony or make an examination, for instance, in some locality, I think perhaps that is a little too restrictive.

Mr. DAVIS. I did not think that was involved in Senator Walsh's question.

The CHAIRMAN. If it took jurisdiction it could do that.

Mr. DAVIS. Oh, yes. I think this board ought to have absolute power and complete power when it comes to the jurisdiction.

Senator WAGNER. Of course on mediation and conciliation I am always for permitting any machinery to make those effective.

Mr. DAVIS. I know you are, Senator, but I say this: You cannot mediate a question of law. It is impossible. We learned that. You know that.

Senator WAGNER. Yes. We do not differ on that.

The CHAIRMAN. Unless you are careful about that it puts this board into the position of prosecuting through it the employees' cases that would come before it, does it not?

Mr. DAVIS. It is the same sort of difficulty that embarrassed the Federal Trade Commission very greatly, and I am speaking now from my personal views rather than those of the committee when I say I would go very far in the direction of limiting the powers of this board to initiate the investigation. I am not sure that I would limit it absolutely to questions where complaints had been filed, because there is always the difficulty of getting an employee to file a written complaint. You have to take that into account. But I certainly would relieve it of that embarrassment and source of emergency which existed in the Federal Trade Commission and led in the early days to difficulty.

The CHAIRMAN. If we do not proceed carefully we will have a conflict here. Let me illustrate. The other day I was called on the telephone at 10 o'clock at night and informed of a strike in one of the mills in the town in which I live. And I called on the Department of Labor to send a conciliator up there. Now, the State had already had one go there, the Department of Labor had one there, and this board, if its authority is multiplied, would have a conciliator there.

Mr. DAVIS. If they could all act with as much conciliator spirit as the term implies maybe it would not do so much harm. Of course, there has been a great confusion of functions.

Senator WAGNER. It was the intent to keep that function in the Labor Department. That is the reason there is no such power given to the board under this act.

Mr. DAVIS. That was our understanding of it.

Senator WAGNER. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS. That the act did not propose to diminish the functions of the conciliation service of the Department of Labor.

The CHAIRMAN. The earliest act which we considered last year did.

Senator WAGNER. Yes; the first act.

Mr. DAVIS. We could not see, Senator Wagner, frankly, just why you proposed, when it was clear from the act that you did not propose to transfer to this board any of the conciliation services of the Department of Labor, why it was deemed wise to put in it this voluntary arbitration provisions.

Senator WAGNER. That is sort of a judicial thing. That is not a matter of mediation. That results in an absolute decision based on evidence.

Mr. DAVIS. Yes.

Senator WAGNER. That is more judicial than——

Mr. DAVIS (interposing). Than mediatory?

Senator WAGNER. Yes. And I thought in a very important controversy if this board has the prestige which I hope it will have people would not hesitate to submit a controversy to them as arbitrators, whereas they may hesitate to submit that same question to a mediator.

Mr. DAVIS. In my own view, Senator, and in a sense it is a minor thing, but I am so impressed personally from what I have seen and the contacts I have had with the immediate and tremendously great importance of breaking this log jam and solving, or beginning to solve the problem of designating representatives, that I would like to see this board confine itself to that one function.

Senator WAGNER. Yes; there is a lot in what you say.

Mr. DAVIS. If the board starts out wrong we know that from experience if they make one first mistake by going beyond their authority that would discolor the whole program adversely.

Senator WAGNER. I agree with you.

Mr. DAVIS. The next specific suggestion we had to make was with regard to section 10 of the bill. If the Senators would look at this section you will get an idea of what we are trying to do. The section 10, as it reads, paragraph (a), is as follows:

SEC. 10. (a) The Board is empowered, as herinafter provided, to prevent any person from engaging in any unfair labor practice (listed in sec. 8) affecting commerce.

Now that first sentence we propose to replace by the following:

The Commission is empowered, as hereinafter provided, to issue a cease and desist order to prevent any person from engaging in any unfair labor practice (listed in sec. 8) affecting commerce.

That is, instead of saying, "is empowered to prevent", we say, "is empowered to issue orders." There were two reasons for that. It seemed to us it should be made perfectly clear that this board and this board alone has the power to issue this type of order. What will happen after that order is issued is provided in the bill. It goes to court if there is any dispute about it.

The CHAIRMAN. In other words, you define more specifically the prevention power.

Mr. DAVIS. Yes.

Senator WAGNER. Affirmatively, would not that be better?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; affirmatively.

Senator WAGNER. It is rather more affirmatively.

Mr. DAVIS. There is an element in it, Senator, and it is of the story I am sure you are familiar with, about the common council in our native town that passed a resolution, so it is said, that the picture of our beloved mayor be, and the same hereby is, hung on the walls of the council room.

This empowering to prevent——

Senator WAGNER. (interposing). Yes.

Mr. DAVIS (continuing); which we would like to do. And the next sentence was this power in the bill shall be exclusive and shall not be affected by any other means of adjustment or prevention that has been or may be established by agreement, code, law, or otherwise, except as provided in section 11, it seemed to us that that language was ambitious. The purpose of it, I think, is to assure that this board shall have superior power to all the other boards.

Senator WAGNER. Yes; that is the purpose.

Mr. DAVIS. We propose to say it differently:

The power to issue such cease and desist orders shall be vested exclusively in the commission.

We call it a commission instead of a board.

Provided, That nothing in this section shall limit the jurisdiction of the several district courts of the United States as provided in section 11.

What we are trying to say there, Senators, is this board shall have the power to issue cease and desist orders. If any other board or board agency, we will say, the workers and the management in some industry agree among themselves to create a board, which of course they have the right to do——

The CHAIRMAN (interposing). Or any court that may adjudicate or adjust the matters, or any other law anticipating the power of cease and desist.

Mr. DAVIS. But they have to come to this Commission, you see, because I think this contemplates no other function. If this board wanted to say to the petroleum board, "We are going to conduct an election, and to empower you to do it for us," that would be within its power, but anything that the petroleum board or textile board or any other of these boards, any time when they came up to a member of the industry who refused to obey the law, who would interfere or whatnot, then they would have to call on this national board for the cease and desist order.

It is another way of saying, I think, that these special industrial relations boards in the several industries would be mediation boards and not law-enforcement boards. It is a further carrying forward of the idea of dividing these two functions. That is, the power to be given to the Commission or board is the power to issue orders to cease and desist.

The Federal Mediation Service and the various industrial boards will not have that power and must come to the proposed Commission for any such order. Here the words in the bill "shall not be affected by any other means of adjustment or prevention that has been or may be established" and so forth, are ambiguous in the extreme. In them might well be found a place of lodgment for seeds of trouble that would mar the performance of the proposed Commission and lower its position in public esteem at the very outset. I think Senator Wagner will agree with me that it is at the outset this thing is going wrong if it goes wrong at all.

The next suggestion we had to make was with reference to section 7 of the bill.

We recommend that section 7 be replaced by the following:

The right of the employees to full freedom of association, self-organization, and designation of representatives of their own choosing for collective bargaining with their employers is hereby recognized and affirmed. It shall be the duty of the Commission to foster that right, and to encourage collective bargaining.

Now, inasmuch as this right already exists, the natural right, it seemed to us better that the Congress should merely affirm it as an existing right than that the form of the expression in the bill should be adopted, which seems to create the right. Of course, the right has been affirmed over and over again by the Congress.

Senator WAGNER. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS. In Coolidge's time and Hoover's time and the present administration.

And the bill itself does not really declare the duty of the board anywhere, it seemed to me or to us, and so we added this sentence:

It shall be the duty of the Commission to foster that right, and to encourage collective bargaining.

And then for section 8, which are the definitions of unfair labor practices, we recommended a substitution.

The bill starts out: "It shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer" to do certain specified things.

We recommend the following:

It shall be an unfair labor practice—

(1) For anyone to interfere by fraud or violence with the free exercise by an employee of his right to participate in the formation of a labor organization or with the free exercise of his right to choose representatives for collective bargaining.

The purpose of that was to give the Commission the same power necessary, we thing, to its effective functioning to issue cease and desist orders against fraud or violence that the Federal Courts now have to issue injunctions in labor disputes against fraud or violence.

The words "fraud or violence" are the words of the Norris-LaGuardia Anti-injunction Act. That is the limitation on the power of the Federal courts to issue injunctions in the Norris-LaGuardia Act in labor disputes against fraud or violence. And so we thought that this board should have the same power, or otherwise this condition might exist. The board has taken jurisdiction of a dispute. Something comes up. It has complete power to issue its orders. Fraud or violence comes into the picture. Unless it can issue its orders against that then it must go by the roundabout course of going to a Federal court, which it has the power to do under section 11 of the bill, getting that court to enjoin the fraud or violence which is interfering with the function of the board in that particular dispute.

However, it is important to note this, that the effect of this paragraph in any case is limited to the jurisdiction of the Commission itself over unfair labor practices. It does not enlarge or diminish the jurisdiction of the Federal court, and it could not afford any basis for suits by employers against their employees in those courts. The power of this first section is limited to the jurisdiction of the Commission, and no action can be taken under it for fraud or violence, except before the Commission; for any other act of fraud or violence the Federal courts are open as they are today. I am emphasizing that to you, Senators, because in some of the discussion that has come to my attention on the subject it has been suggested that our proposal would open the door to fear. And I am frank to say as to what is generally stated in the committee's recommendation of February 26, the general language is, I think, too broad for a statute.

But this language that we put in paragraph 1 here is, we believe, desirable and necessary to the full functioning of the Commission, and we do not believe that it will open the door to oppression of anyone. We are assuming, of course, an intelligent or upright commission or board. The only door it opens is the door of the board in any event.

The CHAIRMAN. Will you read that again, that language?

Mr. DAVIS (reading):

> It shall be an unfair labor practice for anyone to interfere by fraud or violence with the free exercise by an employee of his right to participate in the formation of a labor organization or with the free exercise of his right to choose representatives for collective bargaining.

We go on in the next paragraph, following rather closely Senator Wagner's sections, to set that off by this language:

> It shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer to interfere in any way with the free exercise by an employee of his right to participate in the formation and in the activities of a labor organization or with the free exercise of his right to choose representatives for collective bargaining, or to contribute financial or equivalent support to any such labor organization.

Now, we believe that the broader prohibition as against an employer is of the very essence of the situation, as we understand it is the purpose of the Wagner bill, that is, the power of an employer to influence the representatives of his employees, or to influence his employees themselves is vastly greater than the power of an employee to influence his employer. We all know that. And in the minds of this twentieth century fund committee the fundamental thing to be done now, is absolutely clear the representatives of the workers from all influence of the employer. And we do not think that that means that you are saying that employees and employers cannot sit across the table and deal with one another, bargain with one another, that they must be enemies, but we do say that you cannot get strong, outright friendly cooperation, unless you have equal parties on the two sides of the table. By that we mean equally free to represent the people they are there to talk for.

The CHAIRMAN. You used the word "influence." I thought you used the word "interference."

Mr. DAVIS. We did use the word "influence."

The CHAIRMAN. In this discussion you used the word "influence."

Mr. DAVIS. I did; yes.

The CHAIRMAN. There is a great deal of difference between "influence" and "interference."

Mr. DAVIS. Yes; I think there is. But I used deliberately the broadest word in my talk.

The CHAIRMAN. Will you read that language again?

Mr. DAVIS. We say for an employer to interfere in any way.

The CHAIRMAN. You would not object to an employer saying to his men, to his employees, that so-and-so and so-and-so, who has attempted to organize you, we think, represents un-American ideals and purposes in trying to organize a Communistic labor organization.

Mr. DAVIS. I would not make it unlawful for an employer to say that. If I were an employer, I would not say it to my own employees.

The CHAIRMAN. No; of course not. That would not be interference. That would be, perhaps, influence.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not think it would influence them an awful lot, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. No; but it would be.

Mr. DAVIS. It would be an attempt to influence them.

The CHAIRMAN. And to make suggestions, of course, is not interfering.

Mr. DAVIS. Yes. And it might be 100 percent a good intent. My only opinion is that an employee is just as well able to decide what is happening to him in Communism as the employer is.

The CHAIRMAN. Could you prevent him from urging his men—I would not say urging—in trying to influence his employees to form a company union in preference to another form of union?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes; I certainly would.

The CHAIRMAN. To influence them?

Mr. DAVIS. Because you go to a man whose bread and butter is dependent on your pay envelop and suggest to him you think it would be a good thing for him to form a company union. Conditions differ, of course. It depends on the relations between the men and the employer. But it so easily leads to what is coercion and fear.

The CHAIRMAN. Perhaps it is necessary to use some other word than interference then—influence.

Mr. DAVIS. We thought a good deal about that, Senator, and like all other legislation all you can do is set the bounds and let the administrative or judicial agent decide it.

The CHAIRMAN. Decide what is the meaning of interference?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir. The word "interfere" has been judicially passed on in such acts over and over again. I found quite a considerable amount of learning on the subject in words and phrases. And we thought that "interfere" was the best word that could be used.

Senator WAGNER. That has been frequently used by the United States Supreme Court.

Mr. DAVIS. Yes. There is a lot of judicial literature on the subject.

Senator WAGNER. Yes; a lot of it.

Mr. DAVIS. Then we made the proviso in this Section 2:

Provided,* That subject to rules and regulations made and published by the Commission pursuant to section 6 (a), an employer shall not be forbidden to allow to an employee his regular rate of pay for time devoted during working hours to his duties as a representative of the employees.

That is a little broader than Senator Wagener's bill has it.

The bill reads this way:

That subject to rules and regulations made and published by the Board pursuant to section 6 (a), an employer shall not be prohibited from permitting employees to confer with him during working hours without loss of time or pay.

It seemed to us it was necessary and not wise to limit that to the mere time the employee was conferring with his employer, and that you could quite safely let the men do their collective bargaining work so far as it might be done on company time without any taint at all of influencing the men in favor of the company. And I do not see why, for instance, if you have a man who is going to confer with the employer he may be conferring on behalf of someone else, and I do not see why you should not take the time to confer with his constituents so to speak also on company time. It is a minor matter.

The third paragraph we recommended this substitute:

It shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer to discharge or discriminate against or in favor of an employee for any activity in connection with forming, joining, or assisting any collective bargaining agency of employees or in connection with the choice of employee-representatives for collective bargaining.

That corresponds in substance to the provision in the bill, which is paragraph 3, by discrimination in regard to hire or tenure of employment, or any term or condition of employment to encourage or discourage the membership in any labor organization. Now that would be too narrow for the purposes of our substitution, although it may be sufficient in the bill as it stood, which had in Section 8 the first sentence:

To interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in section 7.

In taking out that general sentence, or modifying it to make it embrace anyone then it became necessary to make the language of these other sections more comprehensive. And that is all we have done in section 3. And then we go on with the majority rule proviso in this form, " that nothing in this act "——

The CHAIRMAN. Are you still on section 8?

Mr. DAVIS. Section 8, yes, sir:

That nothing in this Act, or in the National Recovery Act as amended from time to time, or in any code or agreement approved or prescribed thereunder, or in any other statute of the United States, shall preclude an employer from making an agreement with a labor organization (not established, maintained, or assisted by any action defined in this Act as an unfair labor practice) to require as a condition of employment membership therein, if such labor organization is the representative of the majority of the employees in the appropriate collective bargaining unit covered by such an agreement when made.

I was mistaken in saying that was the majority rule provision. That is, of course, the provision which permits the so-called " closed shop agreements." Many such are now in full force, and the facts that were before us showed that it is now——

The CHAIRMAN (interposing). Such agreement?

Mr. DAVIS. These closed shop agreements would mean immediate and terrific upset in existing labor relations much more so than I had ever supposed until I studied this data.

The fourth is we say:

For an employer to discharge or otherwise discriminate against an employee because he has filed charges or given testimony under this Act.

And then we add as a fifth:

For either party to an agreement that has been registered pursuant to section 12 of this act to violate or to fail to observe any condition of such agreement.

In other words, that section 5 was put in here to implement the proposal of our section 12.

Senator WAGNER. Registration?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, registration. And in order to tie those together I will turn to our proposed section 12.

The CHAIRMAN. Just a moment. There is a new unfair labor practice proposed. Mr. Magruder, do you recall the language of that additional fair practice that has been proposed?

Mr. MAGRUDER. The provision which makes it a violation to refuse to bargain which was submitted by Mr. Biddle?

The CHAIRMAN. The practice for an employer to refuse to meet in good faith with the representatives of his employees for the purpose of collective bargaining. Was that it?

Mr. MAGRUDER. That it shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer to refuse to bargain collectively with the representatives of his employees. That was the amendment proposed by Chairman Biddle.

Mr. DAVIS. I think there is some such language in that Railway Labor Act, is there not?

Senator WAGNER. There is a provision of that kind. I think it is a reasonable effort. What was that language, Mr. Keyserling?

Mr. KEYSERLING. I think in the Railway Labor Act amendment that the language seemed to be that employers and employees should make every reasonable effort to reach agreements.

Senator WAGNER. Reasonable efforts to make an agreement. That was not the language suggested here.

The CHAIRMAN. I think it is with reference to meeting.

Senator WAGNER. Yes. I think it made it an unfair labor practice to refuse to meet with the representatives for the purpose of reaching a collective bargaining agreement.

Mr. DAVIS. I think that goes without saying on the present bill.

Senator WAGNER. I think so, too. I think it is definitely implied.

Mr. DAVIS. Yes.

Senator WAGNER. Otherwise the legislation would be just definitely meaningless.

Mr. DAVIS. Yes. Of course, you can lead a horse to water, but you cannot make him drink. Our section 12 was as follows:

Registration of collective agreements: Whenever there shall be presented to the Commission an agreement between an employer and a duly represented collective bargainig agency of his employees (not established, maintained, or assisted by any action defined in this Act as an unfair labor practice), together with a written request by both parties to the agreement that the Commission register the agreement, then the Commission shall have the power and the duty to register the agreement and to supply to each of the parties a certificate of registration thereof: Provided, That the Commission may in its discretion refuse registration of the agreement if, in the opinion of the Commission, the agreement is contrary to existing law or would tend to defeat the purpose of this Act, or does not contain such minimum provisions for notice of intention to change the agreement, and for adjusting complaints and disputes, as the Commission may require by appropriate rules and regulations not inconsistent with this Act.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that to be a substitute for 12, or an additional section?

Mr. DAVIS. A substitute for 12.

The CHAIRMAN. Taking out the arbitration features of the bill?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What are the reasons for it?

Mr. DAVIS. The reasons of the committee were these: They felt that if the well-integrated industries, that is well-integrated from the labor point of view, the industries in which there were well-organized labor it had been shown historically that the agreements made and signed were pretty generally lived up to. But there is a feeling, more or less pathetic perhaps, but based on some history, that in the less integrated industries, and particularly in the mass production industries, or in any place where an inexperienced collective bargaining group were functioning it might well happen that the agreement when signed would not be as strong and as well supported as it is with a thoroughly organized labor organization, and that that being so that both of the parties having agreed at the time to this thing might both feel better assurance if they registered it with this Commission.

You have there in that period a willingness on both sides and an intention on both sides to observe the agreement undoubtedly. You are likely to have some misgivings about it on both sides. That has been evidenced by what we have seen. And the feeling of the Commission was that if in such a case where both sides wanted to do it they registered the agreement with the Commission, and then after that the Commission had the power to enforce that agreement as long as it lasted.

There were some suggestions—there are always suggestions proposed to anything—this was some untying the hands of labor, or management, or somehow giving to the Government the power to control labor agreements. Nothing of that kind was contemplated. It was absolutely voluntary and dependent on the willingness of both sides to register. But it did seem to the committee and still seems to the committee that this affords a very real and substantial possibility of the assurance of a continuity of signed agreements, particularly in industries where the workers are equipped to bargain collectively, perhaps, but are not organized in the modern sense.

There is just one more point that I have.

Senator WAGNER. Mr. Davis, before you leave that I was going to ask you did your committee or your research agency make any surveys as to how generally, if generally, legitimate labor organizations live up to their collective bargaining agreements when they are made?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes; there was. The reports of the staff appear to cover that subject, Senator. I can let you have a copy of that section.

Senator WAGNER. Do you remember what their conclusion was?

Mr. DAVIS. The conclusion was in general very definitely that those agreements had been lived up to.

Senator WAGNER. That has been my own independent investigation, too.

Mr. DAVIS. Oh, yes. That was our conclusion very definitely.

Senator WAGNER. I asked you that because there have been a number of statements made here to the contrary, as if the labor organizations were all lawless and made agreements but did not observe them at all except as long as it suited their purpose. I do not think that is the general experience.

Mr. DAVIS. That certainly was not the substance of the reports. I will be very glad to send you that when I get hold of it.

There is one other thing, Senator, if I might take the time, and that is in section 9 of the Wagner bill we recommend the substitution for section (c) the following, or for paragraph (c), rather, and we propose to substitute the following:

Whenever a controversy affecting commerce arises among employees concerning the representation—and we add using the language of the railway labor bill, and emphasizing that the controversies we are now speaking of are controversies among employees—concerning the representation of employees for collective bargaining, the Commission may, at the request of any party to the controversy or its own initiative, investigate such controversy and certify to the parties and to the employer, in writing, the name or names of the representatives who have been designated or selected; and we add:

but the employer shall not be recognized as a party to such a controversy.

That is an idea which we are attempting to crystallize, and an idea which is foreshadowed in the Railway Labor Act, and which has been applied by nearly all the labor boards. I think the steel board and the National Industrial Relations Board and the Railway Labor Board have all ruled that the employer is not a legal or proper party to a dispute as to who are the representatives of his employees.

Senator WAGNER. In other words, it is none of his affair at all? Is that your understanding?

Mr. DAVIS. He is interested in it, of course.

Senator WAGNER. No; I said the selection.

Mr. DAVIS. But it is not his dispute. He is not a party to the controversy. We may be interested in a controversy between Belgium and England on the value of the belga today, but we are not parties to that controversy. We cannot do anything about it. And in the minds of our committee and in this discussion this thing came up over and over again, the importance of driving home the fact that the choice of representatives is a matter for the employees alone, and that when these disputes arise they are disputes between two groups of employees, and not between one group and an employer.

And when Senator Wagner looks back I am sure on his own experience he will agree with me in saying this, that the confusion that has existed on that score has been mixed up all of the time with this confusion of the mediation functions and law-enforcement functions. Always in these disputes almost invariably before the national board the employer was there as a party and mediation was in the foreground. If you say to the employer, "Now, you just stay out of this, we will decide which of these groups of employees is the majority, and therefore which one is representative"——

Senator WAGNER. Of course, the employer frequently took the stand, which a good many of them still take without any legal basis, that they have a right to decide whether their workers shall have an election or not to select representatives.

Mr. DAVIS. And all good Americans are familiar with that situation, Senator.

Senator WAGNER. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS. We can all remember when some people thought they had the right to decide whether we could have elections or not.

Senator WAGNER. Yes; that is right.

Mr. DAVIS. But this committee and people in general have no sympathy with that idea.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course, if you take the stage of the proceedings in connection with the representatives the court would have no jurisdiction over the employer, but after it announced the rule of chosen representatives and the employer refused to recognize them then it would be in the Commission's power in the exercise of the power to issue cease and desist orders to make the employer a party to it.

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir; make the order against him.

The CHAIRMAN. The order up to that time would be against the group representing the workers.

Mr. DAVIS. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. But, of course, you could not have a situation where an employer would have an order issued against him where he was not a party.

Mr. DAVIS. Yes. That is, if he came, and there was a second controversy then he would be a party to the second controversy. But in the primary matter he would not be a party.

Would it be worth while for me to leave a copy of these findings and recommendations of February 26th?

The CHAIRMAN. Do you think in view of your complete discussion of the statement of your Board that it is necessary to incorporate that in the record, the report in full?

Mr. DAVIS. I have not any idea of what your practice is, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. We would be glad to if you wish to, but I was wondering if you had not covered it thoroughly.

Mr. DAVIS. I have two documents here. One is the findings and recommendations of the committee, which I have not discussed in detail. The other is a printed statement of what I was going to say here, and I have covered that quite fully.

The CHAIRMAN. I think the other document ought to go in.

Mr. DAVIS. I think if you could put in the findings and recommendations of the committee, I know the committee would like to have them in .

(The findings and recommendations referred to are as follows:)

FINDINGS AND RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON THE GOVERNMENT AND LABOR OF THE TWENTIETH CENTURY FUND, INC.

In the study that has been made of the role of the Government in labor relations collective bargaining between employers and their employees stands out as of predominant importance. From a difficult birth in the days when the banding together of employees to make demands on their employers was looked upon as an unlawful conspiracy in restraint of trade, the practice has grown to its present stature. In recent years, under the Coolidge and the Hoover administrations and under the present administration, the policy of the United States to protect and foster the right of employees to organize and to choose their own representatives for collective bargaining without interference, restraint, or coercion has been declared and reiterated by Congress.[1]

[1] This policy is declared in the Railway Labor Act, 45 U. S. Code 151a, May 20, 1926; in the Norris-LaGuardia Anti-Injunctions Act, 29 U. S. Code 102, Mar. 23, 1932; the Bankruptcy act (interstate railroads), 11 U. S. Code 205, as amended Mar. 3, 1933, the National Industrial Recovery Act, 15 U. S. Code 707a, June 16, 1933; and in the amended Railway Labor Act, 45 U. S. Code 152, of June 21, 1934.

In its study the twentieth century fund has assumed that this settled policy would not be abandoned. The President in his message to Congress of February 20, 1935, has recommended that the rights of employees freely to organize for the purpose of collective bargaining should be fully and duly protected. The effective development fo collective bargaining presents, we believe, the most immediately pressing problem in the relation of the Federal Government to labor.

In the Recovery Act Congress, in furtherance of this policy, affirmed the right of the employees to organize and to select their own bargaining representatives without interference, and expressly prohibited discrimination by an employer against an employee because of such activities. We believe that reclarification of the law by further definition of prohibited practices is possiable, and that the need for more adequate administrative and enforcement machinery has been demonstrated by experience.

REGISTRATION OF AGREEMENTS

We believe, furthermore, that it is possible and desirable to go beyond the mere assertion of right and prohibition of interference, in the direction of positive and useful encouragement of collective agreements between management and labor. The organization of workers, and their choice of representatives for collective bargaining are, after all, only means to an end—the establishment and observance of written agreements. We think it is desirable that such agreements, freely arrived at between employers and their employees, should, if the parties to the agreement so desire, and after registration by an appropriate governmental agency, be sanctioned by giving to such agency appropriate power to enforce the agreements.

It must be conceded that collective bargaining is not a panacea for industrial ills; that it does not always create sound industrial relations and that too and to minimize their common interests has impaired the effective collective bargaining, insofar as its tendency may be to increase the rigidity of wage rates unduly, would create economic problems of the most fundamental sort. Nevertheless at the present time the fostering of collective bargaining should be the keystone of the Government's labor policy, in order that there may now be introduced some rough measure of equality into the bargaining power of employers and employees and the beginning of better machinery for meeting their common problems.

It is, however, self-evident that in any society in which employers and employees retain a large measure of freedom, strikes, and lockouts are likely to occur. The spread of organizations for collective bargaining is not likely, in its early stages at least, to diminish strikes and lockouts. Indeed until the two sides become used to the practice of collective bargaining and develop skill in effecting compromises, strikes and lockouts may increase. We are, therefore, of the opinion that the Government's policy of guaranteeing the right to bargain collectively should be supplemented by improved machinery for handling industrial disputes, because it is clear that in the future, as in the past, the Federal Government will find it necessary to intervene in such disputes whenever they are so widespread or so important as seriously to obstruct the free flow of interstate commerce and threaten the general welfare.

MEDIATION AND ENFORCEMENT

Confusion of function, overlapping of authority and deficiency of power are observable in the national and industrial labor relations agencies that have been created under and in connection with the Recovery Act. We are thoroughly convinced that it is essential to separate governmental mediation in labor disputes from the administration of labor law; and it is clear that the problem further requires for its solution agencies that can take care of minor law infractions and minor disputes promptly and locally and that the district attorneys and the lower Federal courts should be relieved of the burden of such cases.

We believe that these considerations point directly to the desirability of a permanent Federal labor law, not limited to codified industries but applicable in all cases that affect interstate commerce or threaten the general welfare, and creating a quasi-judicial agency vested with the power to hear and decide complaints of law violation, and carefully separated from any mediation functions.

SPECIFIC RECOMMENDATIONS

In the light of these facts, we make the following recommendations and suggestions:

1. We recommend the enactment of a Federal labor law, separate from the Recovery Act and applicable to all industries (except railroads, which are already covered by the Railroad Labor Act) guaranteeing to the workers freedom for association, self-organization, and choice of representatives, and designed to encourage and sanction collective agreements with respect to hours, wages ad working conditions.

It is desirable that, with such particularity as is reasonably possible but without limitation, the act should define and declare to be unlawful specific acts of interference, restraint, or coercion. Thus we believe it should be declared to be unlawful:

(a) For anyone to intimidate or coerce employees in the free exercise of their right to organize and to choose their own representatives for collective bargaining.

(b) For an employer to discriminate against or in favor of an employee for any activity in connection with any employee organization, selection of representatives for collective bargaining; but this should not impair the right of an employer to make a collective agreement that requires membership in a particular employee organization as a condition of employment where the employee organization with the bargain which is made represents the majority of the employees in an established bargaining unit;

(c) For an employer to interfere in any way with the formation or administration of any collective bargaining agency of his employees or with the choice of employee representatives for collective bargaining, or to contribute financial or equivalent support to any such collective bargaining agency; but the allowance of regular rates of pay to an employee for time devoted during working hours to his duties as a representative of the employees should not be forbidden; and

(d) For an employer to discharge or otherwise discriminate against an employee because he has filed charges or given testimony under the act.

2. We recommend that the act provide for a Federal Labor Commission, a permanent and independent governmental agency whose members shall be appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate, and which shall have the following functions: (a) Jurisdiction of all violations of the act; (b) jurisdiction over all disputes that arise between or among employees on questions of employee organization and representation, with power to decide what is the appropriate unit of employee organization or association for the purposes of collective bargaining, and to hold elections and otherwise determine and certify the duly chosen representatives of such units; and (c) the power under appropriate rules and regulations to register, at the joint request of the parties, and to enforce trade agreements of definite duration freely entered into by employers and their employees.

The commission should not be a policy-making body, but should confine itself to administering policy as defined in the laws. Because of its quasi-judicial nature it should be independent of any department of the Government and should not be assigned the duty of policing the codes adopted under the Recovery Act of investigating any unsettled questions of policy.

The Commission should not be a power to enforce its decisions by cease and desist orders, enforceable in the United States Circuit Courts of Appeal at the instance of the Commission and reviewable in those courts at the instance of any party aggrieved by any order of the Commission granting or denying relief. The Commission should have full power of investigation and examination of witnesses, with the right to subpena witnesses, pay rolls, and other records, and to administer oaths. It should have the power to appoint regional directors and examiners, and to establish or utilize such local agencies or industry boards as may be found necessary. It should have the power to delegate its powers of investigation and examination of witnesses and its power to conduct elections, but it should not be permitted to delegate its power to issue cease and desist orders or its power to order elections. The jurisdiction of the Commission to issue cease and desist orders, to determine bargaining units, and to order elections in disputed cases, should be exclusive of all other agencies. The Commission should have the discretion to defer its exercise of jurisdiction until it is satisfied that all other available means of settlement have been utilized.

MAJORITY REPRESENTATION

We believe that the representatives chosen by a majority of employees in any bargaining unit should be the exclusive representatives for all other basic working employees in that unit for collective bargaining as to wages, hours, and other basic working conditions. But it should be understood that nothing in the act will deprive any individual or minority group of the right to present to their employer grievances which do not affect the wages, hours, or other working conditions established by collective agreement.

The right of employees to organize and to choose their own representatives is a right with which the employer should not interfere in any way. Any such interference prohibited by the act becomes a violation of law. It is not a labor dispute and is not susceptible of mediation. Disputes about employee organization and selection of representatives, leading to adjudication as to appropriate bargaining units and to the holding of employee elections, can properly arise only between groups of employees.

With respect to collective agreements to be registered with the Commission, the registration should be dependent upon the consent of both parties and there should be reserved to the Commission the discretion to refuse registration if, in its opinion, the agreement is contrary to existing law or would tend to defeat the purposes of the act, and unless and until the agreement makes such minimum provisions for notice of intention to change the agreement, and for adjusting complaints and disputes, as the Commission may require by appropriate rules and regulations. Upon the complaint of either party to a registered collective agreement that the agreement has been breached, the Commission should have the power to investigate the complaint, to render a decision in regard to it, and to issue cease and desist orders; provided, however, that the Commission is satisfied that the aggrieved party has exhausted all remedies provided in the agreement.

VIOLATIONS NOT CRIMINAL OFFENSES

Our recommendations do not include any provisions making a violation of the act or of the codes a criminal offense. We believe that criminal prosecution is unwise in a plan which depends for its ultimate success on collective agreements between employers and employees. It seems preferable to rely upon the exercise of powers and analogous to the equity powers of the Federal courts sanctioned by cease and desist orders and injunctions.

It may be noted that the proposals under recommendation 2 with respect to registration of collective agreements may be thought of as a substitute for section 7 (b) of the Recovery Act. It substitutes for the approval by the President the registration by the proposed commisison under the new act.

3. We recommend the creation of a Federal mediation agency or the strengthening of existing Federal mediation agencies, with the power to mediate in all industrial disputes between employers and employees which obstruct or threaten to obstruct the free flow of interstate commerce or threaten the general welfare, and, failing success, to recommend the appointment of a special investigating commission by the President.

This mediation agency should have no power of law enforcement, but written agreements made under its auspices should be registerable with the law-enforcement agency as suggested in recommendation 2 above.

We think this mediation agency should include carefully selected and more or less permanent local panels made up of responsible representatives of employers and employees to be available when called upon to act on mediation boards.

The mediation service should be available to mediate and decide disputes arising under an existing collective agreement lawfully entered into. If the agreement is registered with the commission as recommended in recommendation 2 above, the commission would have authority to receive and decide all complaints of violation of the agreement. This would not interfere with the inherent right of the parties to settle disputes arising under registered agreements with the assistance of the mediation service.

Where the employees are not organized or have not chosen bargaining representatives, either should be free to ask the mediation service for assistance, and the service should be required to make an offer to mediate for acceptance or rejection by the other side.

15 DAYS' NOTICE

For the purpose of providing a reasonable period within which disputes that might be given to strikes or lockouts may be mediated, we recommend that there be established by law an obligation to give 15 days' notice by employers and employees of all changes or demanded changes in wages, hours, or working conditions, except where (a) there is an agreement which provides for a different period of notice, and (b) the employees have no chosen bargaining representatives, in which case they, but not the employers, should be relieved of the obligation to give notice.

Upon notice of a contemplated change in wages, hours, or other working conditions, either the party notice or the party receiving notice should be allowed to request the mediation service to intervene, and the head of the mediation service should be empowered in such cases to intervene on his own initiative.

The mediation service should thereupon, within the statutory 15-day period, or within such extended period as may have been agreed upon by the disputants, seek to bring about a settlement of the issues in dispute or, failing that, should endeavor to induce the disputants to submit their differences to voluntary arbitration.

Failing either of those things, and if in the opinion of the mediation service the dispute is likely to result in a strike or lockout whch will create a national emergency or seriously interfere with the free flow of commerce among the States, or otherwise threatens the general welfare, then the head of the mediation service should certify these facts to the President of the United States. Under these circumstances the President should be authorized by the law to appoint a special commission to investigate the dispute and to make a report to the public setting forth the facts and a specific recommendation for the settlement of the dispute.

These recommendations do not include any limitation by law upon the right to strike or lockout.

4. We recommend, finally, that a special commission be created to conduct an intensive study of the practices of employers and employees in collective bargaining and industrial disputes, as well as the internal operations of the agencies through which these relations are carried on, in order that it may recommend to Congress further definitions of such unlawful labor practices as involve unfair interference on the part of employers with employees or on the part of employees with employers.

The nature and conduct of agencies of collective bargaining become of increasing concern to the public as these agencies become increasingly responsible for important trade agreements. This fact will lead to a demand for specific legislation in these matters. The law and governmental responsibility will develop either in a haphazard way without an adequate study of the problems. We feel that the problems are difficult and important beyond the scope of this investigation, and therefore make the foregoing recommendation.

The CHAIRMAN. I notice in your statement you released to the press you stated the main purposes of the Wagner labor relations bill included the majority rule. You have discussed that majority rule in the bill, I assume?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir. That is specifically discussed in these findings and recommendations, and since we agreed with the Senator we had nothing to say on it except to put it in.

The CHAIRMAN. So your views on that are contained in the transcript we have just put in the record?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

STATEMENT OF ROBERT M. BUCK, VICE PRESIDENT OF THE AMERICAN NEWSPAPER GUILD FOR REGION 13, WASHINGTON, D. C.

The CHAIRMAN. Your full name is Robert M. Buck?

Mr. BUCK. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What is your occupation?

Mr. BUCK. I am vice president of the American Newspaper Guild for region 13, which comprises the District of Columbia.

I am not a salaried officer of the Guild, but I am a reporter in Washington working daily for salary.

The Guild has 10,000 members in the United States organized since December 1933, out of a potential 25,000, covering 125 cities in 30 States.

In Washington we have approximately 400 members. They are the reporters, the correspondents, editorial writers, columnists, copy editors, photographers, artists—the men who first handle the raw material which goes through the factories in our industry. We did not expect the publishers were coming here to oppose this bill. I heard Mr. Harvey J. Kelly's testimony in their behalf on Friday. We resent Mr. Kelly's appearance as a representative of the newspaper industry for the purpose of protesting against this bill, on two counts.

First, we do not admit that the newspaper industry is opposed to this bill. We are a part of the newspaper industry and we do not oppose it. After we have finished handling the raw material in our industry it goes to the printing trades who next fashion it, and I am not informed that they are opposed to this bill.

When the papers get out on the street they are circulated by large armies of men not affiliated with us, and they are a part of the industry. I am not told they are opposed to the bill.

Two-thirds of the revenue of the newspapers comes from advertising, and the advertising is taken in and accounted for by another large army of persons, who have not found themselves able without such a bill as this, to organize and bargain collectively, and they are a part of the industry. I am not informed they are against the bill.

The publishers are not all of this industry, and the working newspaper men organized newly as they are, bitterly resent the attitude of the National Recovery Administration that always speaks of the industry as the employers.

A year ago we supported this bill, and based on 12 months' bitter experience we now do so more emphatically than ever.

In this week's Editor and Publisher, which is an organ of the publishers, there is a leading article and an editorial calling for refusal by the publishers to assent to a continuance of their code after June 16 of this year when it expires; but, Mr. J. David Stern, publisher of the New York Post, the Philadelphia Record, and the Camden (N. J.) Courier and Post, subscribing to that sentiment says:

> Our newspapers are opposed to continuation of codes in all industry, except for provisions covering minimum wages and maximum hours. If the Wagner bill is passed by Congress as it should be, then it is no longer necessary to maintain any code.

I do not know how many publishers agree with Mr. Stern, but there is at least one who does not subscribe to the sentiment expressed by Mr. Kelly on Friday.

We agree with Mr. Stern. If this bill is enacted we do not need a code, and God knows we do not want one; it has bothered us long enough.

That is the first count on which we resent Mr. Kelly's representation of the industry here. We do not resent his appearing and stating his personal view.

The second count is that he is not a member of the newspaper industry. He is a member of the labor fighting industry, just like Mr. Emery of the National Manufacturers' Association. He is an employee, not of any newspaper, but of an organization of newspapers for the purpose of resisting labor. As chairman of the Special Planning Committee of the American Newspapers Publishers Association he is that association's gladiator, resisting labor's demand for those members having contractual relations with the mechanical trades union.

He said, in his testimony, quoting from his statement, that his association has " a well-developed equality of bargaining power with labor." I shall not pause to comment on the equality in general of the bargaining power of our powerful employers with ourselves, but I wish to point out that he did not tell you this association also maintains an open-shop division headed by another like himself who is charged with the prevention of collective bargaining of the several hundred papers which do not recognize organizations even in the mechanical trades.

All but a handful of the 1,910 daily papers in the United States refuse to recognize us, the Organized Workers of the News Department, and Mr. Kelly is one of the generalissimi who formulate militant tactics in the publishers' campaign to defeat our efforts of collective bargaining.

On Friday I heard Senator Wagner ask Mr. Kelly for a copy of a pamphlet of such tactics that was sent out secretly. Although Mr. Kelly said it was not secret, it went to his members and did not go to anybody else. It was secret except for his members, telling them how to circumvent the Guild in its efforts at collective bargaining.

This pamphlet was revealed in a hearing before the Newspaper Industrial Board at one of our Guild cases in Boston last week. Mr. Kelly said, if I remember his testimony correctly, that he did not know which document Senator Wagner referred to. That is incomprehensible to me. He was present in Boston at the meeting of the Board, as the chairman of the Board, if you please, when that document was most unwillingly wrung from him and read into the record. It was the only document that could fit that description, that the name Boston could currently apply to, yet he told this committee he did not know which document it was.

Although that document was read into the record several days ago, I have been unable to get a copy of it yet.

The CHAIRMAN. You mean in the record in Boston?

Mr. BUCK. Yes, sir. I telephoned our headquarters in New York on Friday to get it for the committee, since Mr. Kelly would not submit it. They had not received it at the Guild in New York, and had not received a copy of the transcript of the Boston proceedings, although it is several days since the proceedings were had. They telephoned in turn, to Boston, and the Boston Guild had not received its transcript.

Then, Mr. Jonathan Eddy, our national secretary, wired to Mr. Kelly in Chicago as follows:

> Boston Guild has not received transcript of hearing as ordered. This office has not received transcript text of exhibit 13 as ordered. Please send extra copy of latter to Robert Buck, Washington. Please advise me by wire when we may expect to receive our transcripts.

Mr. Kelly advised that they would be mailed, presumably from Chicago, Monday or Tuesday; so if I receive a copy of it before this record is closed, I will see that this committee gets it.

The CHAIRMAN. We will be pleased to have it in the record. What was the Boston case?

Mr. BUCK. The Boston case was the case of the Boston Herald-Traveler refusing to bargain collectively with the Guild, during which refusal, the publisher of the Herald-Traveler discharged two of our members for union activities.

The CHAIRMAN. This hearing was for the purpose of reinstating them?

Mr. BUCK. No; it was for the purpose of setting up the right of the Guild to collectively bargain.

My chief purpose in reading the telegram from Mr. Eddy to Mr. Kelly was to point out that this was exhibit 13, and from a telegram Mr. Kelly had no difficulty in recognizing the document called for, and telegraphing back concerning it.

The American Newspaper Publishers Association did not come here with clean hands to discuss this effort toward industrial peace. It does not want industrial peace except on its own terms. It submits to collective bargaining only when compelled to do so.

We deem ourselves qualified by our experience to speak of the necessity for such a board as this bill will set up for our industry. We do not doubt that Congress will extend the National Industrial Recovery Act, but even if it does, we may not enjoy such protection as the code affords after June 16, as I have stated.

The American Newspaper Publishers Association meets in New York in convention April 22 to April 26. Their determination is to prevent the continuation of the code after June 16. The association has invited numbers of publishers not now members of it, and who have signed the code, to meet with the association, and they have started the ball rolling with a ballyhoo.

In this connection, I would like to read what Col. Robert R. McCormick, publisher of the Chicago Tribune, says, as follows:

> It seems to me that one strong organization is the best defense for newspapers in defending the freedom of the press against bureaucratic encroachment. A number of weak organizations would be likely to fall before the assault.

So it would seem they are not only going to discuss the discontinuance of the code, but more militant matters.

This organ, Editor and Publisher, also has an editorial advocating the end of the code, and enters as one objection to it, quoting the editorial, that:

It (the code) has given rise to the organization of a radical labor union among a minority of editorial workers—a union which is also a misfit and is calculated to be the instrument of class-conscious propagandists out to disrupt the independent press.

The editorial intimates that if the code ends this union will lapse into the innocuous desuetude of a professional society.

That is not editorial rhetoric. I have written editorials, and I recognize mere rhetoric when I see it.

It means that, with the code out of the way, the working newspaper men who write the news and take the photographs and prepare both for publication, are faced with a war for extinction of their organization unless this bill is enacted.

The publishers want this war. We do not. We want peace, and therefore we want this bill. But if they insist upon it they will get a war that will make their heads swim.

For generations we have been enslaved, being required to deal individually with our employers, but with section 7 (a) of the Industrial Recovery Act in our code, it has enabled us to organize for mutual collective bargaining purposes with perhaps greater speed than we might otherwise have done. But it is only a part of a code and we are about to lose it, even at that. This bill would make it a law.

Even if the code is renewed our industry needs this legislation. The publishers are business men. They are like all employers. Some of them are just, while others misuse their peculiar opportunities for tyranny.

An example of the latter is William Randolph Hearst. From two of his papers guild officers have been fired for union activity. He has expressed opposition to the guild in public statements.

Why is he fighting us? Perhaps the reason may be found in the guild's code of ethics adopted at its last convention. I will read it.

(1) That the newspaperman's first duty is to give the public accurate and unbiased news reports, and that he be guided, in his contacts with the public, by a decent respect for the rights of individuals and groups.

(2) That the equality of all men before the law should be observed by the men of the press; that they should not be swayed in news reporting by political, economic, social, racial, or religious prejudices, but should be guided only by fact and fairness.

(3) That newspapermen should presume persons accused of crime of being innocent until they are convicted, as is the case under the law, and that news accounts dealing with accused persons should be in such form as not to mislead or prejudice the reading public.

(4) That the guild should work through efforts of its members, or by agreement with editors and publishers, to curb the suppression of legitimate news concerning "privileged" persons or groups, including advertisers, commercial powers, and friends of newspapermen.

(5) That newspapermen shall refuse to reveal confidence or disclose sources of confidential information in court or before other judicial or investigating bodies; and that the newspaperman's duty to keep confidences shall include those he shared with one employer even after he has changed his employment.

(6) That the news be edited exclusively in the editorial rooms instead of in the business office of the daily newspaper.

(7) That newspapermen shall behave in a manner indicating independence and decent self-respect in the city room as well as outside, and shall avoid any demeanor that might be interpreted as a desire to curry favor with any person.

To that code of ethics the convention added a condemnation as follows:

(1) The carrying of publicity in the news columns in the guise of news matter.

(2) The current practice of requiring the procuring or writing of stories which newspapermen know are false or misleading and which work oppression or wrong to persons and to groups.

Senator MURPHY. Do I understand that code of ethics is put out as an argument against the guild?

Mr. BUCK. No; that is our own code of ethics.

Senator MURPHY. What has Mr. Hearst to do with that?

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Hearst opposed the guild which promulgates that code of ethics.

Senator CLARK. As I understand, that requires that they tell the truth?

Mr. BUCK. Yes, sir; that is it, Senator.

In the spring of 1914 at Niagara Falls, Canada, a peace conference was held between representatives of the United States and Mexico; and, because of his propaganda, Mr. Hearst's reporters were persona non grata. The New York American sent Roscoe Conklin Mitchell, a reporter of perfect integrity, because he had the confidence of the State Department. He got into the confidence of the conferees.

In one of his news dispatches, without his knowledge, in the office, in New York, of the American, was interpolated a fake message represented to have been sent by President Carranza of Mexico to the Mexican mediators.

Mitchell promptly resigned, and his managing editor, Bradford Merrill sent him the following telegram, which I will read from Harper's Weekly of July 25, 1914, which I found by accident in my files.

The telegram reads:

ROSCOE C. MITCHELL,
Clifton Hotel, Ga.

Come home comfortably. Be philosophical. Mr. Hearst sent Johnson. No reflection on you. Good soldiers are patient even if superior officers make mistakes. Be resigned without resigning.

MERRILL.

Merrill was managing editor of the American. That was 20 years ago. Hearst has had time to change since that.

In the winter of 1927 and 1928, to refer to something you gentlemen are familiar with, the Hearst newspapers published a number of forged documents purporting to show that four United States Senators had been paid Mexican money to influence their attitude on Mexican-American relations. The Senate investigated and reported the documents to be forgeries. Before the Senate committee investigating it Hearst admitted that the spurious documents had been printed without giving the Senators opportunity to reply, and his own handwriting experts at that hearing pronounced the documents forgeries.

He was sued for libel by Ernest Gruening, a newspaperman, and settled out of court for $75,000.

Mr. Hearst has an interview in the current issue of Editor and Publisher in which he says:

I believe that newspapers should be let alone to do their duty to the public in their own way as they have always faithfully done—

As witness the Merrill telegram to Mr. Mitchell.

He continues further:

I believe that other industries should be let alone and that the country should be allowed to recover without constant harassment from a lot of incompetent interfering politicians, who know nothing about business, who never had to meet a pay roll or pay for equipment, or pay interest and dividends, or do any sort of hard and intelligent work on behalf of their institution and their investors and the public.

I do not think there should be any new N. R. A.

The old one was a disastrous failure.

It died a dismal death and should be buried deep and allowed to lie unmourned, unhonored, and unsung, and certainly unresurrected.

If this meddling Government of ours would only mind its own legitimate affairs and keep its interfering and infected finger out of the eye of industry, we would all be able to enjoy not only prosperity but life, liberty, and pursuit of happiness—the forgotten ideals of American independence and individualism.

During the preparation of the hearing on wages and hours for the newspaper workers in connection with the newspaper code, the Bureau of Labor Statistics investigated conditions on a number of newspapers, and the Hearst and Scripps-Howard syndicates refused access to their pay rolls to the Government agents for the purpose of this investigation, and Colonel McCormick, publisher of the Chicago Tribune, ordered the agent personally to leave those premises.

Our code is the only one of its kind. It is called an assent code down at the N. R. A. No publisher is bound to sign it. Seven hundred publishers, more than one-third of the daily newspaper publishers in the country, have not signed the code, and are not therefore bound by it, or section 7 (a).

Their employees at this moment are in dire need of this legislation. The rest of us need it also for, despite the fact 7 (a) is a section of the code, all but a few of these 1,200 assenting publishers refuse to recognize our organization, although in the main they have not yet sought to destroy it. Some have done even that.

On April 4, 1934, the San Francisco Examiner, a Hearst paper, started the ball rolling by firing Louis Burgess for guild activity. He is still fired.

Later on in the same month two guild members were fired for organizing in New Bedford, Mass., and they have not been reinstated.

In June, Dean Jennings was fired from the San Francisco Bulletin, also a Hearst paper, because he used his vacation to attend the national guild convention, and he is still out.

In July, S. I. Newhouse, publisher of the Long Island Daily Press, threatened to discharge nine guild members and thereby temporarily disrupted that chapter of the guild. It was later revived, but he raised the pay $7.50 per week to those who would sign individual agreements, but refused to increase the guild members who refused to sign his yellow-dog contract.

He subsequently signed an agreement to enter into a guild contract on October 1, but when that date came he refused to do it. We have appealed to the Newspaper Industrial Board to see whether his signature on the other agreement meant anything or not. I think it has not been reached yet.

On July 28, Mr. Newhouse fired Alexander Crosby from the Staten Island Advance, another paper he owned, for union activities, and Crosby is still out.

On September 28, Alphonse Tonietti was fired from Il Progresso, an Italian-language newspaper in New York. His is the only case we won before the Industrial Board, set up under the code; but after he was reinstated his employer drove him out of New York where his home was by transferring him to another newspaper he owned in Philadelphia. So it was a bitter victory.

In November, Joseph R. Nolan, publisher of the Oakland (Calif.) Tribune, fired three members of the guild for presuming to undertake collective bargaining, and those two are still out.

And on November 9, Lucius Tarquinius Russell, publisher of the Newark (N. J.) Leader fired eight guild members and threatened to fire more of them when the guild asked him to negotiate. In so doing, he plunged his newspaper into bankruptcy during the 20 weeks' strike which ensued, and which ended last Thursday in a complete victory for the guild; that is to say, it will be a complete victory, if our members are now able to rescue his paper from the consequences of his folly.

Not counting Newark, there have been 10 martyrs to the determination of feudal publishers to defy 7 (a) and to smash our organization, despite the fact that they are signatories to the code which guarantees us the right to organize and bargain collectively. These are the gentlemen for whom Mr. Kelly spoke last week.

Why are these nine men still without their jobs, the nine who have not got their jobs back yet, and why is Mr. Tonietti living apart from his wife without being divorced from her because she has a job in New York and he has been shifted to Philadelphia?

Because of the utter failure of the Newspaper Industrial Board, which Mr. Kelly heads, or of the National Recovery Administration to protect our plain right to organize and collectively bargain, as guaranteed in the law and the newspaper code.

We are not opposed to bipartite boards to arbitrate working conditions on papers with which we have collective agreements, but such boards, and that includes the Newspaper Industrial Board, cannot function to preserve for workers those rights which are anterior to such an agreement.

It is idle to take time here to state in detail why the Newspaper Industrial Board is a failure. Mr. Kelly has admitted it even while denying it. After a year of existence it has not even completed the panel of five impartial chairmen required by the code. Its members cannot agree even on the terms of submission of disputes to the one impartial chairman they have.

I shall not haggle with Mr. Kelly or his associates whether the failure to agree is theirs or ours. In the very nature of the set-up, such a board cannot decide questions of alleged discrimination in violation of our right to organize. The published members will not yield that right, and we will not surrender it. Of course we can not agree.

In the one case the board decided in our favor, the Tonietti case, it gave the employee 7 weeks' back pay, and did him out of 4 more weeks' back pay that he was entitled to, and then refused to entertain a complaint after the employer had shipped him to Philadelphia from New York, as I have stated.

Mr. Kelly admitted in this presence that his board has no power to enforce its awards. He also admitted that some complaints have been pending before it for a year. He said out of 40 complaints the board had settled 25. Such is not the case. There have been 39 cases and only 8 have been settled. Eighteen are still pending. Thirteen have been crossed off of the docket because the labor members deemed it more advisable to withdraw them than to try to get justice. Even if a discharged employee finally wins a case, he has been without means of life for months. Such a board is worse than worthless. It is vicious.

In view of these considerations it is obvious that our industry needs this legislation which will abolish company unions, make 7 (a) a law instead of a mere section in a will-o'-the-wisp code, and which will set up a board entirely outside of the industries to enforce it.

We want this legislation. The publishers need it. They have compelled us to proceed in haste to organize with sufficient strength to be able, although reluctantly, to strike when necessary, as we did in Newark, where we demonstrated that we can.

The board to be set up under this bill, when enacted, must not only be independent of the industries. To be effective it must also be independent of other governmental agencies.

Dean Jennings was fired for guild activity in June, and against hostile pressure we got his case before the National Labor Relations Board, where it belonged, being a 7 (a) case. That Board in December ordered his paper to reinstate Jennings. The executive director of the National Executive Council of the United States, and the general counsel for the N. R. A., entered objections and demanded that the case be reopened.

These two men, Government officials, argued, as counsel for the publishers had done before them, that the National Labor Relations Board had no jurisdiction.

The Board heard their arguments, retained jurisdiction, and a second time decided the case in our favor. Mr. Richberg then appealed to the President, who, to reverse the Jennings' decision, stripped the National Labor Relations Board of virtually all its powers in all cases, and wiped out our double victory.

After such a demonstration of our employers' power we have no place to which to appeal but to Congress, and now, through you, we ask Congress to restore the National Labor Relations Board to independence, increase its power, and make it impossible for such a thing as happened to us in the Jennings case to happen again.

There remains to discuss but one thing more. Mr. Kelly said he was not prejudiced against labor. In the next breath he said labor had failed to purge itself of racketeering.

I have been in the newspaper business for 30 years. I was born and raised in Chicago, and was once a member of the city council of Chicago. The newspaper-publishing business in Chicago is my home industry. I had to blush with shame, Friday, when Mr. Kelly spoke of labor racketeering, because pictures came up before my mind of murder on the streets of my town, the town of which later I was one of the city fathers; bloodshed caused, the first time it came to my personal attention, by a newspaper circulation war. In the year 1907, when the Hearst papers, then recently installed in Chicago, undertook to grapple with the other papers for circulation advantage, both groups of newspapers imported from all of the hell holes of the United States, criminals—thugs and gunmen—and turned them loose upon our streets to murder and to pillage. They never went away, but remained to form the basis for the things that later happened in Chicago under prohibition. We ask you, gentlemen, to do all you can to enact this legislation.

"B" Special Daily Newspaper Code—Closed shop contracts demanded by newspaper guild

The American Newspaper Guild is approaching various publishers and demanding closed-shop contracts in respect of their news departments. Publishers have inquired of this office as to what they should do under the circumstances.

Section 7 (a) of the National Industrial Recovery Act does not require publishers who have subscribed to the Daily Newspaper Code to enter into any contract calling for a closed shop. While the law gives to all employees the right to bargain collectively, free from restraint of or interference by employers, it does not make such bargaining compulsory on those employees who do not desire to join in. Neither does it compel a contract to be entered into by the employer as a result of such bargaining.

The law merely provides a method for employees who desire to do so voluntarily to cooperate with one another in the matter of collective bargaining with their employers. It does not compel organization or unionization of all employees; it does not require contracts to be entered into; and it would be violated if an employer entered into a contract which denied a place on his staff to a man who preferred to continue in the future as he has continued in the past in his individual capacity as an employee.

It is very important that publishers, in their negotiations with the guild, should keep certain facts in mind.

Article III, section 1, of the daily newspaper code, authorized the code authority "to secure the necessary data and to determine the maximum hours and minimum wages for news department workers, and subject to the approval of the administrator to incorporate its findings in the provisions of this code."

The code further provides that "until such time as its findings are made a part of this code present conditions shall be maintained."

The present conditions referred to are those which existed on the effective date of the code—March 12, 1934.

The President, in his Executive order approving the code, required that the determination provided for, as above mentioned, should be made within 60 days or prior to May 12. Every step has been taken by the code authority of the daily newspaper publishing business to make this determination, but the determination itself has been held in the abeyance because the American Newspaper Guild has requested the N. R. A. to hold a public hearing on the recommendation of the code authority, and on each occasion when the N. R. A. has attempted to set a date for that hearing, the guild has not been ready. Its latest request for a postponement asked that the date be deferred until sometime after the 1st of October.

Both publishers and their news department employees should be advised that the American Newspaper Guild has made impossible, by its dilatory tactics, the carrying out of this code provision, as requested by the President within 60 days of the effective date of the code or within any other period of time up to date.

Another fact is that if publishers have adhered to the code by maintaining the conditions which existed in their news departments as of March 12, there is no question under the code for them to discuss with their employees, insofar as their news departments are concerned. However, because of the provision of section 7 (a) of the act, where publishers are satisfied that their news department employees or some of their employees are members of the guild, and a request is received for a conference with the guild, that request should be granted. Negotiations should not be declined, even though contracts are declined. On the other hand, the guild should be emphatically informed that until the determination provided for in article III, section 1, is made, there is nothing to discuss unless the guild has evidence of some violation of the code.

Another question which has been raised by publishers is whether or not publishers may act jointly in a city where there is more than one newspaper in their negotiations and bargaining with the guild. Of course, publishers may act jointly if they so desire, but unless they agree to act jointly, then the Guild cannot compel a publisher's organization, set up for other purposes, to treat with it as an organization.

Still another question is how publishers may proceed to ascertain if the guild does represent their employees. No objection can be raised if a publisher makes inquiry of his employees as to whether not not they belong to the guild as long as he does not intimidate them or use any force to restrain them from membership if they desire to join. If a controversy should arise between the guild and a publisher as to the guild's claims of representation, article VI, section 5 (e) of the code provides that that controversy shall be determined by the Newspaper Industrial Board.

The important thing, however, is that the guild has no ground for controversy with any publisher if the latter's news department is being conducted on the same basis as existed on March 12 last.

BRIEFS

ASSOCIATION OF EMPLOYEES,
AMERICAN TELEPHONE & TELEGRAPH CO.,
New York, March 22, 1935.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
Chairman Committee on Labor,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: We understand that the bill S. 1958, entitled "National Labor Relations Act", will be reported out of committee within a few days. We desire, therefore, to present as briefly as possible, for your consideration, our views on this proposed legislation.

Section 8, paragraph 2, page 8, of this bill will, if passed, especially prohibit an employer from contributing financial or other material support to an association of employees. This means that an employer cannot compensate any employee for services performed in behalf of employees' association work or by any other means whatsoever.

The Association of Employees, Long Lines Department, American Telephone & Telegraph Co., was formed December 31, 1929, by employee representatives chosen by the employees, and is now composed of approximately 10,000 employees, of which this body, General Office Council, represents about 900. It has been, from time to time, constitutionally developed and strengthened at our own initiative to more effectively serve the employees. We feel that our organization meets our needs and we do not wish to see enacted any legislation that would interfere with our method of handling our problems. However, membership in this association does not in any way conflict with the right of any employee to be or to become a member of any other association or organization.

Association members are responsible only to the association for their acts in connection with the functioning of the association and are excused without loss of pay to perform their association duties. Management people (roughly defined as those having the right to hire and fire) are not permitted membership and are barred from attending or participating in any of the elections or business meetings. Membership in the association has never been a condition of employment nor has any attempt been made on the part of the management to influence any election of officers or representatives.

The association annually negotiates with the management a budget covering the succeeding year's association expense and we are solely responsible for the administration of our expenditures. We do not believe that financial support by the management has of itself any subversive effect on the functioning of our association or the members of our association. The controlling effect of such support could be brought to bear if we had to obtain the management's approval for expenditures on each action we desired to take as the need of such action presented itself. With a prior agreement covering expenditures, this controlling effect is eliminated.

It is our opinion, based on our experience, that an employer can financially support an employee organization without violating any of the other provisions in the bill. We, therefore, recommend that paragraph 2, of section 8 page 8, of this bill be changed to read as follows:

"To contribute financial or other material support to any labor organization, by compensating anyone for service performed in behalf of any labor organization, or by any other means whatsoever, except that it shall not be an unfair labor practice for any employer or anyone acting in his interest to contribute such financial or material support provided that an agreement is made between the employer and the labor organization covering such material support by the employer for a definite period of not less than 1 year subsequent to the date of making the agreement."

For the past 15 years we have constantly improved our standard of living, have settled our cases peacefully, and have been a real asset to ourselves, to the industry, and to the Nation. We have the necessary ability within ourselves to handle our problems and have the intelligence to decide for ourselves the type of organization we want for collective bargaining. We have no feeling of asking for a paternalistic favor when negotiating our annual expense budget with the management and handle that detail with the same freedom as any other case furthering our interest.

Our records seem to justify that those responsible for the guidance of our country give careful consideration to our suggestions before eliminating such organizations as ours from their very evident field of usefulness, and we ask a continuation of our right to make for ourselves those decisions affecting us as do those matters covered by this bill.

Respectfully,

GENERAL OFFICE COUNCIL,
G. O. BAILEY, Chairman.

On December 31, 1919, the association of employees, long-lines department, American Telephone & Telegraph Co., was formed, the purpose of which was to facilitate dealings between the management of this company and its employees. The members of this assocaition are responsible only to the association for their acts in connection with the functioning of the association and are excused by the management, without loss of pay, to perform their association duties. By the management is meant the people who have the power to employ or discharge. These persons are not permitted membership and are barred from attending or participating in any of the elections or business meetings.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
Chairman Committee on Education and Labor,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We, the undersigned, are duly elected chairmen of committees representing the entire employee body of the Tri-State Telephone & Telegraph Co., headquarters St. Paul, Minn., which body consists of 1,948 employees.

The Wagner industrial disputes bill, Senate 1958, has been reviewed in its entirety by our committees and we have been instructed by the employees so represented to petition your committee to reject this bill in committee, for the following reasons:

1. We, at present, are functioning under a written form of employee representation which was initiated and drawn up by elected representatives of the employee body. This plan and an agreement prepared by these representatives were submitted to the employer for concurrence. The agreement was accepted and signed by the employer after which it and the plan were submitted and accepted by the entire employee body voting by secret ballot, the vote being tabulated and certified to by certified public accountants. This form of organization has been in effect for a period of 1 year and has proved itself entirely satisfactory to the employee body.

2. The provisions of the National Labor Relations Act will make it impossible for us to continue our present form of organization which we feel has resulted in satisfactory relations between employees and employer.

Respectfully submitted.

L. O. WRIGHT, Chairman.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., March 27, 1935.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
Chairman Committee on Education and Labor:

This is to inform you of the opinion of the 230 employees in the Minnesota commercial department, Northwestern Bell Telephone Co., whom we represent, regarding the Wagner labor disputes bill, S. 1958. Our company union has been in existence since April 1932, with slight revisions made in February 1934, and has proved beneficial to the welfare of the employees. All items pertaining to working conditions, wages, or hours of employment have been settled entirely satisfactorily. After careful consideration of the bill we are opposed to it because (1) it provides that it shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer to contribute financially or otherwise support a company union as provided in section 8, subsection 2; (2) it provides vesting in the Board, its agent or agencies, the power of determining what unit will be appropriate for purposes of collective bargaining, section 8, subsection 2, to remove financial support, which we now receive, would limit the inclusiveness of our representation and reduce collective bargaining activities. It would be detrimental to our collective bargaining activities if the Board, its agent or agencies, were to determine the unit of collective bargaining rather than our company union.

MINNESOTA AREA COMMERCIAL REPRESENTATION COMMITTEES,
C. S. KIRK, Chairman.

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR WALSH: Enclosed herewith is copy of a letter which I received from R. W. Ayres, chairman employees representation committee, accounting department, Nebraska-South Dakota area, Northwestern Bell Telephone Co., one of my constituents, in which he enters protest to certain parts of the Wagner national labor bill.

Also enclosed is agreement and employees' plan of representation.

I have written my constituents that I am referring the matter to you as chairman of the committee before whom hearings are now being held.

MARCH 28, 1935.

Hon. CHARLES F. MCLAUGHLIN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: The representation committee of the employees representation plan of the accounting department in the Nebraska-South Dakota area of the Northwestern Bell Telephone Co. has instructed me as chairman of that body to enter a protest to certain parts of the Wagner national labor relations bill now in hearing before the Senate Committee on Education and Labor. Our committee represents 130 employees all located in Omaha. The specific items to which we object are as follows:

(1) Section 8, paragraph (2) now reads: "To dominate or interfere with the formation or administration of any labor organization or contribute financial or other support to it: Provided, That subject to rules and regulations made and published by the Board pursuant to section 6 (a), an employer shall not be prohibited from permitting employees to confer with him during working hours without loss of time or pay."

Our committee feels that this should be modified to the extent that the following words contained in the first sentence be omitted: "Or contribute financial or other support to it."

We object to section 8, paragraph (2), in its present form for the reason that it would seriously hamper the operation of our present plan. We are enclosing a copy of the employees' plan of representation and a copy of the agreement between the management and the accounting employees of the Northwestern Bell Telephone Co., dated March 21, 1934. The plan and agreement were formulated by the employees in accordance with the spirit of section 7 of the National Industrial Recovery Act and were voted on and accepted by 99 percent of the employees of the accounting department and has been working very satisfactorily since its adoption. By reviewing the plan and agreement you will readily see our point of view.

(2) Section 9, paragraph (b), which reads, "The Board shall decide whether, in order to effectuate the policies of this act, the unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining shall be the employer unit, craft unit, plant unit, or other unit."

We believe that the employees should have the right to set up their own units for collective bargaining without interference from any outside force. We object to section 9, paragraph (b), in its entirety.

Hon. CHAS. F. MCLAUGHLIN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: As chairman of the group of Fremont plant department employees of the Northwestern Bell Telephone Co., all of whom are members of the Telephone Employees' Association, I have been instructed by unanimous vote to request your assistance in obtaining certain modifications in the national labor relations bill now before the Senate Committee on Education and Labor.

It is the consensus of opinion that certain sections of the bill; namely, section 8 (2) and section 9 (b) would completely disrupt our organization unless modified in the following respects:

Section 8 (2) now reads: "To dominate or interfere with the formation or administration of any labor organization or contribute financial or other support to it."

We request that the words "or contribute financial or other support to it" be stricken from this section.

Section 9 (b) now reads: "The board shall decide whether, in order to effectuate the policies of this act, the unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining shall be the employer unit, craft unit, plant unit, or other unit."

We request that this section be modified to allow employees to choose the type and number of units and that the action by the board be restricted to those cases where employee agreement is impossible.

You will receive under separate cover a copy of the constitution of the Telephone Employees' Association, plant department, Northwestern Bell Telephone Co., together with a copy of the agreement between this association and the Northwestern Bell Telephone Co., from Omaha, Nebr., which we request that you carefully review in order to become familiar with the workings of this type of organization. This constitution and agreement supersede similar ones that have been in effect since 1919, under which we have never experienced coercion or company domination through financial aid or other support contributed from any source.

We invite any investigation you might wish to make regarding our plan, and are hopeful that through your support, the above modifications will be made in the bill in order that our organization and similar ones throughout the Nation will not be disrupted through the passage of this bill.

A BRIEF ON BEHALF OF THE AMERICAN ASSOCIATION CREAMERY BUTTER MANUFACTURERS

APRIL 5, 1935.

To the Members of the Senate Committee on Education and Labor:

I beg to submit the brief which follows in opposition to the Wagner labor bill now before your committee on behalf of the American Association Creamery Butter Manufacturers. This organization is made up of manufacturers of butter and allied products. Its members produce upwards of 600,000,000 pounds of butter each year and also act as the sales representatives of other butter manufacturers who are not members of this association, so that the total business in marketing butter amounts to over 900,000,000 pounds of butter a year, or more than one-half of the creamery butter produced in the United States.

Butter plants numbering upwards of 5,000 and located in every State in the United States will be subject to labor conditions which will be brought about if this act is passed by Congress and the members of this association believe that such induced conditions will be extremely dangerous and harmful not only to the interests of the manufacturers of butter, but to every dairy farmer and producer of milk and butterfat in the United States. We earnestly request an adverse vote by your committee on this measure.

I wish to call to the attention of your committee as briefly as possible the dangers which we see in this measure of agriculture and to the butter manufacturing industry and all other industries similarly situated.

I first wish to consider two points. The first is what it proposes, and some of the dangerous details included. Second, its dangerous effect on the men and women who are engaged in agriculture.

You will want to know at the beginning what business it is of farmers or their organizations whether or not a national labor board is created, and why we should interest ourselves in labor matters and industrial disputes.

My answer is that this is just as much the business of those engaged in agriculture as it is the business of labor to take part in governmental questions affecing agriculture and its products. These are questions of national policy not to be settled on a class basis. Agriculture furnishes the largest group of customers for the products of labor. Labor makes up the largest group of customers for the products of agriculture. A policy good for one and not the other will ultimately be bad for both.

The policy written into this bill of Federal control of labor relations through a political board may be good for labor, but I doubt even this. It certainly is not good for agriculture.

The bill is long. It is intricate. It is subject to many interpretations. It changes fundamental existing law. It will create a long period of uncertainty which will inevitably breed more strikes and more industrial disputes rather than end or settle them.

Ostensibly designed to provide a way to settle disputes this bill goes far beyond this objective. It goes directly to the objective of a Federally controlled, almost mandatory, unionization of industry. This as everyone, either friend or foe, knows is equivalent to Federally protected high prices for labor.

The heart of this bill is in the definitions found in section 2, the provisions of section 8, defining unfair labor practices, and section 10, giving wide authority to the board, to correct such unfair practices. A board of three persons paid $10,000 per year administers the act, and is given wider powers than ever found in any previous labor legislation.

In the section on definitions we find that an employer is "any person acting in the interest of an employer directly or indirectly." Agricultural workers are exempt but a farmer employer is not. While the instrumentalities of government and labor unions are exempted, cooperative organizations of farmers are not exempt. Units employing less than 10 employees are also exempted and this creates a bad discrimination. The small employer is not subject to the act while the larger employer is, and the small store is exempt while the larger or multiple stores come within the ban.

In calling attention to these and other details, I wish it to be plain that these details which might be corrected are not the chief danger. The danger is from the false principle that the Federal Government can or should interpose a bureaucratic political authority upon the problem of employment relations.

The good offices now provided by law to adjust labor troubles by the boards, of conciliation and mediation, Federal or State, when there is mutual labor-employer request for such service provide a sane method of handling this problem. The Wagner bill if passed substitutes a permanent control—arbitrary and autocratic—by a politically appointed board.

While this bill defines certain "unfair labor practices", objection lies very emphatically to the assumption that in a Federal authority of this kind will be found the best way to interpret or apply these definitions; and even more emphatically that the way to end unfair practices lies in the application of an autocratic application of Federal authority.

Still further emphatic protest lies against the principle found in the third paragraph of section 8, in which is found the definite approval of the principle of a closed shop. It says "nothing in this act, or in the National Industrial Recovery Act (U. S. C., title 15, secs. 701–712, as amended from time to time, or in any code or agreement approved or prescribed thereunder, or in any other statute of the United States, shall preclude an employer from making an agreement with a labor organization * * * to require as a condition of employment membership therein, if such labor organization is the representative of the majority of the employees in the appropriate collective bargaining unit covered by such agreement when made." This is a reversal of existing law, a direct invalidation of section 7 (a) of the National Recovery Act.

If we concede, which I do not, that any law of this type is needed or in accord with national policy, then this act is certainly to be criticized because:

1 It establishes a permanent political organization to impose the closed shop in large and small industries.

2. It provides for no protection to the individual worker who wishes to stay outside a union—to the contrary, it distinctly authorizes coercion, the refusal of employment—unless he joins a union.

3. It does not provide for adequate representation to organized minority in any kind of an organization nor to any consideration for the worker who has no desire to join any organization.

4. It makes sure that every plant will be organized in some way.

I would like to say that after thus denying rights of individuals and minorities and practically assuring unionization of all industries, the bill provides the Board with extraordinary powers of enforcing its decisions.

I will pass over any discussion as to the validity or the legal aspects of this particular policy. We have in the Railway Labor Act and the Rail Labor Board an illustration of this type of legislation. We all know how it has operated as a bar to the reduction of railroad costs of operation and as a major factor in the national dilemma of the railroads and in the high freight rates which are a bar to improvement of farmers' conditions.

Now what is the direct application of this Wagner bill to agriculture?

First, in those plants and enterprises engaged in preparing for market and marketing farm products, our milk, cream, and butter; grain, flour, and feed; fruits and vegetables, either fresh or canned; livestock, meat, lard, wool, and hides; cotton (the gins or oil mills) or tobacco in warehouse or factory, a new era of unionized labor will increase every cost. These products are sold in an abundantly supplied (consumers') market and their prices cannot be arbitrarily advanced. Who, then, will pay the increased cost of processing and distributing? Of course, the same individuals who pay the high freight rates due to the railway labor law—the farmer producers. This is blow number one to agriculture.

This bill if passed will tend to unionize in some way every creamery employing more than 10 persons, every milk plant, the delivery of every dairy product, every cannery, every apple-packing plant, flour mill, tobacco warehouse, cotton gin. Probably it will unionize all of them, large or small. The farmer will pay the bill in a reduction in the amount of his return payment for his products as sold or delivered.

Second, it will increase the cost of the commodities the farmers purchase. In the main these costs can and will be passed on to the consumer.

As to practically every industrial commodity used by farmers it is a matter of common knowledge that all costs of manufacture and distribution, of which the large proportion are wage costs, are passed on to the farmer buyer. My statement on this subject will be found supported by every economic authority and true except in cases of over-supply in uncontrolled industries.

Let there be a Wagner law unionization of the farm-implement plants, of the fertilizer factories, in the automobile, or radio, or textile, or shoe or other factories, the products of which the farmers must buy, and then these farmers must pay their share—very large as a class—of all this increase. This is blow number two to agriculture.

An increase in cost, a decrease in income—a further widening of the wage gulf between farmers and unionized workers, which gulf today is the largest major obstacle to general business recovery is the inevitable sequel.

This is just another of the proposals to burden industry with autocratic bureaucratic regimentation, cost to be paid as to our farm products, mostly by the farmer producers. It is ruinous alike to business, to business morals, to the dignity and the spirit of enterprise and individuality which has been, until now, the pride and motive power of American life and progress.

We need statesmanship which will devise specific legislation to meet specific problems, and not attempt legislation in this wholesale way.

There is no use dodging the issue presented by this Wagner bill. It is a bill designed to maintain high prices for labor, which will increase labor costs, and to increase not total number of workers but of unionized workers who will secure these high wages. It is a bill to throw the protection of the Federal Government around this high-wage class. Why 30 hours at $30 a week for this minority group, while farmers toil 7 days, 12 hours to 14 hours a day for what will be left for them out of the consumer's dollar?

It is axiomatic that a better market results when wage workers have more money, but to be truly effective this greater earning must come from more and better work, and not from artificially created labor shortages. I protest not against the workman getting good wages, but against governmental, political discrimination in his favor at farmer's expense.

Farmers must pull themselves through this period by hard work, good methods, careful planning, and close buying. Emergency help in a few lines has been helpful—we ask only emergency help. The Wagner bill, if passed, is permanent legislation which we must pay for through the nose. It ought not to pass.

AMERICAN ASSOCIATION OF CREAMERY BUTTER MANUFACTURERS,

STATEMENT OF AXTELL J. BYLES, PRESIDENT AMERICAN PETROLEUM INSTITUTE

To the Committee on Education and Labor of the United States Senate:

GENTLEMEN: The executive committee of the board of directors of the American Petroleum Institute, a national trade association of individuals engaged in the petroleum and allied industries, hereby expresses opposition to the enactment of Senate bill 1958 (commonly referred to as the Wagner labor disputes bill) for the following reasons:

1. Despite its avowed declaration, the bill would not leave the individual employee or any minority group of employees free to choose the method of bargaining.

2. The bill is wrongly premised in that it will foster discord and dispute between labor and management rather than further peaceful industrial relationship.

The bill would inject an outside organization between the employees and their employer regardless of how effective and satisfactory their collective bargaining agency had been in the past. Experience has indicated that groups are always willing to pass the responsibility of working out a difficult problem to someone else. If the National Labor Relations Board is established permanently, it can expect more and more problems to go to it without the parties concerned having put forth their best efforts to reach a satisfactory agreement.

3. The bill proposes to direct by Government fiat the type of labor union or organization which may exist, thereby in effect creating a labor monopoly without authority in the Government to regulate such a monopoly and compel observance of fair practices. Such a system once established would inevitably lead to further encroachment upon what are now recognized as the inherent rights of labor.

4. Section 5 makes it an unfair labor practice for an employer in any way to restrain, supervise, or influence employees in their steps leading to organization, while paragraph 6 of this section provides:

"* * * That nothing in this act shall preclude an employer and a labor organization from agreeing that a person seeking employment shall be required, as a condition of employment, to join such labor organization, if no attempt is made to influence such labor organization by any unfair labor practice, if such labor organization is composed of at least a majority of such employer's employees, and if the said agreement does not cover a period in excess of one year."

The first five paragraphs of section 5 proclaim the duty of employers to withhold all influence over labor organizations; paragraph 6 abandons any pretense of securing the liberty of the employee and permits the employer to agree with the labor union to compel the minority to join the union. For freedom to contract there has been substituted compulsion to join a labor organization, and the employer, while restrained from advising his employees, is empowered to compel them even against their will to pay dues to a labor union and make it their only contact with their employer whether they like it or not.

The National Industrial Recovery Act intended that the employee should be free to select his agency for collective bargaining. The employer is rightly restrained from using any undue influence. Similar restraint should be placed upon labor organizers if the employee is to exercise his freedom of choice.

5. The bill confers upon a National Labor Board and its agents drastic, unwarranted, and probably unconstitutional powers. As it stands, the bill is primarily framed to confer rights and powers not upon American labor but upon the National Labor Board and upon labor organizers.

The Board could intercede to establish the units of collective bargaining or to render a decision on a controversy without invitation from either parties concerned; or if both parties had agreed to a procedure, including the selection of a board of arbitration, the National Labor Relations Board might intervene to change the procedure.

6. The bill abrogates existing contracts between employer and employees without regard to their merit or benefit to either or both parties to the contract.

7. The bill provides that the employees can confer with their employer without loss of time or pay. This provision would probably be adequate if the employees were confined to a single plant. However, in the oil industry employees and their representatives are scattered over wide areas which makes it necessary to incur traveling and hotel expenses in connection with these conferences. In addition to this the employer should be permitted to pay the expenses of conducting an election if the employees or their representatives make such a request.

8. The effect and probable intent of the bill is to destroy what is known as "employee representation plans", many of which have existed satisfactorily to workers in the petroleum industry for a long period of time.

We believe that the President, in his settlement of the recent automotive industry situation in Detroit, has written for American labor and employers alike the essence of any desirable labor legislation pertaining to collective bargaining.

Brief Presented in Behalf of the Associated General Contractors of America

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, when the Wagner labor disputes bill was before this committee at the last session of Congress, the Associated General Contractors of America were in full accord with the unqualified denunciation of the provisions of that proposal as unanimously expressed by representative business and industrial interests throughout the country. On practical and constitutional grounds we were opposed to its basic principle of making the employer's bargaining prerogatives subservient to those of the employee, as was attempted to be done in that bill under the guise of equalizing bargaining power.

We felt then, as we feel now, that no sound purpose could be served by stripping business and industrial management of its constitutionally conferred right to freedom of contract, and that, to the contrary, a very serious impediment to recovery would result if the question of labor relations in private industry was to be delegated to a Federal board created solely for the purpose of furthering the interests of organized labor, and without an equal affirmative power to see to it that justice is done to the employer.

Despite the earnest effort of the distinguished author of that bill to work out a more acceptable substitute proposal, as is represented in the measure which you now have under consideration, S. 1958, he has failed to overcome our basic objection, which we have just recited. Aside from that, he has added as section 9 of his new bill the mandate that the representatives of a majority of the employees in a unit (whether the unit be an employer unit, craft unit, plant unit, or other unit as the board in each case may decide) shall be the exclusive representatives in such unit for the purposes of collective bargaining in respect to rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, or other conditions of employment. Senator La Follette already has suggested to you the temptation for gerrymandering under this provision, which was admitted by Chairman Francis Biddle, of the National Labor Relations Board, with no other comment than that it is a risk that must be run in all democratic government. We deny that truly democratic government ever abrogates the equal application of constitutional rights to the minority, such as would be accomplished under section 9 of this bill by prohibiting workers to bargain individually or in minority groups with their employers.

However, we have no intention of taking your time by going into a detailed analysis of each of the various provisions of the bill. Our position can be concisely stated as being unalterably opposed to the proposal on principle, and as denying its application to our industry even should the bill be enacted with that intent. We rely for substantiation of the latter stand upon a preponderance of clear-cut opinions by the Supreme Court of the United States as to the extent of the power of Congress to regulate business under the commerce clause of the Constitution, which is the power upon which the pending proposal admittedly is predicated. Our contentions in this regard recently have been lucidly enunciated in the decision of the District Court of the United States for the District of Delaware in its decision and opinion on the Weirton Steel Co. case, to which we believe this committee should give studied consideration before passing upon the pending bill.

We also desire to submit as briefly as possible, additional judicial opinion which we believe to be germane and which constitutes an undeniable indictment and rejection of the purposes and intent of S. 1958.

For instance, in its consideration of the case of Adair v. United States (208 U. S. 161) the Supreme Court had before it the question of the right of Congress to prohibit in section 10 of the Erdman Act the discharge of an employee because of his membership in a labor union and the question as to the extent that Congress may legally go under its power to regulate interstate commerce.

We wish to impress upon you that this act related only to common carriers engaged in interstate commerce, over which Congress admittedly has jurisdiction, and did not apply, as the proponents of the bill under consideration would have it apply, to all industry regardless of its interstate character. In holding the provision unconstitutional, the Supreme Court, in an opinion by Mr. Justice John Marshall Harlan, stated as follows:

"The first inquiry is whether the part of the tenth section of the act of 1898 upon which the first count of the indictment was based is repugnant to the fifth amendment of the Constitution declaring that no person shall be deprived of liberty or property without due process of law. In our opinion that section, in the particular mentioned, is an invasion of the personal liberty, as well as the right of property, guaranteed by that amendment * * *. It was the right of the defendant to prescribe the terms upon which the services of Coppage would be accepted, and it was the right of Coppage to become or not, as he chose, an employee of the railroad company upon the terms offered to him. Mr. Cooley, in his treatise on Torts, page 278, well says: 'It is a part of every man's civil rights that he be left at liberty to refuse business relations with any person whomsoever, whether the refusal rests upon reason, or is the result of whim, caprice, prejudice, or malice. With his reasons neither the public nor third persons have any legal concern. It is also his right to have business relations with anyone with whom he can make contracts, and if he is wrongfully deprived of this right by others, he is entitled to redress.' * * *

"While, as already suggested, the rights of liberty and property guaranteed by the Constitution against deprivation without due process of law, is subject to such reasonable restraints as the common good or the general welfare may require, it is not within the functions of government—at least in the absence of contract between parties—to compel any person in the course of his business and against his will to accept or retain the personal services of another, or to compel any person, against his will, to perform personal services for another. The right of a person to sell his labor upon such terms as he deems proper is, in essence, the same as the right of the purchaser of labor to prescribe the conditions upon which he will accept such labor from the person offering to sell it. So the right of the employee to quit the service of the employer, for whatever reason, is the same as the right of the employer, for whatever reason, to dispense with the services of such employee * * *. In all such particulars the employer and the employee have equality of right, and any legislation that disturbs that equality is an arbitrary interference with the liberty of contract which no government can legally justify in a free land. (Cites cases in support.)

"Manifestly, any rule prescribed for the conduct of interstate commerce, in order to be within the competency of Congress under its power to regulate commerce among the States, must have some real or substantial relation to or connection with the commerce regulated. But what possible legal or logical connection is there between an employee's membership in a labor organization and the carrying on of interstate commerce? Such relation to a labor organization cannot have, in itself and in the eye of the law, any bearing upon the commerce with which the employee is connected by his labor and services * * *

"Looking alone at the words of the statute for the purpose of ascertaining its scope and effect, and of determining its validity, we hold that there is no such connection between interstate commerce and membership in a labor organization as to authorize Congress to make it a crime against the United States for an agent of an interstate carrier to discharge an employee because of such membership on his part. If such a power exists in Congress it is difficult to perceive why it might not, by absolute regulation, require interstate carriers, under penalties, to employ in the conduct of its interstate business only members of labor organizations, or only those who are not members of such organizations—a power which could not be recognized as existing under the Constitution of the United States * * *. We need scarcely repeat what this Court has more than once said, that the power to regulate interstate commerce, great and paramount as that power is, cannot be exerted in violation of any fundamental right secured by other provisions of the Constitution. (Cites Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. 1, 196; Lottery case, 188 U. S. 321, 353.)

"It results, on the whole case, that the provision of the statute under which the defendant was convicted must be held to be repugnant to the fifth amendment and as not embraced by nor within the power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce, but under the guise of regulating interstate commerce and as applied to this case it arbitrarily sanctions an illegal invasion of the personal liberty as well as the right of property of the defendant Adair."

Now it is true that two very distinguished members of the Court dissented from the majority opinion, but it is noteworthy that in their dissenting opinions they clearly indicated their belief that there is a limit to the extent of which Congress may constitutionally go in legislation of this character. Mr. Justice McKenna, for instance, stated that: "I grant that there are rights which can have no material measure. There are rights which, when exercised in a private business, may not be disturbed or limited. With them we are not concerned. We are dealing with rights exercised in a quasi-public business and therefore subject to control in the interest of the public." Surely Congress is not prepared to say that all business is quasi-public business, as it would do through enactment of this bill, and thus strip every business man of his fundamental rights under the Constitution.

Mr. Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes, in his dissenting opinion, likewise recognized a very definite line beyond which Congress might not go, even in its regulation of the railroads under its power to regulate interstate commerce, when he stated as follows:

"The ground on which this particular law is held bad is not so much that it deals with matters remote from commerce among the States as that it interferes with the paramount individual rights secured by the fifth amendment. The section is, in substance, a very limited interference with freedom of contract, no more. It does not require the carriers to employ anyone. It does not forbid them to refuse to employ anyone, for any reason they deem good, even where the notion of choice of persons is a fiction and wholesale employment is necessary upon general principles that it might be proper to control. The section simply prohibits the more powerful party to exact certain undertakings, or to threaten dismissal or unjustly discriminate on certain grounds against those already employed."

It will be seen that the intent of section 10 of the Erdman Act and the intent of the national labor relations bill are very similar, althought the latter is much more drastic and of limitless application. In view of the Supreme Court's decision as to the former, therefore, it is impossible for anyone to honestly conceive of the Court sustaining the provisions of the Wagner bill. As a matter of fact, the Court's decision in the case which we have just recited to you, together with its decision in the Employers' Liability cases (Howard v. Illinois Central Railway Co., 207 U. S. 463), raises a serious question as to the validity of the labor provisions in the National Industrial Recovery Act itself.

Under the National Industrial Recovery Act, and under the national labor relations bill, Congress attempts to regulate all business, of whatever nature, on the ground that all business has some bearing on interstate commerce. It completely ignores the fact, sustained by the Supreme Court, that production is not commerce. The business that the members of our association are engaged in, general contracting, is primarily production and not commerce, and this viewpoint is sustained by the Supreme Court's opinion by Mr. Justice Edward Douglass White in the Employers' Liability cases, as follows:

"It remains only to consider the contention which we have previously quoted, that the act is constitutional, although it embraces subjects not within the power of Congress to regulate commerce, because one who engages in interstate commerce thereby submits all of his business concerns to the regulating power of Congress. To state the proposition is to refute it. It assumes that because one engages in interstate commerce he thereby endows Congress with power not delegated to it by the Constitution; in other words, with the right to legislate concerning matters of purely State concern. It rests upon the conception that the Constitution destroyed that freedom of commerce which it was its purpose to preserve, since it treats the right to engage in interstate commerce as a privilege which cannot be availed of except upon such conditions as Congress may prescribe, even although the conditions would be otherwise beyond the power of Congress. It is apparent that if the contention were well founded it would extend the power of Congress to every conceivable subject, however, inherently local, would obliterate all the limitations of power imposed by the Constitution, and would destroy the authority of the States as to all conceivable matters which from the beginning have been, and must continue to be, under their control so long as the Constitution endures."

For the reasons that we have cited, and in the interests of the industrial welfare of the Nation, the Associated General Contractors of America urge that the national labor relations bill, S. 1958, be not favorably reported by this committee.

HONORABLE SIR: We are herewith submitting a brief to the United States Senate Committee on Education and Labor relative to Senator Wagner's bill S. 1958.

We are in full accord with the bill insofar as the elimination of company unions and the protection of collective bargaining in which the majority rule shall determine the representation of their choice covering the drawing up of rules, wages, and working conditions.

We feel that it is very essential that there should be a proviso in the bill providing for the representation of any individual employee and that employees will be permitted representation of their own choosing where the individual employee has a personal grievance coming under the provisions of the agreement. This is necessary in that the rights of any individual employee cannot be exploited by the representatives selected by the majority for collective bargaining.

If this is not provided for in this bill it will be nothing more than arbitrarily forcing employees into labor organizations against their own wishes and which due to personality or other reasons they will be unable to seek redress as their rights are restricted for representation to one organization only, and even restricts the rights of the individual himself from handling a grievance for himself.

We do not believe that the rights of any American citizen should be restricted in which he would have no appeal from a dictorial power forced upon him, and should this bill be passed without the protection as herein requested it will add to the already destruction of personal rights of employees on the railroads of this country due to interpretations placed on certain sections of the Emergency Transportation Act by labor organizations for financial gain rather than protection, and the only way to afford protection for employees from being exploited by labor organizations is to give them the right to choose their own representation where they are personally involved in grievances growing out of the application of an agreement consumated by the majority.

We want to make ourselves very clear in that we are against company unions if company controlled.

We are for majority rule for collective bargaining; we desire protection for the individual employee who desires other representation where an employee is personally involved.

In presenting this we are voicing the sentiment and requests of over 200,000 mechanical employees of the railroads of this country represented by our organization, and hope the committee will give our request very earnest consideration.

Yours very truly,

BROTHERHOOD OF RAILROAD SHOP CRAFTS OF AMERICA,
By H. C. KINNEY, President.

STATEMENT OF THE CHICAGO ASSOCIATION OF COMMERCE

The Chicago Association of Commerce, speaking for itself and for 4,500 industrial, commercial, and professional leaders of the Nation's second city, makes this protest to the Senate Committee on Education and Labor and to the Congress, against the provisions of S. 1958, the so-called "Wagner Trade Disputes Act."

The title to S. 1958 is misleading. Called "A bill to promote equality of bargaining power between employers and employees, to diminish the causes of labor disputes, to create a National Labor Relations Board, and for other purposes", the measure more properly could be termed "A bill to unionize all business and industrial establishments", since it gives the National Labor Relations Board and its regional labor boards and agents unrestricted power to declare as unfair labor practices nearly every act of an employer in his relations with employees. In effect the bill would accomplish the exact opposite of its announced purpose and encourage rather than adjust differences between employers and employees.

Throughout its several pages the measure proceeds on the false theory that the interests of the employer and the employee are essentially antagonistic, and, therefore, the remedy is to place a powerful series of weapons in the hands of employees to assure obtaining for them rights and privileges which are assumed to be unfairly withheld.

Under the heading, Declaration of Policy, the measure begins in section 1 with the statement that "equality of bargaining power between employers and employees is not attained when the organization of employers in the corporate or other forms of ownership association is not balanced by the free exercise by employees of the right to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing." No one questions the right of employees to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing. It is certainly not true, however, and many hundreds of examples could be adduced to prove the untruth of the assertion that only where employees have bargained collectively does any equality in bargaining power exist.

The same section follows with the novel theory that it is necessary to maintain equilibrium between the rate of wages and the rate of industrial expansion. If the proponents of this theory are sincere, one wonders if they would be willing to admit the logic of its opposite, and concede by amendment that as the business of the employer decreases wages should be decreased in the same proportion.

Despite numerous court decisions in cases coming under the National Industrial Recovery Act, which have uniformly held that questions of production, local relations in employment, and related matters have nothing to do with interstate commerce, and consequently are not subject to Federal regulation, we find that this measure expects to obtain legal sanction on the theory that unfair labor relations constitute obstructions to the free flow of interstate commerce. Also, it is asserted that the general welfare is to be promoted by encouraging the practice of collective bargaining.

The provisions of this measure will apply to the very smallest, as well as the larger employers of the Nation. The previous measure, in 1934, exempted employers of less than 10, from its operations. Also, by this bill employees of the Federal Government, State, and subsidiary governments, and labor organizations, are exempt. If the measure will promote the free flow of commerce and grant full freedom to workers, why do its proponents deny these contemplated benefits to any class?

Among the definitions in section 2 of the act, an employee is one who may be on strike or out of work as the result of some dispute over wages or working conditions, but nevertheless the employer, under the terms of the act, may be made responsible for his wages and forced to pay them.

Under the theory that the act may gain legality through the commerce clause of the Constitution, the term "affecting commerce" is employed and is construed to mean "in commerce or burdening, or affecting commerce, or obstructing the free flow of commerce, or having led or tending to lead to a labor dispute that might burden or affect commerce, or obstruct the free flow of commerce."

In view of this definition, it might appear that every labor relationship a commercial or industrial concern might have with the distributors, or transportation agencies, would burden or affect commerce, so there would be little if anything an employer could do which might not subject him to the liabilities imposed by the bill.

Moreover practices or policies of an employer not actually the subject of dispute might nevertheless be called into question on the theory that something the employer does or does not do is tending to lead to a labor dispute that might burden or affect commerce. The National Labor Relations Board could intervene, file a complaint, make an investigation, hold a hearing if it desired, and finally issue an order to the employer.

In defining the term "labor dispute", any controversy having to do with the terms or conditions of employment is included, regardless of whether the disputants stand in the proximate relation of employer and employee. Thus the employer is placed at the mercy of communists, preachers, social workers, outside labor leaders, or anyone in fact who might allege that the employer's method of hiring, compensating, or laying off employees, was unfair. The National Labor Relations Board could take cognizance of any such charges, and compel the employer to defend himself.

The act creates, as a permanent agency, the National Labor Relations Board to succeed the Board by the same name, which expires by limitation in June of the present year. Why Congress should be asked to establish such an agency as a permanent part of the Federal Government, is not at all clear. Certainly no demand from the employing interests of the Nation can be shown for such an agency. Neither has the vast army of industrial workers of the country made any such demand. It would seem that this legislation is proposed to satisfy only the representatives and members of national labor unions.

The National Labor Relations Board is proposed to be empowered to exercise its functions at any time, in any part of the United States, and any member participating in an inquiry is not disqualified from subsequently participating in a decision of the Board in the same case. This means that the same member may serve in the capacity of judge and jury.

The Board is proposed to be given the widest authority to make, prescribe, and amend rules and regulations governing its practice and procedure. Regardless of what other agencies may exist, by reason of agreements, codes, or laws, for the purpose of settling questions relating to labor, this Board may disregard their findings and take jurisdiction whenever it chooses. Thus it is created by the act as the Supreme Court on all questions having to do with labor relations. Its power is primary and exclusive.

Should this act pass, an employer would be deprived of practically all control he has over his labor relations and labor costs. For example, under the section of the bill dealing with rights of employees, they are given the right to assist labor organizations. Plainly, this means that employees might participate in boycotts, sympathetic strikes, picketing, coercion, and other acts not countenanced or endorsed by a majority of a plant's working force. If the attack upon the interests of the employer and loyal employees proved successful, both would lose. Friendly relationships and mutual cooperation and respect might be succeeded by strife and the whims of outside leadership.

The employer, on the other hand, is forbidden to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of any of their rights, as stated in the measure. For example, he can have nothing to do with the formation or administration of any labor organization, or contribute financial or other support to it, except that he is permitted to confer with employees during working hours without deducting from their time or pay.

This is one of the provisions in the measure intended to discourage and make difficult the operation of employee-representation plans, or so-called "company" unions. Under such plans as they now operate, chosen representatives of the employees are permitted, on company time and pay, to confer with employees in the development of programs and suggestions for the consideration of the management.

This provision would necessitate such conferences being held outside of working hours and might even be interpreted to prevent the employer allowing his own employees after working hours to confer within the plant or office. When employees desire to confer together on matters of mutual interest to themselves and to the company for whom they work, we can see nothing wrong in such procedure, but under this act the employer who permitted it could be haled before the National Labor Relations Board or any of its agents for violation of the law.

While the employer is prohibited from interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees, the act is silent on the subject of coercion by employees. Conviction of coercion subjects the employer to severe penalties. Everyone, including leaders in the field of union labor, knows that by far the greatest number of labor disputes arise through attempts by employees to coerce their employer to do certain things. The question might be asked if anything the employer may do to reason with employees, or protect his property and business reputation, is to be construed as unfair, and, conversely, anything employees do, as right and legal. In fairness, why not treat both alike and penalize the employee convicted of coercion by withdrawing from him the rights conferred in the bill? The same action cannot in morals or justice be legal when performed by one citizen and illegal when performed by another.

It is declared an unfair practice to encourage or discourage membership in any labor organization. Here are words so broad in meaning and subject to such wide interpretation that the employer might well despair of talking to his employees on any subject relating to his business for fear of being charged with discrimination through encouraging or discouraging membership in a labor organization. The words are used in connection with hiring or tenure of employment, but nothing in the bill limits their application to written terms of contract.

In the same section occurs a specific exception which permits the employer to make an agreement with a labor organization for maintenance of a closed shop, if a majority of employees in the unit concerned belong to a labor organization. Here the question arises whether employers and independent or unaffiliated employees are to understand by this that the Federal Government recognizes, sponsors, and encourages the closed shop.

Another unfair labor practice for the employer is to discharge or otherwise discriminate against an employee who has filed charges or given testimony under the act. This provision permits an employee to malign and misrepresent his employer in the grossest manner, and even though the Board finds his charges false, the employer is nevertheless prohibited from discharging the employee or otherwise penalizing his unwarranted action. The unfairness of such a provision requires no further comment.

Under the heading "Representatives and Elections", the bill states that representatives designated or selected for the purposes of collective bargaining by the majority of the employees in a unit appropriate for such purposes, shall be the exclusive representatives of all the employees in such unit for the purposes of collective bargaining. Here we find a bald attempt to force the Federal Government into a clear declaration in favor of the majority rule. Such declaration repudiates the plan of majority and minority representation according to proportions as approved by the President for the automobile industry. Contrary to principles of justice and the American theory of government, it deprives minorities of their rights to bargain as they choose.

It should also be pointed out that while in section 1 of the act, it is stated, among other things, that the policy is to secure full freedom for employees in association and bargaining, this section 9 (a) takes it away so that we have left only full freedom for whatever majority may be in power at any given time. There is a proviso to the effect that any individual employee or group of employees may present grievances to their employer, but what power he would have to grant relief is highly problematical since he is required to be governed by whatever agreement he can effect with the majority. Note also that the minority is not authorized to utilize the powers of the Board to secure consideration for their demands.

In holding elections the Board is empowered to determine the appropriate unit, whether plant, craft, or other subdivision. Nothing in this section 9 (b) prevents the Board from subdividing the plant into as many units as it chooses, or from changing its mind from time to time, so as to make easy the securing of majority representation for the particular labor group it favors. Imagine a plant in which some one department operated by a few employees was vital to the entire operation. The Board could declare such department an election unit, and if a majority could be obtained, by an outside labor organization, the entire plant and all of its employees might be forced to comply with wage and other working conditions wholly unwanted by the vast majority.

Whenever any question concerning representation arises, the Board may investigate and certify the representatives selected. The Board may also, but does not have to, hold an election to determine who are the representatives of the majority. Nothing in this section prevents the Board from holding as many elections, at frequent intervals, as it chooses, until those it favors obtain a majority. And once its favorites win, no power in the entire act can compel the Board to hold another election even though it appears that sentiment within the company has undergone a change. So all-embracing are the powers conferred upon the Board, that it could even decide that a real or potential controversy exists and without an election determine who represents the majority of the employees.

As previously pointed out, the Board is created by the act as the supreme court of labor relations. Where other means of settling a controversy through agreements, codes, laws, or otherwise, exist, it may defer action to permit such agencies to act. But at any time, without the requirement of notice, it may step in and take jurisdiction and issue its orders at will. Many industries have made commendable progress in building up sound employee relationships. And in numerous States, laws have encouraged or permitted employers and employees to seek amicable solutions of their mutual problems. Whatever has been accomplished along these lines, could be thrown overboard at a moment's notice any time the Board should decide to assume jurisdiction. No industry can plan constructive steps toward recovery and increased employment with such a sword hanging over the heads of business executives and employees alike.

Should a charge be made, or the Board have reason to believe an employer was engaging in any of the practices called unfair by this act, it could delegate to any agent power to serve a complaint and require the employer to attend a hearing not less than 3 days later. And then we find a remarkable provision that the Board can amend the complaint at any time prior to issuing an order based thereon. This could mean after the employer has testified at the hearing, and gone home with the feeling he had satisfactorily answered all charges.

In the hearing on a complaint, the Board may allow any other person to appear and present testimony. Any other person might be an outside labor organizer, a social worker, competitor, or person subsidized by a competitor. After all the evidence is taken and reduced to writing, the Board issues its findings of fact and should they uphold the complaint, in whole or part, the Board may serve a cease and desist order including restitution. What restitution covers is not specifically indicated, but by reference to other sections, it may be assumed to include wages of employees on strike, or increases in compensation during the period of dispute or existence of the alleged unfair practice. Thereafter the employer is required to report from time to time the extent and progress of his compliance with the orders of the Board.

Should an employer fail or neglect to obey an order of the Board, it may call upon any circuit court of appeals of the United States within the district wherein the alleged unfair practice occurred, to compel by court order compliance with its findings. Except under special circumstances, the court cannot consider any evidence not included in the transcript of the Board, or any objections not urged before the Board. And it should be noted that the Board itself in conducting its hearings is not governed by the rules of evidence prevailing in courts of law or equity. The employer is then permitted under the limitations outlined to present what defense he can. The findings of the court are conclusive, except that appeals may be taken to the Supreme Court of the United States. One may well wonder under these conditions what opportunity the average small employer of the Nation will have to secure justice and protect his business and his loyal employees from continual attempts by outsiders to foment controversy.

Similarly, if the employer feels that an injustice has been done him by some order of the Board, he may appeal to the circuit court of appeals of the United States within his district, but in such case he is subject to the same rigid limitations as to evidence and objections as outlined in the case of the Board taking an appeal. Also, unless specifically ordered by the court, the appeal of the employer does not operate to stay the Board's order. Assume an order of the Board greatly increased the employer's operating expenses, and his appeal was pending in court for many months before passed upon, the employer would be compelled to pay the increased costs during the time appeal was pending even though the court might agree with the employer and wipe out the unreasonable charges when the case is finally heard.

Section 11 of the act gives the several district courts of the United States jurisdiction to prevent and restrain unfair labor practices named by the act. But here we find the strange provision that they are to act solely at the request of the National Labor Relations Board. Just why the employer does not have the same right to seek relief from oppression or coercion threatening his employes and his business, is not apparent.

The Board is also given authority to act as an arbitrator in labor disputes, provided both parties sign an arbitration agreement. Once such an agreement is signed, the Board may proceed and make an award even though the employer may have signed the agreement under duress, or misrepresentation. The award of the Board is binding upon both parties to the agreement, in one paragraph of the arbitration section, but in another paragraph of the same section, appears the proviso that no employee individually and no group of employees collectively shall be compelled to render labor services without their consent.

In plain language this would appear to mean that the employer is bound by the decision of the Board, but in the rare event that the Board should hold with the employer, the employees nevertheless cannot be compelled to accept the wages or working conditions prescribed in the award. Once again one might ask if such a provision is in conformity with the principles of fairness or equity.

The arbitration section of the act also contains provisions whereby a petition for the impeachment of an award may be filed. In this connection appears the strange provision that partisanship known, or which by the exercise of due care, should have been known by a party to the proceedings, shall not constitute a ground for seeking impeachment of an award. In the same arbitration section is an attempt to limit the full discretionary power of the courts. It appears in the following language: "The court shall construe every award with a view to approving its validity."

The Board in section 13, under the title, "Investigatory Powers" is given what amounts to blanket authority to subpena and demand production of any and all data bearing upon or related to any of the subjects it may decide to investigate. Attendance of witnesses and production of evidence may be required from any place in the United States or its territories at any time. And an employer cannot refuse to produce records or give testimony on the ground that it would incriminate him. The wide powers given under this section even go so far as to compel all departments and agencies of the Federal Government to produce records, papers, and information in their possession relating to any matter before the Board.

This means that income-tax records could be subpenaed from the Bureau of Internal Revenue and business and industrial records from the Bureau of the Census, showing intimate details of a company's operations which, under present law, are in both instances confidential. Such confidential information appearing as evidence in the proceedings of the Board, could easily bring ruin to many a business concern.

In one of the closing sections of the act appears the statement: "Nothing in this act shall be construed so as to interfere with, or impede, or diminish in any way, the right to strike." Thus the act, in one of its final paragraphs, reaches the acme of unfairness by making it plain to all who read, that in its entirety, it is aimed to favor one particular type of labor organization without at the same time imposing upon employees or labor organizations any measure of responsibility for their acts.

If those who advocate the passage of S. 1958, or similar legislation, would consult the experience of the Commonwealth of Australia, they might not be so certain that the measure would prove of real benefit even to labor unions. There their arbitration courts possessing powers similar to those proposed to be given the Board by this act have not satisfied either labor or employers. Tremendous expense for their government and for both sides in cases before the courts, long delays, decisions in one section which do not meet conditions in another, and the promotion of a spirit of antagonism between employees and employers are just a few of the conditions which have developed in that country.

Spokesmen for the various types of workers' representation plans and independent employees do not want this measure passed by Congress. They have so testified last year when S. 2926 was before the Congress. Their testimony to the same effect was again repeated with reference to S. 1958 in the present hearing. Congress should be reminded that these classes represent 90 percent or more of the Nation's workers. Neither have employers indicated any desire for the measure. On the contrary, their testimony has been almost wholly opposed to its numerous unfair and un-American provisions. Are we to conclude that only labor-union officials and their members seek this legislation? If so, Congress faces a serious question of deciding whether it has either moral or constitutional grounds for legislating to one class or group of people, rights, powers, and privileges denied to all others.

Since nowhere in the measure is the employer given any rights except the doubtful privilege of agreeing upon imposition of a closed shop, whenever an outside labor organization can secure by strike, coercion, or other means, a majority of his employees, what could he expect in the way of justice at the hands of a Board designated to administer such a law? Would it be within the bounds of reason to believe that such a Board, no matter how able its members, would devote much time or thought to protecting the interests of the employer and his unorganized employees in the enforcement of an act which throughout its many sections breathes enmity against every conception of that amity and mutual cooperation upon which American industry is founded and has given us a measure of progress unequalled throughout the world?

The measure is unsound, unconstitutional, and unfair. It should be defeated.

Both employee and employer must have a square deal and this bill does not provide it.

This group which is the backbone of the construction industry in the western part of Pennsylvania urges that this bill be amended to provide for equal representation, or be entirely eliminated in its present form.

Respectfully yours,

CONSTRUCTORS ASSOCIATION OF WESTERN PENNSYLVANIA,
ROY A. MACGREGOR, Executive Secretary.

Los Angeles, March 19, 1935.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: This organization, representing over 700 people, vigorously oppose the passage of labor disputes bill (S. 1958). We firmly believe that such legislation is most undesirable at this time, and presents an unwarranted interference of Government in the relations between employer and employee.

We are convinced from recent experiences that any such measure would create serious unrest among workers, with its resultant great disadvantage to both employer and employee. At the same time it would undoubtedly invite outside interference and encourage racketeering, which would be most disturbing to present friendly and cordial industrial relations.

At this time, also, we wish to earnestly express our opposition to the passage of any legislation that would further limit the hours of the work-week as is proposed in a number of 30-hour labor bills. Such proposals are unsound, impractical, and would defeat the very object which they hope to attain. They would unreasonably increase the cost of production and advance immeasurably the cost of living. It would be impossible to pass on to the consumer such excessive increase in the cost of manufacturing, thus many concerns would be forced into bankruptcy with the resultant increase in unemployment.

Business is eagerly desirous of cooperating with Government but many proposals before Congress are shaking the confidence of business and retarding the longed for recovery. What business needs is a restoration of confidence and a respite from further governmental interference and regulation.

We most earnestly urge that you will lend your support to such a principle.

Very truly yours,

DAVIS STANDARD BREAD CO.,
R. R. BEAMISH, President.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Before taking the liberty of addressing you on the question of the Wagner trade-disputes bill, the writer has made rather an extensive trip throughout those trades to whom we sell our equipment and, wishing to be absolutely fair and impartial in the matter of our New York Senator's bill, S. 1958, made the contact of workers engaged in menial positions and again employees in more responsible positions, and last but not least their employers.

To those whose education has not permitted them to thoroughly understand the import of the said bill, the writer showed them exactly what the intentions of the bill were, and when they realized the fact that their independence as American citizens was to be curtailed by the designation of their individual rights to some other individual, they became incensed and in their own honest way deplored the fact that the Constitution of the United States, which guarantees to them the privilege of life, liberty, and freedom, was to be curtailed by a law which, when possibly brought before the Supreme Court of the United States, would of necessity be declared unconstitutional for just this very reason.

Senator Wagner may believe that the principles of his bill will be giving labor more than its fair share of right, but it is clearly evident that he is playing into the hands of the dominating parties of the American Federation of Labor who, permit the writer to state, represent but a very small minority of the aggregate workers of the United States, and this has been conclusively proven whenever an honest, fair test has been made in industry as a whole.

If the individual worker is no longer to be permitted to act according to his own conscience and has individual thought and wish and has to be subservient to the demands of an organized minority now maintaining a powerful and well-financed lobby in the Halls of Congress, then the American worker is subject to the padrone system and is no better off than the poor, harassed soviet worker, whose soul may belong to him but whose body and production is the sole right and ownerhip of the Communist leaders of the Russian Republic.

Men of intelligence who can read and understand the dangers lurking in this bill are also incensed at the fact that their labor and their individualism is to become a commodity amenable to the rules of a labor organization.

Senator Wagner and anyone else in favor of the bill in question cannot talk this fact away. They have tried and have elaborated upon the social justice, but this is the biggest farce that has ever been perpetrated on the American public.

Conditions throughout every industry are far from normal and if this continuous, unnecessary, and unethical legislation is continually agitated by elective representatives who in full truth do not know the ravages that will be occasioned by the passage of such bills, then it is about time that a "spade be called a spade." Therefore, the writer wishes to state emphatically that he believes that there is no more thought of true social justice or equality in the mind of the worthy Senator from New York in advocating this bill than there is in gathering snowballs on the sidewalks of New York in the middle of August!

The worthy Senator, to the mind of thousands of people, is merely gallery playing with the thought of encouraging certain individuals in certain walks of life who are being supported by the poor workers who must contribute to organizations in order to have the right to a livelihood. The advocacy of this bill before the Senate of the United States is one of the most shameful endeavors to usurp the privilege of free and independent thought and action that has ever been presented.

The writer regrets exceedingly the necessity of having to take issue with the Senator from his own State, but other men than the writer have for some time been continually watching the thought and trend of the Senator from New York and have freely discussed the fact that it is a case of rule and ruin just so long as Bob Wagner gets what he wants in the way of votes and support from the rank and file of labor organizations.

This is so clearly evident to any man of just public-school education that it is with simple amazement that we read of the possibility of support of such a bill. How in the name of all that is good for America and for the freedom and independence of its workers can anybody be so bamboozled as not to see the complete injustice of this bill to the workers of the United States as a whole.

Very respectfully yours,

DEAR SIR: The undersigned, who represent the entire membership of the Employees Association of the Lilly Varnish Co., want you to know, as chairman of the Senate committee now considering Wagner bill, S. 1958, that we are strongly opposed to the entire content of this bill.

Our opinion of this bill has been reached without any influence whatever on the part of our employer.

We do not like the Wagner bill because it implies that there is something wrong with our employees' association, and this is not true.

This bill, as we understand it, provides for a national labor board having power to decide whether we should deal with our employers by the entire company, a single craft, or by a single department. That is our business. We know, in our plant, just how we want to deal with our employer who has always treated us fairly in every phase of our relationship with him. We don't want any national board to tell us how to get along with our employer, nor do we want to deal with our employer through any kind of outside organization.

Thank you.

NEW ORLEANS, LA., March 27, 1935.

The Honorable DAVID I. WALSH,
Chairman Committee on Education and Labor.
United States Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SENATOR: I am taking the liberty of writing you in connection with the Wagner bill, a copy of which has just recently been seen by me.

Now, as you know, I have no means of telling what your attitude is toward this bill, but knowing what I do of your broad, liberal views in matters of this kind, I feel sure that you will be interested in the reaction of an employee representative toward this bill and that you will give it all of the consideration that it deserves.

The employees of this company know that insofar as our relations with the company are concerned, there is absolutely no need of any legislation of this kind, but taking a larger view of the industrial situation of the country as a whole, and knowing the unscrupulous methods adopted by some employers in organizing fake unions, whose sole purpose was to prevent their employees from joining an efficient union for the purpose of collective bargaining, I feel that there is an urgent need for legislation along the general lines of the Wagner bill, and inasmuch as the above-mentioned unfair practices serve as a handicap to our company and its employees, and to all other fair companies and their employees, I feel that while protecting our interests in the matter we should at the same time support its general provisions.

Unfortunately, in their zeal for accomplishing their purpose there has been embodied in the Wagner bill several features which would seriously affect the efficient functioning of our and other representation plans throughout the country, thereby injuring a large number of satisfied employees.

When you stop to consider over a period of years we have demonstrated that through our representation plan we have attained conditions for all of our employees far better than has been attained by any other method for men employed in similar capacity.

Our wage scale is in no case less and in most cases more than those prevailing in a given community.

We have demonstrated that it is an unexcelled method of settling individual grievances and injustices which are bound to come up in any large organization, which is proven by the fact that almost all of the cases that are taken up by our representatives are settled in favor of the employees.

We have for years had in effect and practical operation all of those reforms which labor, organized and unorganized, and our Government administration have been clamoring for, such as old-age pensions, accident and sickness benefits, life insurance, both donated by the company, and our group insurance. our liberal lay-off allowances, and many other favorable conditions that have not been attained by any other form of collective bargaining.

In view of the above facts, I feel that there can be no justifiable excuse for the adoption of any regulations which would hinder the operation of a plan that has given such amazingly beneficial results.

Therefore, as secretary of our Louisiana sales department representation plan, and as an employee of the company, I am sending you some proposed amendments and modifications which, if adopted, would, in my opinion, permit us to continue our good work as we have in the past and would at the same time enable the Wagner bill to accomplish all of those desirable features for which it was designed.

You, of course, realize that these proposals may not be couched in the proper legal phraseology, but will, I think, be clear enough to illustrate the purpose I have in mind.

Part 2, section 8: Cut out the words "or contribute financial or other support to it." (By reason of the nature of the business, employees particularly in the oil industry are scattered over a wide territory and in many instances it is necessary for them to travel considerable distances in order to attend joint conferences and other meetings which may be called for the purpose of discussing wages, working conditions, and other matters which have to do with the relationship between employer and employee. It therefore would work undue financial hardship on the employee or his representative to require him to pay the expense of these trips out of his own pocket. Section 8, subsection 2, as at present written, prohibits the employer to pay such expenses and would result in an undue and prohibitive hardship on the employee.)

Part 3, section 8: Add the following: "Such agreement to be for a period of not more than 1 year unless renewed by a majority vote of the employees of the company", and also add: "Provided further. That nothing in any such agreement shall prevent an employee from being or becoming a member of some other labor organization, and there shall be no discrimination against any such employee for being a member of any such other labor organization.

Part B, section 9: On line 5, page 10, insert after the word "shall" and before the word "decide" the following: "Hold elections to."

Part C, section 9: On line 16, page 10: Cut out the word "may" and substitute "shall", and cut out the word "or" and substitute "and."

There should also be a provision in the bill guaranteeing that no provision of the bill or action of the Labor Board shall serve to deprive employees of any company of favorable conditions that they have already attained or may secure.

Now, Mr. Senator, you understand that I have only attempted to define the opinion of the employees as it affects them and their representation plan as I see it, and have not attempted to cover the company's attitude at all.

However, I hope that you will see this as I see it and, in any case, I feel sure that you will give it your careful and unbiased consideration, and I want to take this opportunity of thanking you in advance for anything that you may do in this matter. If you should want to hear more of our representation plan and receive first-hand views of the employees on the Wagner bill, I would be willing to make the trip to Washington and to appear before your committee.

Yours very respectfully,

OLIVER J. BOWEN,
Employee Representative Secretary, Louisiana Sales Division, Standard Oil Co. of Louisiana.

THE EMPLOYEES' COOPERATIVE ASSOCIATION OF THE TWIN CITY LINES,
Minneapolis, Minn., March 26, 1935.

HON. DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: The undersigned are the president and secretary-treasurer of the Employees' Cooperative Association of the Twin City Lines. The executive committee, at a duly called meeting, authorized us as officers to write you and the other Minnesota Members of the Senate and the House, and to state to you our attitude with reference to Senator Wagner's labor disputes bill, S. 1958.

We are enclosing you herewith a brief history of our organization. This organization and its predecessor has had a continuous history of successful operation since October 1917, the time when it was first formed as a part of a settlement of a strike by the employees of the Twin City Lines at that time. We believe that if the bill is passed in the form in which it now is, it will seriously affect our organization. We believe at the present time that a majority of the employees of the Twin City Lines belong to our association. We have had during all of these years a satisfactory history of negotiations with our employer, and we believe at the present time that if an election were held we would be in the majority.

However that may be, we have completed agreements and a wage scale with the Twin City Lines representing our own members, which we believe are satisfactory to our members. We have, in addition to signing these contracts with our employer, had very frequently a number of conferences with the officials of the Twin City Lines relative to complaints of employees. Whenever requested, we have presented to the management complaints of employees, regardless of whether they were members of the association or not. We have tried to treat all employees alike, and the fact that a number of employees who are not members of the association have asked us to present their complaints would show, we believe, that our work is appreciated.

In view of our long and successful bargaining on behalf of the employees of the Twin City Lines we wish to protest against the passage of the bill in question for the particular reason that if the bill is passed and becomes law a majority of one vote may cause the union or association getting that slight majority to dominate the dealings with the company from that time on. We believe in minority representation as well as majority representation and we believe that where there is a considerable minority who themselves are organized, that such minority should have power to bargain collectively for its own members. We say this regardless of whether or not upon a vote taken we might be found to have the majority or the minority.

We do not think that the Wagner bill as now presented to Congress gives sufficient recognition of a considerable minority. We therefore ask the committee when redrafting the bill to take into consideration the arguments which we make make and to so redraft the bill that substantial minorities may have power to bargain collectively for their own members. Unless this is done we feel that in a great many plants there will be continual friction between factions among employees calling for continual elections and reelections, with the result that the labor situation in said plants will be continually in a state of turmoil. We are opposed to the bill in its present form.

We wish to thank you for your consideration of our situation.

Yours truly,

EMPLOYEES' COOPERATIVE ASSOCIATION,
FRANK J. WAGNER, President,
A. C. CATHCART, Secretary-Treasurer.

HISTORICAL STATEMENT

Early in October 1917, about 100 men waited upon Mr. Lowry, the president of the company, requesting that some form of organization be perfected to bargain collectively with the management. As the result of that conference, a committee of 17 trainmen was invited to discuss the matter further. Out of that discussion there came the Trainmen's Cooperative and Protective Association. This organization permitted only trainmen to belong. They met often at the beginning of the association for the purpose of negotiating working conditions, rate of pay, etc. They secured several increases of pay during the years this association was in existence.

In August 1933, the president of the company called the members of the executive committee of the Trainmen's Cooperative and Protective Association together for the purpose of explaining the N. I. R. A. code provisions for collective bargaining. He suggested that the association should be amended to fit the regulations of the code.

On September 5 the regular quarterly meeting of the cooperative committee was held and the new constitution was adopted, which had been changed to include all employes of the company. The name of this new organization was the Employees' Cooperative and Protective Association. On the executive committee there were 3 representatives from each district, together with the 11 heads of departments organized under the new association. The election of officers of the association was conducted on October 17, 1933. Only employee members were present during the election and only employees who were members of the association were elected to serve on the executive committee of the association. However, in the meantime a local union had been formed among a number of the trainmen, called the Amalgamated Association of Street and Electric Railway Employees. Members of the Amalgamated insisted on retaining their membership in the Cooperative and Protective Association with the idea of wrecking this association. To prevent this members of the association who were not members of the Amalgamated decided to draw up a new constitution restricting membership to those who did not belong to the union.

To accomplish this, several members of the executive committee who had been appointed on a committee for reorganization set about to obtain members for a new association which would succeed the Employees' Cooperative and Protective Association. The result was that the organization committee drafted a new constitution and bylaws. The object of this association was to provide a convenient and efficient means of promoting in the public interest the best conduct of the business of said Twin City Lines and to provide for mutual and helpful cooperation among all employees, the officials, and management of the Twin City Lines. To secure such business benefits for its members as may be obtained by cooperation and conferences between employees and officials and provide for the investigation and adjustment of all questions which may arise concerning working conditions of employees, in a spirit of cooperation through committees of employees elected by the employees from each election district on the system of the Twin City Lines as the same now exists or may hereafter exist. To secure for its members all the benefits accruing to membership in the Employees' Mutual Benefit Association and Pension System of the Twin City Lines.

Members were secured for this new organization, and an election was held for the purpose of electing two representatives from each of the districts recognized as members of the association. Immediately following the election the executive committee met, and officers were elected and the new constitution of the Employees' Cooperative Association was adopted.

The assocation executive committee appointed a bargaining committee and also a social committee. This association, on September 15, 1934, entered into an agreement with the Twin City Lines, printed copy of which is enclosed.

AGREEMENT BETWEEN TWIN CITY RAPID TRANSIT CO. AND THE EMPLOYEES' COOPERATIVE ASSOCIATION OF TWIN CIY LINES SEPTEMBER 15, 1934

Memorandum of Agreement

This agreement, made in duplicate this 15th day of September 1934, by and between Twin City Rapid Transit Co., on behalf of itself and its several subsidiary companies and its and their successors and assigns, hereinafter for convenience called the "company", party of the first part, and the Employees Cooperative Association of the Twin City Lines, hereinafter for convenience called the "association", party of the second part, witnesseth:

ARTICLE I

The purpose of this agreement is to provide the best and most satisfactory service to the public and the best possible working conditions for the company's employees, having due regard to the economic operation of the company's cars and busses and the financial condition of the company and the orders of competent public authorities.

ARTICLE II

This agreement shall become effective on and after September 15, 1934, and shall apply to all employees of the company now or hereafter members in good standing of the association and shall continue until July 1, 1935, and thereafter from year to year unless either party shall give to the other at least 30 days prior to the expiration of any yearly period, written notice of a desire to negotiate a new contract or change in the existing contract.

ARTICLE III

Section 1. The company agrees not to discriminate against any employee that is now or may hereafter become a member of the association, and the company and its duly authorized officers and agents will not, directly or indirectly, interfere with or prevent the joining of the association by any employee of the company and will neither discharge nor discriminate against any employee by reason of connection with the association; nor shall there be any such interference or discrimination on the part of the assocation or its members, against employees who elect not to become members thereof, or who shall elect to become members of any other association, labor union, or organization. Peaceful persuasion outside of working hours shall not be deemed interference or discrimination within the meaning of this section.

SEC. 2. The company recognizes the association as representing those employee who may from time to time be members thereof in good standing, and shall, from time to time, upon request of the authorized representatives of the association, meet and treat with them on all questions and grievances that may arise during the life of this agreement affecting the employees from time to time represented by them.

ARTICLE IV

The company reserves to itself control of all matters pertaining to the operation and conduct of the business, including, among other things, the determination of the type and amount of equipment, machinery, and other facilities to be used, specifications of the uniforms to be worn, the number of employees required in any department, the routes and schedules of its cars, the standards of ability, performance, and physical fitness required, the rules and regulations requisite to safety, and all other matters pertaining to management and operation. With respect to any such matters, the company shall not be required to negotiate or arbitrate. It is understood, however, that in all such matters the company will consider, insofar as practicable, the convenience and comfort of its employees and will welcome suggestions from the association respecting same, and if in connection with any such matter a claim of discrimination on account of membership in the association is made in good faith by its authorized representatives, such claim shall be referred to arbitration in the manner specified in article VI hereof.

ARTICLE V

SECTION 1. The company reserves to itself, and this agreement shall not be construed as in any way interfering with or limiting its right to discipline its employees, but membership in the association shall not be made the basis of any disciplinary measures, nor shall such membership entitle any employee to preferential treatment.

SEC. 2. The grievances or complaints of any employee represented by the association relating to matters of discipline, or other matters where the employee deems himself aggrieved, may, within 5 days, first be taken up by the authorized representatives of the association, on his behalf, with his immediate foreman, and if mutually satisfactory adjustment cannot be made with such foreman, then with his division superintendent or department head, and thereafter, if desired, with the general superintendent; and in cases where no mutually satisfactory adjustment can otherwise be reached, the matter may be referred to the president of the company, whose decision shall be final and the company shall not be required to arbitrate same, except that if in connection with any such case a claim of discrimination on account of membership in the association is made in good faith by its authorized representatives, such claim shall be referred to arbitration in the manner provided in article VI hereof.

SEC. 3. If a case of discipline involves suspension or discharge of an employee, and, through the investigation hereinabove in section 2 of this article provided for, he is found not sufficiently at fault to warrant such suspension or discharge, he shall then be restored to his former place in the service of the company with his continuous seniority rights, and shall be paid for lost time at his regular rate of pay, Provided, however, That this section shall not apply to discharges incident to a reduction in the number of employees required for the company's operations.

SEC. 4. In all cases where employees are discharged to reduce the force required for any work at any station or department, they shall be discharged according to seniority in that work at that station or department except that the company may, after consultation with the authorized representatives of the association, give consideration to outstanding capacity and fitness. In like manner in all cases where additional employees are hired to increase the force required for any work at any station or department, they shall be hired from among former employees theretofore discharged in connection with reduction of such force according to seniority except that (1) the company may, after consultation with the authorized representatives of the association if time permits, give consideration to outstanding capacity and fitness. (2) Before hiring additional men for work at any station or in any department the company may transfer any available employees at other stations or departments. (3) The company shall not be required to give any consideration, in connection with the hiring of additional employees, to any former employee who has not filed with the employment department an address in the Twin Cities at which he can be reached, or to any employee who does not report to the employment department ready for work within 24 hours after a notice, addressed to him at such address, shall have been mailed by the company. (4) No consideration need be given to any former employee after he has been out of the company's service for 1 year. (5) The provisions of this paragraph shall not apply to employees hired for purely temporary work, nor shall anything in this paragraph prevent or prohibit the hiring by the company of any men available in cases of emergency which do not permit of compliance herewith.

ARTICLE VI

In the event of a failure to reach a mutually satisfactory adjustment of any question or difference which may arise respecting compliance with the terms and conditions of this contract, or the rights of any employee hereunder in a matter not otherwise expressly provided for, the same shall upon the written request of either party to this agreement be submitted to a board of arbitration in the following manner:

The company shall choose one arbitrator, the association shall choose one arbitrator, and, if the two so chosen cannot agree upon a mutually satisfactory adjustment, they shall select a third arbitrator; in case the two arbitrators first chosen fail to agree upon a third arbitrator within 10 days after their appointment, then, upon the application of either arbitrator on 24 hours' notice to the other, such third arbitrator may be selected by the chairman of the Minneapolis-St. Paul regional labor board, or if said board shall not be in existence, the person who was its last chairman.

The three arbitrators so selected shall meet as promptly as practicable in not to exceed 5 days and receive all evidence and testimony pertaining to the case that either party may desire to submit to them and shall thereupon render their decision and submit a copy of same in writing to both parties involved. The decision of any two of the arbitrators so selected shall be final and binding upon the parties involved. Each party shall pay the fees and expenses of the arbitrator selected by it, and the fees and expenses of the third arbitrator shall be divided equally between the parties hereto.

In the event of the failure of either party to appoint its arbitrator within 6 days after arbitration is decided upon, the party so failing shall forfeit its case.

ARTICLE VII

The company agrees that any employees, who are officers of the association or members of any committee thereof, shall be granted leave of absence of not more than 90 days in any 1 year, when so requested, or longer if the consent and approval of the president of the company is first obtained, to permit the performance of their duties as such officers or committee members, except in case of shortage of men, or unusual traffic demands, and then arrangements will be made to relieve such employees as soon as practicable. If such duties require continuous absence for not more than 90 days in any 1 year, or longer if the consent and approval of the president is first obtained, such employees shall, upon retirement from such offices or committee. be placed in their former positions with all seniority rights and ratings restored.

ARTICLE VIII

The association agrees that the employees now or hereafter represented by them will not participate in any sympathetic strike called for any cause and will not participate in any strike called for any purpose whatsoever, except for a refusal by the company to arbitrate as herein provided or its violation of the terms of a lawful award pursuant to such arbitration. There shall be no strike on account of any matter which the company is willing to submit to arbitration. During the continuance of this contract there shall be no lockout. "Lockout" is deemed to mean the refusal of the company to continue the employment of members of the association by reason of such membership.

ARTICLE IX

The association may maintain in any of the company's shops or stations a bulletin board for their exclusive use, but all notices, except notices of meetings and social occasions of employees, shall be subject to the approval of the president of the company.

ARTICLE X

SECTION 1. All of the rules, regulations, and practices of the company now in force and effect relating to wages, hours, and working conditions shall be and continue in force and effect during the life of this agreement and any extension thereof, save and except as hereinafter provided:

Whenever the association may deem necessary or desirable a change or changes in such rules, regulations, and practices of the company then in force and effect relating to wages, hours, working conditions, or to matters not herein specifically reserved to the company, they may notify the president of the company in writing of such desired change, in which case the officers of the company shall within 5 days meet with the authorized representatives of the association and endeavor to reach an agreement respecting the matter. If no agreement is reached within 30 days or such further time as both parties may agree upon, the matter may, if the parties so agree, be referred to arbitrators selected in the manner provided in article VI hereof upon such terms and conditions as the interested parties may agree upon.

SEC. 2. The association agrees that each of the employees now or hereafter represented by it shall render faithful service in their position and shall strictly observe all operating rules of the company and cooperate with the management of the company in the efficient operation of the system and in fostering cordial relations between the company, its employees, and the public.

SEC. 3. The company may from time to time, by bulletins or orders posted on the bulletin boards of the company, change any of such rules, regulations, and practices then in force and effect as may appear to it desirable or necessary, provided such changes do not violate the letter and spirit of this agreement.

ARTICLE XI

Nothing in this agreement shall require the company to do anything inconsistent with the charters, franchises, indeterminate permits, or laws under which it or its subsidiaries may from time to time operate or exist, nor anything inconsistent with the orders or regulations of any competent governmental authority or with the Code of Fair Competition for the Transit Industry.

In witness whereof the respective parties hereto have affixed their hand and seal by their fully authorized representatives therefor.

EMPLOYEES REPRESENTATION ASSOCIATION,

INDIANA HARBOR WORKS,

To the Senate Committee on Education and Labor:

We, the undersigned officers of the workmen's council and rules committee of the Employees Representation Association of the Inland Steel Co., located at East Chicago, Ind., have been authorized by the workmen's council to file a protest on behalf of this organization against the Wagner bill, S. 1958. This organization has a membership of 9,000 employees, some who are also members of outside unions.

Our body opposes the Wagner bill for the following reasons:

1. The bill declares (sec. 1) that—

Denials of the right to bargain collectively lead also to strikes and other manifestations of economic strife, which create further obstacles to the free flow of commerce.

Further, section 15 of the bill, under limitations, states:

"Nothing in this act shall be construed so as to interfere with or impede or diminish in any way the right to strike."

We object to those two sections because we do not agree that it is necessary to provide collective bargaining for the purpose of preventing strikes and at the same time encourage strikes.

2. This bill is in absolute opposition to the plan under which we are operating, and, in our opinion, it is a violation of section 7 (a) of the National Industrial Recovery Act.

We recognize the right and are in favor of the right to bargain collectively in the manner we choose and through any representation we might select. Our decision with respect to the form of organization and choice of representatives was reached without improper influence, coercion, or abuse upon the part of our employer. We, therefore, should not be governed by any outside organization, particularly one which is not legally responsible for its acts.

3. This bill according to section 9 (b) may force employees into closed-shop conditions, and make it possible that no one may be employed except members of a union, and make it illegal to agree that no one may be employed except nonunion men.

It is obvious that the purpose of such a one-sided provision is to establish by law the closed shop and that this is the issue in this legislation.

If the unions are given the power to dictate a closed shop, they have reached a point where they can say: "You must join our union or starve." This is against the principles of every true citizen. To belong to a union may be all right, but to say that the man who does not belong shall not be permitted to labor, is not in harmony with collective bargaining. Our plan of employee representation in no way conflicts with the right of employees to choose their own form of collective bargaining.

SUMMARY

Regarding our protest against this bill, which tends to undermine our plan of employee representation, which has been balloted on and accepted by the employees at an election held free from intimidation, coercion, or any restraint whatsoever from our employer.

At the time of the election held on June 1, 2, and 4, 1934, there were 8,870 employees eligible and available to vote. The total number of ballots cast was 8,073, or 91 percent voting; 77.1 percent of the votes cast favored adoption of our present plan of representation.

Our plan was adopted because it provides the most effective means of handling complaints.

The purpose of our plan is to provide a method where all complaints can be quickly heard and adjusted. Through this plan we have been able to adjust many complaints that could not be adjusted properly by any outside organization.

One of the many things that we have been granted is vacations with pay for all hourly employees. This, we know, would not come from an outside organization.

We are enjoying satisfactory relations with our employer and, therefore, urge that some consideration be given to our constituents, who are in no way interested in having their welfare and means of livelihood impaired by being compelled to abide by rules laid down by an irresponsible organization that continuously tries to infringe on their liberty to choose their form of collective bargaining.

In order to preserve our right to collective bargaining we urge that this bill be amended so that there can be no intimidation by outside labor organizations or defeated in its entirety.

Signed this 30th day of March 1934.

Chairman of the Workmen's Council.
JOHN J. BORKERT,
Secretary of the Workmen's Council.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., April 3, 1935.

CLERK COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION AND LABOR,
United States Senate.

DEAR SIR: I am enclosing a brief of the employees' representatives of the John A. Roebling's Sons Co., of Trenton, N. J., which they wish included in the record of the hearings on the labor disputes bill.

I shall appreciate it if you will do this and advise me.

Thanking you, I am

Very sincerely yours,

D. LANE POWERS.

APRIL 1, 1935.

DEAR MR. POWERS: May we, the executive committee of the board of employee representatives of the John A. Roebling's Sons Co. of Trenton and Roebling, N. J., be permitted to submit the following brief for consideration of your honorable Committee on Education and Labor?

We, the undersigned executive committee, representing 4,000 employees of the John A. Roebling's Sons Co., of Trenton and Roebling, N. J., wish to strenuously object to the enactment of Senate bill, S. 1958, introduced by Senator Wagner, for the following reasons:

Its enactment would promote conflict and industrial strife which would tend to seriously injure the satisfactory relations which now exist between us and the management.

It would tend to legislate out of existence the employee representation plan which we have enjoyed for the past 2 years, and which we wish to continue because it has provided a happy and successful working arrangement between us and the company.

We feel our best interests can be served by having employee and employer sit down in a friendly and constructive atmosphere, and with first-hand practical knowledge of our problems, work out a fair and equitable solution.

During the past 2 years we have had 104 cases considered and adjusted, dealing with wages, working conditions, pensions, sanitation, safety, prevention of accidents, housing and living conditions, and recreation.

Our representation plan has proved a most satisfactory method of collective bargaining through representatives of our own choosing and has been absolutely free of domination or influence on the part of our employees.

The elections have been carried on exclusively by the employees themselves and under rules decided upon by themselves.

Our plan establishes a continuous day-to-day channel of communication between the management and the men and all complaints are quickly heard and adjusted.

For the transaction of such business and the consideration of other matters in a regular monthly meeting held during working hours, the elected representatives are paid their regular rate of pay for the time lost, which does not exceed more than an average of 3 hours per month.

Any thought of representatives being influenced by such an arrangement is a misconception of the whole idea of the representation plan and anyone holding such ideas has a very low opinion of the character of the average American workman.

We representatives also hold meetings from time to time outside of working hours and away from the plant for which we receive no compensation from the company.

The meetings held during working hours and on the outside are never attended by representatives of management except as requested by the employee representatives.

More than 90 percent of the employees have voted in our elections and there is a very strong feeling among all against any change in our present plan.

We believe that as employees we should have the right to say who shall represent us, however, the bill would transfer this authority to the National Labor Board, who may certify as representatives men not actually elected by us as employees.

We believe that as employees we have the right to determine when elections of our representatives shall be held. However, the bill would also transfer this authority to the National Labor Board, who may call elections at their discretion and thus create endless confusion.

We firmly believe our experience under the employee representation plan justifies its continuance without interference of a body such as the proposed National Labor Board or intimidation or coercion by a professional labor union as permitted under the Wagner bill.

As representatives of laboring men, we ask that you show your interest in us by opposing Senate bill, S. 1958.

BRIEF AND ARGUMENT OF WAGER FISHER, IN PROTEST AGAINST THE ENACTMENT OF THE BILL INTO A LAW

To the Education and Labor Committee of the United States Senate:

In reference to the above-titled bill and in protest against its enactment into law, it is respectfully submitted that the measure considered seriatim, dicloses the following faults, viz.:

TITLE

The purpose set forth does not indicate any object of rightful jurisdiction within the scope of the powers of Congress, granted to it by the people of the United States.

DECLARATION OF POLICY

Section 1: The wording of this statement is vague and indefinite, and is not such as should be clear and definite where the property and liberty of the people are involved. It clearly indicates a somewhat strained effort, by a combination of words and phrases, to bring this measure within the scope of a granted power of Congress. The effort is lacking in substance, in that—(1) It lays no ground of a recognized legal right that may be involved; (2) it assumes to invade and dictate the relationship of master and servant of the citizens of a State; (3) it is an interference with the citizen in the use of his private property; and (4) it lays restrictions upon the exercise of the liberty of the citizens in the right to follow their instincts and themselves dictate their conclusions involving their maintenance.

Section 2, clause 8: The use of the term "affecting commerce" is highly indefinite. No power has been granted by the people to the Government of the United States investing it with authority to intermeddle in the contractual relations of the citizens of a State, involving the relation of master and servant and rates of compensation. The clause concerning commerce in the instrument of Government being definitely enumerated as a power to regulate commerce among the several States.

SECTION 3, clause (a): Such a board which this bill seeks to create would be a multiplicity, and impose upon the citizens an additional burden of expense taken from their earnings. A similar agency of arbitration authority being already existent in the Department of Labor.

SECTION 8, clause 3: In this clause an employer of labor is barred from discriminating against any employee on account of membership in any labor organization. And in same clause, after the word "provided" the employer may be barred from employing anyone who is not a member of a particular labor organization.

SECTION 11: This section injects a penal responsibility enforceable in the United States courts, arising from the civil relations entirely of a voluntary nature between the citizens of a State.

SECTION 12: clause (a): The entire feature of this clause is already covered in the Department of Labor now being conducted in the executive department of Government, at the expense of and with the moneys of the citizens.

SECTION 13, clause (3): This is clearly an attempt to compel a citizen to be a witness against himself.

SECTION 14: This is a penal clause, subtly worded to broaden its scope, to be applied to and imposed upon the citizens of a State, inflicting penalties for matters arising from their civil relations.

CONCLUSIONS AS TO BILL

The bill is faulty in that it does not indicate any object of rightful jurisdiction in Congress. The employment and wage contracts between citizens of a State, which it obviously seeks to intermeddle in, is not within any granted power or authority of Congress.

The bill is faulty in that its purpose is vague and general and highly indefinite, in that it raises no duties and discloses no invaded rights, which are the proper subject for legislation affecting the property and liberty of the people. Their individual qualifications and abilities and the free and unrestricted self-direction of them in their application to their maintenance constituting their liberty.

The bill is faulty in that it falls within that class of legislation which is destructive to the general welfare in that its provisions do not flow in equality to all citizens, and in that it restricts the liberty and lays servitudes upon classes of citizens for the benefit of others.

The bill is faulty in that its object would violate the theory of our national or group existence by invading the liberty of the individual and impair his freedom to follow his own instincts—and conclusions—in the pursuit of happiness.

(a) It destroys the right to be his own master as to his services and the right in himself to fix his own compensation.

(b) It places in the hands of others than himself the right to curtail the avenues of, and restrict the opportunities for his employment and confers the right to impose a tax equivalent upon him incident to his employment.

The bill is unconstitutional in that the objects of it do not come within the granted powers of Congress.

To assume that it serves the general welfare would necessitate the elimination of all those concerned both directly and indirectly and included in its provisions—against whose interests—the burden of its clauses are directed and will lay.

The bill is class legislation in that its advantages are confined to a group in their civil and contractual relations.

It is obviously designed for the purpose of aiding and furthering the material interests of a group in their civil and contractual relations with others involved by its provisions, with all the burdens and disadvantages resting upon the other citizens involved.

It is special legislation in that it indirectly endows a group with the penal authority of government or the right to have it exercised against the others included in its provisions for the enforcement of their private contractual relations and against all others who do not choose to join or are not members of the favored group.

It will vest the right in a group to pervert the theory underlying our existence as a Nation by placing restrictions upon the liberty of the citizen to follow his own instincts and conclusions in the control of and the free use of his property and the free interchange of his services and the right to fix the values thereof with and for whom he may choose of the other citizens.

The bill is against public policy in that it assumes to throw the weight of government and the exercise of its penal authority into an interference of and into the private contractual relations of the citizens. If enacted into law it would break down the well-established principles of mutuality and reciprocation which are elemental to contracts—in that it gives advantages to one of the parties involved without any reciprocal and equivalent obligations and places obligations upon the others involved without any reciprocal and equivalent advantages. In the contractual relations imposed by its terms all the advantages accrue to one group without any obligations—while all obligations are laid upon the others without any advantages.

The bill is against public policy in that it would tend to encourage an intermeddling and interference with the peaceful relation of master and servant and the well-established rights and liberties and tranquility now enjoyed by each. It would, by the nurturing atmosphere which it radiates encourage the agents of groups to aggressive activities for the enlargement of their power and authority to interfere in and dominate the private contracts and contractual or civil relations existing between individuals embracing every avenue where the relation of master and servant exists.

It will consign to oblivion every element of the right to protest or resent and procure redress or damages for the malicious interference of contract where this right presently exists.

It will interfere with and destroy the right of directing supervision by employers over their employees and in this respect it will invade every theory that is elemental to the relation of master and servant, and tend to encourage insubordination and inefficiency.

In those industries producing objects it will tend to create uncertainty both as to the quantity of production and its cost so that no man may anticipate with any degree of certainty what his product will cost. He cannot contract for future delivery with any measure of safety. It will hamper industry from every conceivable angle.

SUMMARY

In a general summary—this bill reviewed from its various angles and phases—would appear to be an attempt to invade the rights of the States and assume jurisdiction over the contractual relations of its citizens under color of promoting the general welfare and the regulation of commerce between the States.

As to the general welfare the Constitution was instituted by the people to promote it. This was undoubtedly its purpose as set forth in the preamble. The very existence of it with its guaranteed rights of the citizens and its prohibition upon management naturally reacting to the general welfare.

The right of Congress to legislate for the general welfare of the people, however, is an independent question. No such expressed power exists. Any right to do so under the power to provide for the common defense and the general welfare of the United States is open to argument. Thomas Jefferson very early, when Secretary of State, gave a most decided opinion that to construe this as a general power would nullify all restricted authority in Congress.

Independent of the merits of this opinion, the present bill is not designed by its terms in the interest of the general welfare in that its advantages are obviously meant to accrue to one group of citizens with the burden of such advantages reacting against and laid upon the others involved by its terms. Since the advantages and disadvantages are not given to all citizens in an equal and like degree, and on the theory that an advantage cannot be existent without some resultant servitude from which it must arise, the welfare is not general, and this removes it from that field.

As to the power to regulate commerce between the States—to bring the bill within the granted power under this clause would necessitate the broadening of the meaning of it to a point that might easily include every act of every citizen. It is highly questionable whether this was ever intended. It does not seem consistent with State rights.

The question of jurisdiction was apparently raised at an early date on a point similar to the one involved by this bill as to the extent of the authority under this clause and was brought to the fore in Veazie v. Moor, 14 How. 568–574, on the question, "Whether such authority attaches because products of domestic enterprise may ultimately become the subjects of commerce outside the State", Justice Daniel said:

"The phrase can never be applied to transactions wholly internal, between citizens of the same community, or to a polity and laws whose ends and purposes—and operations—are restricted to the territory and soil of such community. Nor can it be properly concluded that because the products of domestic enterprise in agriculture or manufactures, or in the arts, may ultimately become the subjects of foreign commerce that the control of the means—or the encouragements by which enterprise is fostered and protected—is legitimately within the import of the phrase 'foreign commerce' or fairly implied in the investiture of the power to regulate such commerce.

"A pretension as far reaching as this would extend to contracts—between citizen and citizen of the same State; would control the pursuits of the planter, the grazier, the manufacturer, the mechanic, the immense operations of the colleries, the mines and furnaces of the country; for there is not one of these avocations—the results of which may not become the subjects of foreign commerce and be borne either by turnpikes, canals, or railroads—from point to point within the several States—toward an ultimate destination."

Irrespective of whether this reasoning has been superseded, the soundness of it seems assured when we consider the liberty of the individual. To assume to possess jurisdiction on such slender threads—and speculative adventure would necessitate straying to the greatest possible lengths from the plain wording of the instrument giving the authority—the Constitution.

ARGUMENT

In considering the aspects of this bill, it would seem inadvisable, and neither the part of wisdom or expedience to inject this measure into the industrial affairs of our Nation at this time, with vast numbers of nationals unemployed. It cannot but disturb and distort, and further frustrate those economic laws which seek normal levels of pay in adjustment with the pay in all forms of service being performed in the industrial whole of the Nation, and upon which the maintenance of all, and their efforts are dependent and products and services absorbed, and in which the rights of all citizens are involved rather than that of groups.

It must not be overlooked that the very purpose of this bill is protective, and we may rightfully ask, Protective for whom and against whom? There is a natural assumption that there are citizens other than those interested in this measure who are involved with the problem of their maintenance whose avenues and instincts are at variance therewith, and who may chose to accept employment at terms other than that which is acceptable to those who are furthering this measure. Are we then to discriminate against these? That is not the proper function of government. Government may not legislate for the benefit of a class or group. Its mission is for the benefit of the people as a whole.

The bill is subtly drawn and is palpably biased to favor a group, and its aim is directed toward enforcing upon employers, by law, what is generally known as the "closed shop." It also seeks to lay upon Congress a legislative measure that is not within the powers granted to it by the people, and the enactment of which in turn lays upon the citizens the burden and expense of proving it to be such.

Turning from the major aspects of the bill and looking at the individual interests of all of our people as confronted with their maintenance, each as separate from the other, common sense and reason suggests to even the lay mind that in the circuitous passing around, the exchanging of the articles which they produce for the maintenance of all and which are shared in proportionately by each through distribution, that interferences by Government which further the desires of particularly groups to apportion to themselves a larger portion for the products which they produce constricts the portion of such products which the others may possess and throws the orderly functioning of the organism into eccentric and tends to confuse and slow up its operation. There can be no more prolific source for unemployment.

In closing, this measure is clearly a request to Congress to prescribe a rule of conduct for the people of this Nation, the authority to do which has not been given to them and which they do not possess.

I request the committee to reject this bill for the reasons given.

Respectfully submitted.

WAGER FISHER.

COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION AND LABOR,
United States Senate:

The undersigned, General Cigar Co., Inc., operating factories and tobacco warehouses in the States of New Jersey, Michigan, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, and Connecticut, employing over 8,600 men and women, urge you most strongly to report unfavorably upon the Wagner labor-disputes bill, S. 1958. Instead of promoting equality of bargaining power, the present bill will produce unfair inequalities. While employers' interference with the exercise of rights granted employees by the bill is prohibited, employees are not protected from coercion by their fellow employees. The use of violence, falsehood, and intimidation by minority employee groups to secure their ends is not forbidden by the bill. Appeals to the proposed Labor Relations Board for investigations concerning the employees' choice of representatives and the ordering of reelections will creat uncertainty, tend unnecessarily to prolong disputes, and prevent amicable labor agreements. Further, the bill will tend to break down the friendly relations existing between employer and employee, since the broad restrictions of section 8 may well be deemed to prohibit friendly acts on the part of the employer. Successful maintenance of a business in these days of financial distress is at best difficult. To vest employees with the powers contemplated by this bill may well lead to demands so extravagant as to spell disaster for both employee and employer. We believe, therefore, that the bill will defeat, not promote, its own objectives.

GENERAL CIGAR CO., INC.,
FRED HIRSCHHORN, President.

Brief

MARCH 28, 1935.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
Chairman Committee on Education and Labor,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: This brief, in opposition to the Wagner labor disputes bill, comes to you as the word of the 17 hosiery employees associations in Berks County, Pa., representing 7,000 employees out of a total of 13,000 in Berks County. We are opposed to this bill for the following reasons:

1. It denies the minority a voice in vital matters affecting their welfare.
2. It denies to workers their constitutional rights which, as asserted in the famous "7a", allow people to join any organization they see fit.
3. In effect, it would establish a monopoly in labor representation. Under existing conditions, it is evidently biased in favor of one organization.
4. It does not place any responsibility or limitations upon the majority, nor any restrictions as to tactics employed. In the event that the aforementioned organization (for whose benefit the bill is evidently designed) should be defeated in several instances, there is nothing to prevent their intimidating and "coercing" the majority.
5. It would release a gigantic attempt to secure the closed shop in industry. This would result in considerable unrest as workers resisted this regimentation.
6. The bill is not one of equity, even to the workers whom it is intended to benefit.

STATEMENT OF JASON B. EVANS, RECORDING SECRETARY AND BUSINESS REPRESENTATIVE OF LOCAL UNION 569, PAVING DIVISION, INTERNATIONAL UNION OF OPERATING ENGINEERS

To the honorable Committee on Education and Labor of the United States Senate:

I oppose the enactment, in its present form, of Senate bill 1958, commonly known as the "Wagner bill", now pending in the Seventy-fourth Congress.

For 31 years I have been a member of organized labor, affiliated with local unions whose members are employed as paving engineers. During most of that time I have been an official, in one capacity or another, in labor unions. With this background, it is perhaps needless to say I thoroughly believe in the principle of collective bargaining. I also believe in the fundamental right of every man to work at the employment for which he is equipped, and in his privilege of selecting the labor organization with which he desires to affiliate.

It is for the reason that Senate bill 1958 in effect denies to the individual these rights, that I oppose its enactment, in its present form.

It will be recognized by even the casual reader that this bill imposes no restraint of any kind or character upon labor organizations, and that it makes no provision for the protection of minorities. In fact, it places minorities at the mercy of ruthless majorities.

My 31 years of experience as a member of organized labor has convinced me that labor organizations have not reached a state of perfection. They are not always democratic organizations. Much too often they are dominated and controlled by individuals who are actuated by the desire to further their own selfish interests. The rights of the individual members for whose benefit the union is supposed to exist, are too often ignored or trampled under foot. The mechanics of labor organizations are such as to frequently enable unworthy persons to install themselves into positions of trust and leadership and to then perpetuate themselves in office.

The situation of my own local union, while not by any means an isolated one, well illustrates the point I make.

In 1927, the then president of the International Union of Operating Engineers found his popularity waning. At a convention of his union, he secured the adoption of a resolution allowing him to appoint a committee to revise the constitution. The persons appointed on that committee were immediately given lucrative jobs in the organization, by his appointment, so that as a result thereof he dominated the committee's action. He wrote into the revised constitution a provision placing in the hands of the president, control over all local unions. He immediately appointed supervisors of these various local unions, who managed and controlled the locals under his management and direction and in accordance with his desires. These supervisors became czars.

They fixed their own salaries and their own expense accounts. They told the members what dues they should pay, when they should work and when they should not work, and themselves negotiated the contracts of employment. Graft and corruption very frequently crept in. The members were not permitted to protest. Meetings were suspended. They had no voice in the organization which fixed the terms and conditions of their employment. They were as completely subservient to the supervisors as the serfs of old were to the feudal overlords. The supervisor appointed for local union 569 was a man who is now under indictment in the criminal court of Cook County, Ill. It was intolerable for free-born Americans to live under such conditions.

Local unions of engineers in Chicago protested to the general president. As a result, their charters were revoked by autocratic executive order without notice being given, charges filed, or hearing. They were thus denied membership in the international organization. They tried to run along as independent labor organizations, composed of honest, decent, law-abiding purposeful citizens. The international organization established a new local, under the supervision of the same supervisor. The former locals repeatedly requested affiliation with the international union, and their requests were repeatedly denied, they being always referred back to the same supervisor under whose domination they could not work and retain any measure of self-respect.

Since that time the International Union of Operating Engineers has not had a convention or election. The old president died. A new president was appointed by the executive board. The membership was not consulted and the union has, during all of those years, been conducted by self-appointed, self-perpetuating officials, and the men for whose benefit the union is supposed to exist, have been denied all representation. Their only privilege has been to pay from their meager wages the dues which their self-appointed masters exacted.

Local union 150 has not had an election. The appointed supervisor is still in control.

The International Union of Operating Engineers is affiliated with the American Federation of Labor in what is known as the "building-trades department"; also affiliated are carpenters, mechanics, asphalt finishers, common laborers, and various other crafts who have to do with paving and construction work. These various units affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, under directions of the building-trades department of that organization, have taken the position that their members shall not work on jobs where union men, belonging to labor organizations not affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, are employed. As a result, these various crafts have threatened to call, and have called, strikes for the purpose of forcing members of my labor union out of employment and preventing them from obtaining employment. In other words, they have conducted a secondary boycott for the purpose of denying union men the right to work and earn a living for their families.

This condition has been brought to the attention of the president of the American Federation of Labor. We have asked repeatedly for affiliation with the American Federation of Labor and have been refused on the ground that the International Union of Operating Engineers is affiliated with the federation and no other union composed of members of the same craft can be admitted. Dennis B. Zeigler, a member of local union 569, a man against whose character there was never even a suspicion, wrote several letters to the president of the American Federation of Labor, calling attention to the situation and asking recognition of his group of union men. His plea was scornfully rejected, and within a few days after the termination of this correspondence, he was assassinated in cold blood as he walked from his office to his home.

Engineers usually work in small groups. A paving job, a building project, or a sewer construction usually employees from 2 to 3 to 20 men on each job. On numerous occasions when it was attempted to force the discharge of our men by these secondary strikes above-mentioned, protests have been filed with the regional labor board. It disclaimed jurisdiction. They referred us to the National Labor Relations Board, where the matter has been pending, without action of any kind, for many, many months, because of its claim that there is no law for the enforcement of section 7 (a) of the N. I. R. A.

I should like to present to the committee the full detailed facts of the situation, supported by copies of the correspondence with the president of the American Federation of Labor; and by affidavits of the men who have been persecuted and starved because of their desire to belong to a representative labor union, and their refusal to affiliate with a racketeer, dominated organization controlled exclusively by self-appointed leaders. But the recital above made, without detail or embellishment, will certainly demonstrate the necessity of some provision in the act for the control and supervision of labor organizations and the protection of members against ruthless usurpation.

This cannot be accomplished by local enactment. Groups affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, and local political factions are too involved and too well entrenched to permit rectification from that source. Again, such control and supervision, if possible, would not be effective, for we have frequently been confronted with this situation: our members have been employed on a local project. The international union has demanded the discharge of our men, under the threat that unless their demand is complied with, work done by the employer in other States will be interrupted by strikes. Thus, in our complex industrial fabric supervision of labor unions, to be effective must be under the auspices of the National Government.

Let us consider for a minute the helpless situation that faces us by the enactment of paragraph 3 of section 7 of Senate bill 1958. Other provisions of the act preserves the right to strike, without qualification. Our men are employed on a paving job. The building trades department of the American Federation of Labor orders the laborers, the teamsters, the asphalt finishers, or any other craft, to refuse to work with our men because we are not affiliated with the American Federation of Labor. A strike is called. The contractor is losing the use of his equipment. The salaries of his foremen go on. His material has been purchased. The demurrage is piling up. A penalty perhaps is provided if the work is not completed within a definite time.

So he has no alternative other than to discharge our men. Men affiliated with the American Federation of Labor are called in. Their supervisor comes around. He insists that as a condition of work a contract be entered into that no engineer will be employed unless a member of his particular local union, and paragraph 3 of section 7 permits that and forecloses our men from ever obtaining employment.

We are then forced to starve, or to affiliate ourselves with the other union, regardless of how obnoxious to American ideals and principles it may be. And then, we have no assurance that we can get into the other union. Labor organizations very frequently close their charters, they charge prohibitive initiation fees, they impose conditions that cannot be met, and this act makes all of that possible.

Men must be given a choice. Minorities must be protected. The right to live must not be exploited. This is a government of all of the people, not of those only who are affiliated with the American Federation of Labor.

Labor organizations ought to be democratic. The members should have the right to select their own officials and formulate their own policies. If only those who are members of organized labor have the right to work, and this act would force every employee in America into some union, then the union should be forced to accept every person into membership, under equitable, possible, and self-respecting conditions.

I therefore suggest that Senate bill 1958 be amended to include the following provisions:

1. That no labor organization shall be recognized as such, unless it is officered by men who have been selected by the membership, at an election whereat each member had a right to vote; that such election shall be under the Australian ballot system and under the supervision of the Government, so that a fair count may be had and so that ballot frauds may be prosecuted and punished. (It has been the practice in some labor unions for many years, for the officials to perpetuate themselves in office by fraudulent tabulation of ballots.)

2. That minorities shall have the right to bargain through representatives of their choice and that no employee shall be discharged from, or denied employment by reason of his failure to affiliate with any particular labor union.

3. That local autonomy shall be requisite in every labor union having local units, in regard to all matters of purely local concern.

4. That no strike shall be permitted by any labor organization, or the members thereof, for the purpose of forcing the discharge or preventing the employment of men belonging to any other labor union.

5. That no person of good moral character shall be denied membership in any labor union, except on the ground that he is not qualified to perform the work usually done by the members of that labor union, and if denied, he shall have the right to appeal to some Government body, whose decision shall be final.

6. That any federation of unions, county, State-wide, or national in scope, shall not deny affiliation to any other labor union which qualifies under this act.

It is my judgment that if an act, such as Senate bill 1958, is passed, it must be broad enough to encompass the entire subject. It must be explicit enough to protect the interests of all. It must guard against injury to any.

In closing, I call the committee's attention to the fact that a labor organization occupies a very important place in American life. In it men have invested their all—their most sacred possession—the right to work and earn a living for their family. This right should be protected with much more care and concern than wealth already accumulated. There is nothing so important as the sacred right to live.

I invite the committee's careful consideration of the suggestions made. I believe they are necessary for the protection of fundamental rights.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Herewith find copy of lettergram dispatched by me today. It is difficult to understand why the Wagner labor disputes bill refrains from defining what constitutes a "strike", and what limitations are to be imposed upon individual and/or concerted action in furtherance of what the persons acting conceive to be a "strike." Any interference with a strike by whatever authority or person, whether a public official or not has always been anathema to organized labor. If my recollection is correct, President Cleveland was denounced for invoking the United States Army in the Pullman strike to insure the movement of United States mail. Calvin Coolidge was threatened with political extinction when he injected the authority of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts into the Boston police strike, to preserve public safety. What would have been the situation then had the Wagner labor disputes bill been in force? It seems to me that section 15 attempts to justify and legalize any alleged strike no matter against what person or authority aimed and regardless of the ensuing result.

It has been pointed out to me that section 2, paragraph 2, exempts the United States, or any State or political subdivision thereof or any person subject to the Railway Labor Act as amended from time to time, or any labor organization, or anyone acting in the capacity of officer or agent of such labor organization. That exemption applies only to the direct impositions or exactions of the bill. If such were not the case there would be no need for section 15. It is because exemptions have been recited and established that it becomes necessary to emphasize that these exemptions do not qualify or in any way limit the right to strike. It seems fairly to follow that the right to strike is an inalienable right and any person whether representing the Government or any Government agency whether Federal, State, or of some subdivision, lays himself liable to the same criticism and reprehension that inevitably befalls any person acting in private or corporate capacity who attempts to interfere with any alleged strike, its effectuation or consequences.

Emphasizing this viewpoint, there was presented to the House, so I understand, a resolution, H. J. 141, the purpose of which was to prohibit or limit the use of United States Army equipment by National Guard units "for any purpose in connection with any labor dispute or controversy." Whether it was passed or not I do not know. The fact of its presentation indicates a disposition and perhaps intent to make the right to strike the dominant and absolute personal right.

Therefore, this very important right to strike should be most explicitly defined; and the nature and texture of the strike itself must be defined. To what extent can a body of strikers or of pseudo strikers go in attempt to enforce their demands? To what extent can Federal or other public authority be estopped from effective immediate action to insure public safety and to preserve public health? To what extent can a group of dissatisfied workers go to compell a majority who want to work to desist? According to my interpretation of reports of the recent so called "textile strike", disorders arose, not from any attempt to prevent people from striking, but from attempt to dissuade from working those who wanted to continue at their jobs undisturbed. Why should it be possible for any body of persons to impose its economic desires or convictions upon dissenters through instrumentality of motorcades and offer or implication of violence?

There are so many conceptions and implications concerning what constitutes a strike and what is involved in the right to strike that explicit definition is imperative. There is great hazard to society, to industry, to workers both organized and unorganized in the vague, indefinite understanding of everybody's rights and duties in a strike; where and when a strike ends and breach of peace begins and as to the unqualified right and obligation of constituted authority to curb and suppress any breach of peace regardless of whether or not the steps taken adversely affect the interests of strikers or of the employer who may be subject to the strike.

What is really required is the enactment of legislation that is patterned after or counterpart of the British Trades Disputes and Trade Union Act of 1927. That distinctly defines the various factors involved; it also establishes the right of nonstrikers to work without molestation.

Respectfully,

EDWIN C. SMITH, President.

Section 2 of Wagner labor disputes bill defines almost every factor in labor disputes. It omits definition of term strike. Section 15 guarantees practically untrammelled freedom in right to strike. What is right to strike? Is a strike the voluntary cessation of work or does right to strike include right to order those to quit who want to work, and is such right enforceable by motorcades or other show of forces? Can a strike be called or a strike order enforced which imperils, or may tend to imperil, or to obstruct the preservation of law and order and public safety, or the operation of any Government function? Can any Government authority, Federal, State, or municipal be restricted or restrained from invoking any usual agency of law enforcement, civil or military, to maintain public safety and continuity of Government

Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: By way of introduction, this corporation has, even under present depressed conditions in our industry about 7,000 employees, and therefore is vitally interested in all legislation pertaining to labor relations.

We strongly oppose the enactment of the so-called "Wagner labor relations bill", S. 1958, our objections to its provisions being as follows:

It will encourage and create industrial strife and will defeat the very purpose all should endeavor to accomplish, namely, harmony between employer and employee.

It legalizes the closed shop in industry. This has been rejected time and time again by both American labor and industry.

It nullifies all relationship between employer and employee based on employees' representation plans. Millions of workers throughout the United States have for years successfully conducted their relations with their employers through such plans or in an individual way, to the mutual benefit and respect of all concerned.

It establishes the doctrine of majority rule in representation for purposes of collective bargaining, and denies to a minority, no matter how large such minority may be, the right of representation.

It restricts the meeting on common ground of employer and employee. Nowhere does it restrict in any way coercion of employees by fellow employees or labor representatives.

We recommend, therefore, and strongly urge your committee to report unfavorably on this bill.

Respectfully submitted,

E. T. STANNARD.

LEEDS & NORTHRUP COOPERATIVE ASSOCIATION,
Philadelphia, Pa., March 27, 1935.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
Chairman Senate Committee on Education and Labor,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: The proposed labor disputes bill (S. 1958) has attracted the attention of the employees of the Leeds & Northrup Co. A secret ballot taken among our 700 employees has shown them to be overwhelmingly in favor of the sentiments expressed in this letter. We are writing, therefore, to ask that you remove from the present bill all clauses which tend to hamper the form of employee organization which we have found peculiarly suited to our needs. We request that this letter be entered upon the record of the hearing now being conducted before your committee.

The Leeds & Northrup Cooperative Association is an organization composed of all employees of the Leeds & Northrup Co., Philadelphia, Pa., manufacturers of measuring instruments and control equipments. The Cooperative Association was formed in 1918, and has functioned without interruption since then. Every employee of the company is a voting member. The legislative and executive powers of the association are vested in a council composed of elected representatives. This council represents the employees in all their relations with management. Business considered by council in investigated through the medium of standing and special committees, appointed partially from council and partially from the association at large.

Council considers problems relating to wages, hours, safety, working conditions, and any other matters which concern the employees. It deals not only with general company policies which affect all employees but also with individual grievances. In addition, it supervises the operation of a pension plan, a savings plan, an unemployment relief fund, an educational plan and an athletic association. It is consistently consulted by management in the development of all policies affecting the employees.

The activities outlined above are conducted primarily for the benefit of the employees. However by promoting satisfactory relations between the employer and employee, they react indirectly to the distinct benefit of the company. Therefore, from the time the association was organized 17 years ago, it has been mutually agreed between employees and management that support of the association is a legitimate company expense. The company has always permitted meetings to be held on company time and has contributed other financial support. Membership in the association is without expense to the individual employees. Although the association receives financial and other support from the company, we wish to emphasize that our company makes no attempt to dominate the association, nor to influence its decisions in any way.

The election of officers and members of council is by secret ballot under the sole supervision of a committee appointed by council, without either direct or indirect influence on the part of management. Management is not represented at the meetings of council. Therefore, council's discussions and decisions are free from management influence. Council is at liberty to make recommendations based solely upon the employees' viewpoints, and has shown no hesitancy in so doing. Recommendations originating in council and counterproposals to management proposals have, in most cases, been accepted by management. In all cases where management has not immediately accepted a recommendation of council, a compromise agreement, satisfactory to the majority of the employees, has ultimately been reached.

The above is a brief description of the form of employee representation which we are anxious to continue. It appears to us that the proposed bill would prohibit or restrict our organization in certain respects as follows:

1. Section 8, paragraph (2) provides that it shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer to contribute financial or other support. Our experience proves that the contribution of financial or other support by an employer does not necessarily constitute domination or interference with the administration of an employee organization. We urge that some way be found to permit such support when rendered in good faith, without attempt at coercion.

2. As we understand section 9, paragraph (b), the National Labor Relations Board is granted unrestricted power to decide the type of collective bargaining organization by which a given group of employees shall be represented. Apparently the Board would be authorized to assign employees to one type of organization or another without consulting them, or without regard to their expressed wishes. We believe that the choice of representation should rest with each group of employees and not with the Board. In our own case, if we wish to maintain our own exclusive employee organization without outside affiliations, we believe that we have the inherent right to be so represented. We think the bill should be modified in such a way that choice of the unit or units for employee representation can be selected by each group of employees, without interference or dictation by the National Labor Relations Board.

In addition to the two clauses specifically cited, we believe that the interpretation of other clauses would tend to prevent our form of employee organization from functioning as it has in the past. Last year you questioned our delegates about the details of this method of representation. Its salient features are reviewed in this letter. The Leeds & Northrup employee plan received national recognition in 1931 when it won first award in a contest conducted by Forbes Magazine. It is known as "a model of employer-employee relationship." But more important, our employees want to retain it because they believe it gives them better representation than they could obtain by other means.

We again call attention to our long and successful record and ask that you find some way to modify the various provisions of the labor disputes bill (S. 1958) so that the method of employee representation which we have found so satisfactory can continue.

Very truly yours,

LEEDS & NORTHRUP COOPERATIVE ASSOCIATION,
J. E. WHISLER, President.

LEVY & DRETCHKO,
Minneapolis, March 23, 1935.

Re: Wagner labor disputes bill.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
Chairman Senate Committee on Education and Labor,
Senate Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I am addressing this letter to you as chairman of the committee before which is now pending the so-called "Wagner labor disputes bill."

On account of inability of making a personal appearance, I respectfully request that this communication be delivered to your committee and that the same be incorporated in the printed record of the hearings.

Minneapolis has had its share, and more, of major strikes and labor disturbances during the past year. Throughout these difficulties I represented the employers, hence I know whereof I speak.

The declared principle of the Wagner bill is "to promote equality of bargaining power between employers and employees, to diminish the causes of labor disputes, to create a National Labor Relations Board, and for other purposes."

The bill in its present form and without material necessary amendments, will not carry out the declared policy and purposes and objects of the bill, but on the contrary will lead, in my opinion, to a widening of the field of industrial conflict. It will not serve to promote amicable collective bargaining between employer and employee, but leaves the way open for constant misinterpretation, dissension, litigation, and intensification of bad feeling.

No doubt in these hearings the attention of your committee will be called to the inequitable provisions of the various sections and subsections of the bill directly and with marked attention to what the results would be if those sections were allowed to remain as they are, without amendment, clarification, or elimination.

It is not my purpose in making this written statement to your committee, to discuss these various sections separately, nor to impress my views as to the legality thereof, the workability of the various provisions, nor the advisability of present legislation couched in language such as is found in this bill.

My purpose and object in addressing you at this time is to request that this bill, if the same is finally approved in its present or an amended form, be substantially enlarged by making its provisions applicable to labor as well as to industry, so that a repetition of conditions referred to hereafter may never occur again, if industry and labor are to be required to operate under some form of administrative control such as is contemplated by this bill.

In its present form, and no matter how one reads its various provisions, we can come to but one conclusion, and that is that the bill is wholly one-sided, its provisions applying to employers alone, and having no application, obligation, restriction, liability, or responsibility resting upon the employees, binding them under any control by any of the provisions of the bill.

In the middle of May 1934, Minneapolis suffered from a vicious strike of truck drivers. After several days of practically civil warfare, the Minneapolis-St. Paul Regional Labor Board assumed a jurisdiction of the controversy, summoned employers and employees to a hearing before that board, conducted hearings and handed down a decree to settle that strike. After an inspection of the decree, the employers, 100 percent, accepted its terms and filed written consent to be bound.

The strikers, consisting of very few employees in number, but augmented by the ranks of unemployed, Communists, and other agitators, held a mass meeting where they unanimously rejected this decree of the labor board and refused to be bound by its terms. The strike continued for another few days.

Then the Governor of the State stepped into the picture and through negotiations with the employers and their attorneys, with the Governor acting as sponsor for the strikers, a stipulation for a modification of that decree was arrived at. A written sitpulation was signed by all the interested parties, filed with the regional labor board, and on May 31, 1934, the regional labor board handed down its amended decree, embodying the terms of the agreed stipulation, and by that amended decree, the strike was ended.

This stipulation and the order of May 31, 1934, contemplated, provided for, and fully covered each and every item that was in dispute at the inception of and during the strike. The order provided for returning men to work; provided for recognition of section 7 (a); contained provisions against discrimination on account of union membership, protected seniority rights, provided for an arbitration of wage scale and conditions of employment, hours of labor were determined and agreed upon, and a continuance of a then-existing minimum scale of wages was agreed upon for the period of 1 year, or until or unless arbitration upward or downward took place.

The employers and the employees and the public hailed this stipulated adjustment as having fully settled and adjusted the difficulties with respect to this strike, and industrial peace and security for Minneapolis industry and Minneapolis citizens was expected to follow.

Notwithstanding this situation the Truck Drivers' Union later refused to recognize rulings and interpretations of the local board with respect to this order of May 31, and by agitation, mass meetings, false and malicious charges and propaganda, successfully induced and procured a second strike, commencing the middle of July 1934, lasting some 3 weeks and causing a disastrous loss to Minneapolis business institutions.

Within a day or two after the commencement of the July strike, the National Labor Relations Board sent representatives here. These representatives were informed of the existence of the order of May 31, were furnished with copies of same, were notified that the employers stood ready to carry out each and every provision of that order. They were further notified that the Truck Drivers' Union did not, in truth and in fact, represent the employees in a majority of the affected firms and they were asked to immediately conduct an election to determine representation.

These representatives threw up their hands and frankly admitted that there was no power in either the National Labor Relations Board or the local board to enforce the decree of May 31, 1934, nor to cause employees who had theretofore been receiving the benefits of that order, to comply with its terms and to carry out the same.

As a result of the lack of power existing in any board to compel both sides to an observance of this order, this strike in Minneapolis continued for more than 3 weeks. Again open warfare was present; martial rule was declared. Finally another adjustment, on practically the same identical terms, was worked out, and another order was made by the regional labor board; and then the second strike ended.

In addition to these truck-driver strikes, I have been before the regional labor board in connection with many other matters. My observation of the workings of this board leads to but one conclusion and that is that because the National Labor Board, its successor, the National Labor Relations Board, and the local boards have the handicap of lack of power, none of these boards can effectively or successfully handle labor disputes. Any attempted conclusion of a labor dispute by or through any of these agencies is simply temporizing with the situation and does not effectively settle the issues involved for either side.

Assuming that this present session of Congress will pass some form of labor disputes bill, I believe that such bill must, if it is to be of any value whatsoever, be equal in its force and effect as binding upon employer and employee alike, and that employees must be bound to a performance of their obligations under such a bill with the same force and effect and as firmly as the employers are bound. Employers are always bound by force of public opinion and by the threatened loss of the "blue eagle", but so far there has been no legislation presented which in any manner binds employees as well as employers, the sole object of attack being directed always against industry.

It is absolutely essential, if industrial peace is to be had and maintained, that this bill be so amended, modified and added to by proper and appropriate wording, so that it will provide for at least the following:

(a) Imposing the same restrictions, liabilities, and responsibilities upon employees and their representatives, as are chargeable to and bind the employers.

(b) Providing for such means of enforcement of its decrees as will enable both the national and local boards to carry out a strict enforcement of decrees against employer and employee alike, and which will prevent the flaunting of decrees and adjusted disputes if, as, and when agitators take over the situation and advise and compel employees to ignore or defy such decrees.

(c) Defining what are unfair labor practices on the part of employees, or their representatives, as well as on the part of employers.

(d) Stating in definite terms that nothing in any of the provisions of the act are intended to compel any employee to join a labor organization or any other organization.

I sincerely trust that the members of your committee, having the interest of the public at heart, and earnestly desiring to maintain industrial peace, will take the Minneapolis history as a means and guide for proper additions, amendments, and supplements to this or some other bill which will tend to promote and not to destroy the harmonious relationship between industry and labor, which must exist if business recovery is to be had.

For your information I enclose herewith a pamphlet which was prepared some time shortly subsequent to the two truck drivers' strikes above referred to, and which gives the history of these strikes, and to which is appended the various decrees of the local regional labor board which, upon inspection, will bear out what I have stated in this letter.

I will thank you for the courtesy of seeing that this communication is presented to the committee and properly incorporated in printed hearings as above requested.

Yours very truly,

LEVY & DRETCHKO,

STATEMENT ON BEHALF OF MEMBERS OF THE LINOLEUM AND FELT-BASE MANUFACTURING INDUSTRY IN OPPOSITION TO THE PENDING NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS ACT TO CREATE A NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD

This statement, in opposition to this bill, is submitted on behalf of the members of the linoleum and felt-base manufacturing industry whose names appear on the list annexed hereto.

The various plants of this industry vary in size, some employing a small number of employees, others a greater number, and in some instances several thousand employees. Depending upon the location of the particular plant, the customs and habits of the employees, and all the surrounding circumstances, different methods of dealing with employment conditions, individually and collectively, have been used. These methods, developed through a long period of years, with great care and much expense, have adequately safeguarded the welfare of all the employees in every way. Problems affecting employment relations have been amicably and satisfactorily considered and determined, fairly and equitably to all interested parties.

* * * * * * *

This proposed bill has been carefully considered and the members of this industry are opposed to its passage for the reasons herein generally and specifically stated.

* * * * * * *

BASIC REASONS FOR OPPOSITION

This bill is legally invalid. Its provisions cannot be reconciled with any of the decisions of the United States Supreme Court interpreting those phases of the Federal Constitution defining and limiting the powers of Congress in matters relating to commerce, impairment or limitation of the freedom of contract, reasonable search and seizure, deprivation of property without due process, fair trial by jury, preservation of State rights and powers, and the general welfare.

The bill is unsound in theory and incapable of practical application. It is based upon irreconcilable and contradictory ideas and terms, such as compulsory collective bargaining. It seeks to outlaw certain acts and conduct on the part of employers, and such acts are condemned in terms not susceptible of definite ascertainment or specific performance and enforcement, except, if legal, that they can be enforced through an arbitrary decision of the labor board, whose decisions are to be final and conclusive on the facts, put into a record where rules of evidence to insure a fair trial need not be applied nor followed. The employer could not at any time know in advance whether he was acting in accordance with or in violation of this proposed law. He and his employees, who might not approve of the principles advocated by the representatives of the majority of employees, are deprived of virtually all freedom in dealing with employment conditions. The declaration of policy declares in favor of "full freedom", by the worker, of association, self-organization, and designation of representatives of his own choosing for collective bargaining. The bill specifically limits that "full freedom" and individual choosing, by subjecting the freedom and judgment of employers and minority employees to the dictates of the representatives of the majority of the employees. The board has the power to determine which organized unit shall be recognized for purposes of collective bargaining, and under its own rules of procedure may certify what representatives have been designated or selected.

The declaration of policy in section 1 of the bill does not contain an accurate statement of the true contents and full purport of the provisions of the bill itself. They are in conflict. It is not merely a measure to establish and preserve equality of opportunity in bargaining, through the protection of the right to fairly and freely organize. It is not simply an attempt to compel parties to negotiate (bargain) collectively; in operation it is designed to force the making of agreements. The unfair labor practices apply only to the employer; no conduct of employees or their organizations, as regards their interfering, restraining other employees in associating, and organizing for collective bargaining purposes, and selecting their own representatives, is defined as fair or condemned as unfair.

The bill would not equalize the bargaining power of the respective parties. It would not promote the free flow of interstate commerce, but would engender strife and discord, and create a fertile field for endless litigation. I undertakes to apply compulsion where coercion cannot be applied, and that too in an illegal manner.

COMMERCE

The decisions of the United States Supreme Court are unanimous to the effect that factory labor is intrastate commerce, and is exclusively within the jurisdiction of the States and not the Federal Government. It is urged that collective bargaining is an instrumentality necessary to provide for the free flow of interstate commerce, and hence within the power of Congress to regulate, under the clause of the Constitution which gives Congress power to regulate interstate commerce. An instrumentality which is a necessary part of interstate equipment and essential to its operation, or an operation which necessarily and substantially affects admittedly interstate transactions, will be regarded as a part of the interstate commerce. But that which is incidental to it, or remote, has been reserved to the States.

The United States Supreme Court, without exception, has said that manufacture and mining are not interstate commerce. The Shreveport case and the so-called "Packers cases", contain nothing to the contrary.

Section 2, paragraphs (6) and (8) of the bill define "commerce" and the term "affecting commerce." These definitions add nothing to the power of Congress. Since Gibbons v. Ogden, decided by Chief Justice John Marshall in 1824, 110 years ago, the Supreme Court has decided innumerable cases involving this same issue as to what "affects" interstate commerce. The character of interstate commerce cannot be changed by adding such a qualifying word. There is nothing bizarrely new in the word "affects" in this connection. To be candid, and in the interest of passing a valid law, one should look askance and with misgivings upon any proposal which plumes itself on novelty, when dealing with the constitutional characteristics of interstate commerce. "Truth changes her garments frequently (like every seemly lady), but underneath the new habit she always remains the same."

Strikes are not new; it is not proposed to outlaw them; nor prevent them by compulsory arbitration or compulsory agreements covering issues out of which a strike might result. It is proposed to induce and limit collective bargaining, and thereby, as claimed, obviate a possible strike or lockout which would possibly prevent continued manufacture. This possible cessation or impairment of manufacture is what the bill vaguely terms as creating "further obstacles to the free flow of commerce", and that the proximate cause is a refusal to negotiate (bargain) collectively and exclusively with designated representatives of a majority of the employees. Certainly, if goods are not produced they cannot later be shipped across State lines. Section 15 of the bill says: "Nothing in this act shall be construed so as to interfere with or impede or diminish in any way the right to strike." That is reassurance in the broadest terms of an existing right. There is nothing about the right to close a plant, yet, if it were done, is there any assurance that the employer would not be charged with "interfering, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of their rights to organize, choose representatives for collective bargaining, and other mutual aid or protection", as an unfair labor practice?

There is no real or well-founded apprehension that there will not be an abundance of goods produced and shipped, if those who are willing to work are permitted to do so without interference. The whole idea about compelling collective bargaining in employment relations to provide for the free flow of commerce, is too remote and speculative to be seriously considered as being a part of interstate commerce.

This bill is based upon the assumption that the denial of the opportunity to bargain collectively would be the cause of strikes which would interfere with the free flow of interstate commerce by preventing continued manufacture of goods. This is precisely the view adopted by the Federal Circuit Court of Appeals in the United Leather Workers International Union v. Herkert et al. (1922) (284 Fed. Rep. 446), but which was reversed by the United States Supreme Court. The conspiracy charged was that by too many pickets, assaults, threats, and intimidation of employees, the plaintiffs were prevented from manufacturing and selling goods in interstate commerce. The Federal Circuit Court of Appeals stated:

"It is contended that because manufacture is not commerce, and is not interstate commerce, the restriction or prevention of the manufacture of articles which by interstate commerce contracts and transactions, sellers have agreed to sell, make, transport to, and deliver in other States, and the prevention of existing interstate commerce in such articles in this way is not remediable by Federal courts under the antitrust act.

"It is true that manufacture alone is not interstate commerce. But it is equally true that when manufacture becomes an essential part of an indispensable step in the execution of an interstate commerce contract or transaction, or in the continuously flowing current of interstate commerce, as such manufacture was and is in this case, it becomes a part of, or step in, that interstate commerce to such an extent that a Federal court of equity is vested with the power and is subject to the duty to enjoin the execution of a combination or conspiracy to prevent, or practically prevent, the performance of such contracts, or to prevent or drastically restrict such interstate commerce by preventing the manufacture which constitutes one of its indispensable, intermediate steps or parts. While manufacture alone is not interstate commerce, neither is buying or selling, or contracting to buy or sell the goods, or loading or packing or shipping the goods, when considered by itself alone, interstate commerce; yet, each and all of these may become parts of and steps in interstate commerce, and when they shall become the restriction or prevention of these steps, which has the necessarily intended, direct and inevitable effect of stopping or drastically restraining that interstate commerce by the execution of the conspiracy to restrain or destroy it, may be lawfully enjoined by the Federal court."

Upon an exhaustive review of the above decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals, the United States Supreme Court, through Chief Justice Taft, reversed the above decision of the lower court and stated the following ((1924) 265 U. S. 457):

"While the bill averred that the defendants had instituted a boycott against the complainants and were prosecuting the same by illegal methods, there was no evidence whatever that any attempt was made to boycott the sale of the complainants' products in other States, or anywhere, or to interfere with their interstate shipments of goods ready to ship.

"The sole question here is whether a strike against manufacturers by their employees, intended by the strikers to prevent through illegal picketing and intimidation, continued manufacture, and having such effect, was a conspiracy to restrain interstate commerce under the Antitrust Act because such products when made were, to the knowledge of the strikers, to be shipped in interstate commerce to fill orders given and accepted by would-be purchasers in other States, in the absence of evidence that the strikers interfered or attempted to interfere with the free transport and delivery of the products when manufactured from the factories to their destination in other States, or with their sale in those States.

"We think that this question has already been answered in the negative by this Court. (Citing United Mine Workers v. Coronado Co., 259 U. S. 344.)

"This review of the cases makes it clear that the mere reduction in the supply of an article to be shipped in interstate commerce, by the illegal or tortious prevention of its manufacture is ordinarily an indirect and remote obstruction of that commerce. It is only when the intent or necessary effect upon such commerce in the article is to enable those preventing the manufacture to monopolize the supply, control its price, or discriminate as between its would-be purchasers that the unlawful interference with its manufacture can be said directly to burden interstate commerce.

"The record is entirely without evidence or circumstances to show that the defendants in their conspiracy to deprive the complainants of their workers were thus directing their scheme against interstate commerce. It is true that they were, in this labor controversy, hoping that the loss of business in selling goods would furnish a motive to the complainants to yield to demands in respect to the terms of employment; but they did nothing which in any way directly interfered with the interstate transportation or sales of the complainants' product.

"We concur with the dissenting judge in the Circuit Court of Appeals when, in speaking of the conclusion of the majority, he said: 'The natural, logical, and inevitable result will be that every strike in any industry or even in any single factory will be within the Sherman Act and subject to Federal jurisdiction provided any appreciable amount of its product enters into interstate commerce.'

"We cannot think that Congress intended any such result in the enactment of the Antitrust Act or that the decisions of this court warrant such construction.

"Decree reversed." ((1924) 265 U. S. 457.)

Also, United Mine Workers v. Coronado Coal Co. ((1922) 259 U. S. 344):

"Coal mining and the manufacture of goods is not interstate commerce, even though the coal or goods may be shipped from one State to another. Interruption of coal mining is not an interruption of interstate commerce."

The Supreme Court has been extremely favorable to labor in passing upon the more than 100 labor cases submitted to it. This is true also as regards the numerous acts passed by the States affecting conditions of employment. (See "Congress, the Constitution, and the Supreme Court", by Charles Warren, pp. 223–245.)

However, the Supreme Court has been consistent and firm in not relaxing the rule that manufacture is not interstate commerce. This is due to the fact that once the barriers are broken down, there is no force to the argument that further infringements upon the rights guaranteed to the States by the Constitution would not result. Violation of State rights is the ground upon which most of the cases have been decided by the Court. Fifty-three acts of Congress were declared unconstitutional in 135 years (1789 to 1924). From 1789 to 1864, 75 years, two acts were held invalid. From 1906 to 1924, 19 years, 23 laws were held to be unconstitutional. During the last few months two acts of Congress were held invalid; as many as during the first 75 years of the country.

The increase in the last 20 years in the number of acts declared unconstitutional has been due largely to the vast increase of Federal interference into matters of State concern by Federal statutes. The Supreme Court has passed upon the constitutionality of State statutes involving labor legislation, and has upheld those statutes in more than 60 of such cases, and the variety and radical nature of many of those statutes, as sustained, is quite remarkable.

As illustrative of the importance which the Court has attached to the necessity of preserving the rights of States to legislate concerning conditions of employment in factory, the following may be cited:

"Every feature of our Government, both State and National, proved that the people were sensible of restraining as well the headlong impetuosity of the multitude as the inordinate ambition of the few. Where such restraint was not improved, there was no genuine liberty." (John Randolph, of Virginia, in the House, Nov. 13, 1807.)

"No action (Bill of Rights) ever taken by Congress is more clearly the result of a general demand for limitations on legislative power, to be enforceable through a judiciary. The genesis of this National Bill of Rights should be most carefully studied by liberals and radicals in this country today, for they are the very persons most likely to stand in need of the protection intended to be guaranteed by this portion of the Constitution." ("Congress, the Constitution, in the Supreme Court", by Charles Warren, p. 76.)

"It (the Constitution) was an economic document, drawn with superb skill, by men whose property interests were immediately at stake; and as such, it appealed directly and unerringly to identical interests in the country at large." ("Economic Interpretation of the Constitution", 1913, by Charles A. Beard, p. 188.)

"Men on all sides contended that, while the first object of the Constitution was to establish a Government, its second object, equally important, must be to protect the people against the Government. That was something which all history and all human experience had taught." ("Congress, the Constitution, and the Supreme Court", by Charles Warren, p. 79.)

"Having protected themselves by specific restrictions on the power of their State legislatures, the people in this country were in no mood to set up and accept a new National Government, without similar checks and restraints." (Id., p. 79.)

"The declaration of the Constitution against the power of a State is paramount, not to be * * * bent to some impulse or emergency because of some accident or immediate or overwhelming interest which appeals to the feelings and distorts the judgment." (Holmes, J. dissenting, in Northern Securities Co. v. United States (1904) 193 U. S. 400.)

This last quotation applies with equal force to the limitations upon the power of the National Congress, and history and court decisions are replete with instances designed to limit authority in the National Government by preserving to the States the rights guaranteed to them.

"An elective despotism was not the Government we fought for." (Thomas Jefferson.)

"In every government there must be somewhat fundamental, somewhat like a Magna Carta which would be standing unalterable * * *. To what assurance is a law * * * if it be in the same legislature to unlaw it again? Is such a law likely to be lasting? It will be a rope of sand; it will give no security, for the same men may unbuild what they have built." (Oliver Cromwell, 1654.)

"Chief of the possible evils of a republican form of government is the danger of the majority oppressing the minority." (George Mason, of Virginia, in the Federal Convention.)

If this bill be valid, Congress could regulate all business, and State governments would be almost superfluous. For the effect of this bill the following United States court opinion is important:

"No distinction is more popular to the common mind, or more clearly expressed in economic and political literature, than that between manufacture and commerce. Manufacture is transformation—the fashioning of raw materials into a change of form for use. The functions of commerce are different. The buying and selling and the the transportation incidental thereto constitute commerce; and the regulation of commerce in the constitutional sense embraces the regulation at least of such transportation * * *. If it be held that the term includes the regulation of all such manufactures as are intended to be the subject of commercial transactions in the future, it is impossible to deny that it would also include all productive industries that contemplate the same thing. The result would be that Congress would be invested, to the exclusion of the States, with the power to regulate, not only manufacturers, but also agriculture, horticulture, stock raising, domestic fisheries, mining—in short, every branch of human industry. For is there one of them that does not contemplate, more or less clearly, an interstate or foreign market? Does not the wheat grower of the Northwest or the cotton planter of the South plant, cultivate, and harvest his crop with an eye on the prices at Liverpool, New York, and Chicago? The power being vested in Congress and denied to the States, it would follow as an inevitable result that the duty would devolve on Congress to regulate all of these delicate, multiform, and vital interests—interests which in their nature are and must be local in all details of their successful management: The demands of such a supervision would require, not uniform legislation generally applicable throughout the United States, but a swarm of statutes only locally applicable and utterly inconsistent. Any movement toward the establishment of rule of production in this vast country, with its many different climates and opportunities, could only be at the sacrifice of the peculiar advantage of a large part of the localities in it, if not of every one of them. On the other hand, any movement toward the local, detailed, and incongruous legislation required by such interpretation would be about the widest possible departure from the declared object of the clause in question. Nor this alone. Even in the exercise of the power contended for, Congress would be confined to the regulation, not of certain branches of industry, however numerous, but to those instances in each and every branch where the producer contemplated an interstate market. These instances would be almost infinite, as we have seen; but still there would always remain the possibility, and often it would be the case, that the producer contemplated a domestic market. In that case the supervisory power must be executed by the State; and the interminable trouble would be presented, that whether the one power or the other should exercise the authority in question would be determined, not by any general or intelligible rule, but by the secret and changeable intention of the producer in each and every act of production. A situation more paralyzing to the State governments, and more provocative of conflicts between the General Government and the States, and less likely to have been what the framers of the Constitution intended, it would be difficult to imagine." Coe v. Errol, 116 U. S. 525.)

"It can hardly be said that a combination in restraint of what is interstate commerce does not directly affect and burden that commerce. The error into which the circuit court fell, it seems to us, was in not observing the difference between the regulating power of Congress over contracts and negotiations for sales of goods to be delivered across State lines, and that over the merchandise, the subject of such sales and negotiations. The goods are not within the control of Congress until they are in actual transit from one State to another." (United States v. Addyston Pile & Steel Co., 85 Fed. 271.)

RIGHTS OF EMPLOYEES

Section 7 of the bill gives employees the right to organize and bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing. New legislation is not necessary for the creation of those rights on behalf of the employees. However, those general rights, as set forth in this section 7, are limited by succeeding provisions of the bill, particularly section 9 (a), which prevent employers and minority employees from bargaining collectively except through the representatives of the majority of the employees.

Section 8 defines unfair labor practices and these unfair labor practices apply only to the employer; they do not apply to any of the employees or employee organizations. It is therefore declared unlawful for an employer "to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in section 7 * * * to dominate or interfere with the formation or administration of any labor organization or contribute financially or give support to it * * *. By discrimination in regard to hire or tender of employment or any term or condition of employment to encourage or discourage membership in any labor organization. To discharge or otherwise discriminate against an employee because he has filed charges or given testimony under this act." A proviso clause permits employees or their representatives to confer with an employer during working hours without loss of time or pay. The employer is financially and otherwise responsible for his own acts and conduct. But, as a practical matter, labor unions are immune and cannot be held to strict accountability for any unlawful interference, restraint, or intimidation which might be exercised and applied to employees who may be in the minority or may not agree with the views of those claiming to represent a particular employee organization. The acts and conduct made unlawful when indulged by the employer are indefinite and uncertain and not susceptible of orderly enforcement. Complaints may be registered with the National Labor Relations Board by any person, whether well founded or without foundation. Inevitably, the condemning as unlawful by any such vague and indefinite terms will result in discord, distrust, industrial unrest, and possible disturbances and lead directly to interminable investigations and litigation.

POWERS OF THE BOARD

The powers of the Board, ostensibly, are to insure equality of bargaining power through representatives of the employees selected through the exercise of individual judgment and achieve these results through fair labor practices by attempting to prevent unfair labor practices by only the employer. The bill assumes unfairly and unreasonably that the employer alone can be guilty of such unfair labor practices. In the exercise of such ostensibly limited powers of the Board the bill provides for other great and unnecessary powers.

Section 9 (a) definitely establishes the majority-rule principle by providing that the collective bargaining shall be by the representatives of the majority of the employees in a unit appropriate for such purposes, and they shall be the exclusive representatives of all the employees in such unit for the purpose of collective bargaining in respect to rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, or other basic conditions of employment.

The Board is given power to determine the unit appropriate for the purpose of collective bargaining and the Board may investigate and certify the name or names of the representatives that have been designated or selected.

The Board is given power to issue complaints, pass upon the charges filed, and require an employer to appear before the Board or any agency it may designate within not less than 3 days after the service of the complaint. In the conducting of such hearings the Board or designated agency is not required to observe the rules of evidence prevailing in courts of law or equity. Upon the evidence submitted the Board can make its findings of fact and issue orders to cease and desist from the practice complained of. In addition, the Board may issue affirmative orders requiring the doing of such things as it may deem necessary to effect the purposes of the act, including the making of restitutions and further requiring the making of reports from time to time, showing the extent to which the adjudged guilty employer has complied with the orders issued.

Amendment VII of the Constitution is:

"In suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved, and no fact tried by a jury shall be otherwise reexamined in any court of the United States than according to the rules of the common law."

This bill permits an examiner to disregard rules of evidence and thus confront an employer with hearsay evidence and rumors and compel him, based upon findings of fact by the Board, from which findings of fact there is no appeal to any court, to make payment of money. This is not due process of law within the meaning of the Federal Constitution and affords no opportunity for a jury trial. It is in direct conflict with the above-mentioned seventh amendment to the Federal Constitution.

These orders of the Board are unenforceable through the Federal courts. The bill expressly provides: "The findings of the Board as to the facts, as supported by evidence, shall be conclusive." This is not a case of delegation of authority to an administrative agency or quasi-judicial body, merely for the purpose of gathering facts. It is empowering a Board with judicial powers to issue orders and decrees and enforce the collection of money without such trial as is specifically required by the Federal Constitution.

INVESTIGATORY POWERS

The investigatorial powers of the Board are most remarkable. The Board, or its agents, will have access to and the right to copy any evidence which it may deem pertinent, subpena witnesses, require production of facts, administer oaths. Such attendance of witnesses and production of evidence may be required from any place in the United States at any designated place of a hearing. Contumacy or refusal to obey any such subpenas may be punished as a contempt of the court having jurisdiction over the matter.

In addition to all the above, several departments and agencies of the Government, when directed by the President, shall furnish the Board, upon its request, all records, papers, and information in their possession relating to any matter before the Board.

It is not constructive to pass a law so comprehensive in scope and revolutionary in character as this bill, which later necessarily will be declared invalid. Industry is confused, and is reluctant to move forward and the passage of this bill would further tend to destroy confidence in the future. The conclusion is inescapable that this proposed bill is intended to extend the regulatory powers of Congress over employment conditions, the control of which is exclusively within the rights guaranteed to the States by the Federal Constitution. It is an attempt, through the mere statement of a conclusion, to declare as being interstate commerce, operations which are not a part of interstate commerce.

It is class legislation; it arbitrarily discriminates between employers and employees. The definitions of unfair labor practices, applicable only to employers are particularly obnoxious, and, unfairly and without justification, assume that the practices condemned have been indulged only by employers and not by employees, their unions or organizations. It is not conducive to industrial peace to outlaw certain conduct in vague and equivocal terms. Under the definitions of unfair labor practices, every employer would be required to deal with his own employees regarding labor problems at his peril. By failing to impose any restrictions on labor organizations in their negotiations and dealings with other employees and their employers, the bill does not deal with the most important phase and element in the cause of industrial strife.

The arbitrary and discriminatory features of the bill are peculiarly objectionable and, instead of promoting, would positively impede the free flow of interstate commerce. In order that there may be due process under the law, it is necessary that there shall be a definite and ascertainable standard of conduct to which it is possible to conform. In a most vigorous opinion, rendered by the late Chief Justice White of the United States Supreme Court (U. S. v. Cohen Grocery Co., 255 U. S. 81), a Federal law, which prohibited in general terms profiteering during the war, was held to be unconstitutional. That law provided that it should be unlawful "to make an unjust or unreasonable rate or charge in handling or dealing in or with any necessaries." The Court held that it did not establish an ascertainable standard of guilt nor inform accused persons of the nature and cause of the accusation against them. It penalized and punished all acts detrimental to the public interest when unjust and unreasonable in the estimation of the Court and the jury. Such a statute is repugnant to the due process clause of the Constitution. The unfair labor practices of this bill are as equally indefinite and vague and do not prescribe any ascertainable standards of conduct. An employer would never know whether his customary and normal conduct might be regarded as an interference or restraint within the meaning of these defined unfair labor practices.

The broad investigatorial powers of the Board and its agents are especially objectionable. Under the slightest pretext or claim of violation of the provisions of this bill, any employer can be subpenaed and required to produce all his papers, books, and documents, which the Board may deem pertinent. Many reports, highly confidential in character, are required under various laws to be submitted by employers to different departments of the Federal overnment. Under this bill, the National Labor Relations Board, when directed by the President, may require any of those departments to produce any documents and records filed with them by employers, which the Board may consider relevant to the matter being investigated by it and expose such highly confidential and personal records in a public hearing.

This bill would not encourage collective bargaining, but would discourage it. Nor would it establish equality in bargaining relations. The imposition of the will of the representatives of the majority of the employees upon the minority of the employees is a flat contradiction of the declaration of policy of this act. Under that majority rule "the exercise by the worker of full freedom of association, self-organization, and designation of representatives of his own choosing" is not protected as the policy expressly states. That right of such "full freedom" is denied and taken away from the worker by section 9 (a) of the bill.

It is contrary to orderly government by law to clothe any board or tribunal with powers of investigation, prosecution, and judicial decision. This Labor Board may make its own rules of procedure, gather facts, disregard rules of evidence, issue injunctions and restraining orders, issue orders requiring the doing of an affirmative act, including payment of money, and the Board's decision on the facts is final.

For the reasons above set forth, this bill does not provide an appropriate method for encouraging industrial peace nor the achievement of the purposes and objects claimed for it.

Respectfully submitted.

LOUISVILLE, KY., March 24, 1935.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR WALSH: At a special meeting held on March 23, 1935, the 18 members of chapter 112, Louisville Gas & Electric Co. Employees' Association, adopted unanimously a resolution stating their disapproval of and opposition to the Wagner labor relations bill.

The members have instructed me to inform you of their sentiments.

Respectfully yours,

PAUL A. FRANK,
Secretary, Chapter 112, Louisville Gas & Electric Co. Employees' Association.

Honorable Chairman, and Members of the Senate Committee on Education and Labor:

GENTLEMEN: My name is Sidney E. Cornelius. I am the manager of the Manufacturers' Association of Hartford County, in Connecticut. I appear here in the stead of more than 100 manufacturers in Hartford County to voice for them their individual, strenuous opposition to Senate bill 1958, known as the "Labor disputes bill."

These manufacturers employ today more than 46,000 workers whose best interests would not be served by the passage of this measure.

Just about a year ago this committee extended to me the courtesy of listening to me at a hearing to oppose a bill which in substance and implication was the same as that now before us. That measure did not become law.

We feel that it is unfortunate that you should be subjected now to what amounts to a rehearing, for it must follow, naturally, in our opinion, what was wrong with the bill in principle a year ago is still wrong and objectionable. Our arguments, therefore, in general will appear to be reiteration.

However, we feel that circumstances, during the course of the past year, have provided us with substantial proof that much that we prophesied has come to pass as the result of the administration of Public Resolution No. 44, which created the present Labor Relations Board. It is our opinion, and the record bears us out, that the present board, in spite of its definitely limited scope of activity has exercised the powers which the Wagner bill of a year ago would have bestowed upon it.

Outstanding among all of the board's unauthorized decisions is that which prescribes that representatives of the majority of workers in a plant shall arbitrarily be declared the representatives of all employees. The proposed measure, which we oppose, would make this ruling law.

We respectfully urge upon your committee reflection and consideration of the strife and turmoil which that decision by the present Labor Board has occasioned throughout the country. I am fully cognizant of and sadly impressed by the instances that have occurred in my own community. This, we would point out, is so in spite of the fact that the Board's right to make such decisions was in doubt even in the minds of the union labor groups which would profit most by such a ruling, and was never accepted by members of the legal fraternity and the employers to whom they were advisers. Were that statute made to accord with the practice of the Board, the disturbances would be intensified and multiplied.

We are facing a grave crisis. I believe that frankness will serve your purpose best. I believe, gentlemen, you would prefer to have our honest opinions and views rather than innuendo.

The American Federation of Labor girded itself nearly 2 years ago for a wholesale campaign of organizing the independent worker. Section 7 (a) of the National Industrial Recovery Act was interpreted by it to serve that purpose. In spite of strenuous effort, the success of the campaign was not marked. The numerical increase in the federation's ranks announced at its last convention substantiated this. The individuality and independence of the American workman was not to be overcome by cajolery, soap-box oratory, or even insistent misrepresentation of the meaning of section 7 (a). Then the Labor Board came to the federation's assistance.

When employers, in endeavor to abide by the spirit of the law, met with committees and groups claiming to be the chosen representatives of employees, they accepted them as at least representing some of the employees and negotiations followed. Then these committees or groups, coached by organizers of the Federation of Labor, sought to have their representation accepted as exclusive for all employees in the plants. If this procedure had been followed, it would have become a comparatively simple matter to force the independent worker to affiliate with the union, else he would have no status at all. The independent worker would soon be disposed of, and the plant must inevitably become closed to all except the union's members. The acceptance of the Labor Board's majority ruling would be tantamount to agreement that such an arrangement expressed the desire of the employee and employer, which is far from being the case. Now the proponents of this bill would compel, by law, that acceptance and its inevitable results. In other words, it would impose union recognition by statute. The closed-shop agreement is authorized in this bill.

If the individual worker is thus to be deprived of his own method of dealing with his employer, he has been deprived of his constitutional rights.

Last year we challenged the premise of the bill. At that time it recited in definite language that "certain tendencies of economic life had rendered the individual, organized worker helpless to exert actual liberty of contract to secure a just reward for his service and preserve a decent standard of living." That language was so palpably subject to contradiction and the position so vulnerable that it has been changed in the present bill. No attempt is made to assert the right of actual liberty of contract of the individual. The bill before you assumes that every employee is convinced that his destiny is dependent upon his ability to associate himself with others in his employment and to have some representative, whether of his own choosing or not, speak for him and arrange for his future welfare. We contend that that is not true.

The thousands of workers employed by the manufacturers whom I represent are the highest type of American workmen. These workers for generations have dealt, as individuals, with their employers; have had their ability and merit recognized in terms of promotion or increased wages, and today enjoy that same right without the aid of paid spokesmen who have the power to tax them. From their ranks have risen most of our industrial leaders.

Hartford County manufacturing has been for years on a truly open-shop basis. The union member has not been barred from the shop. Nor has the right of the individual worker to join a union been impaired. But his labor organization has not been encouraged to the detriment of the nonunion worker. On the contrary, every worker has enjoyed a freedom of contact and a freedom to demonstrate his worthiness and ability unhampered by restrictions.

Statistics over a period of months and years demonstrate that the average hourly earning of the factory workers of Hartford County is higher than that of the average in the United States. May I remind the committee again that no union representative was needed to obtain for them this full recognition of service.

We would point out, also, that under these favorable industrial conditions for years there have been no strikes in the factories until recently.

I wonder if the originators of this bill would impugn a disregard for services rendered, on the part of manufacturers, who, even at the termination of so great a depression as we have just experienced, can point with pride to employees on pay rolls who number their term of constant employment, with the same firm, into the fifties and sixties of years.

I might add that there are hundreds of employees on active pay roll in these factories who are practical pensioners, still assigned to insignificant and unimportant factory duties. These are in addition to many others on actual voluntary company pension lists. This does not indicate a failure to reward the past services of employees.

Manufacturers in these communities without thought of reward or public approbation have given privately of their money and time and human sympathy to help their individual workers. I know of hundreds of cases of employers helping to solve personal problems of employees or giving material aid in home financing, and even advice in domestic relations. No barriers must ever be erected to interrupt this human relationship between the employee and the employer.

Confidence is not to be established or maintained by putting in control organizations dissociated from management, responsible neither to the public, to the stockholders or owners, to the workers, to the consumer, to the Government, nor to the community in which problems arise; and virtually have the taxing power of government, through persuasion, threats and coercion, and who are avowedly apprehensive of their own abiilty to restrain the activities of their members.

The provisions of the bill would not equalize the bargaining power of the parties affected. It would confer upon one of the parties, namely the labor union, a monopolistic power which would stimulate strikes, disputes, and dangerous disturbances in industry, and load the dockets of the Federal courts. The independent workman would lose the very status which has been his pride. He would lose his present legally recognized right to choose his own method of contracting. He would be regimented into an organization, which, at any peak of its existence, has only been able to entice, influence, or force into its ranks less than 10 percent of the Nation's wage earners.

There are innumerable other reasons why this bill should receive unfavorable report from this committee. Chief among them is that this bill, if enacted into law, would give to a Federal board of three men greater power to regulate and control the operation of private industry and the employer-employee relationship in individual plants, than that enjoyed or exercised by any form of government other than a dictatorship.

We protest it as being unnecessary, unsound, and, we believe, unconstitutional.

MANUFACTURERS' ASSOCIATION OF HARTFORD COUNTY,
SIDNEY E. CORNELIUS, Manager.

Hartford, Conn., March 1935.

STATEMENT ON BEHALF OF THE MANUFACTURERS AND EMPLOYERS ASSOCIATION OF SOUTH DAKOTA, PROTESTING AGAINST THE PROPOSAL KNOWN AS "THE WAGNER LABOR DISPUTES BILL"

The Manufacturers and Employers Association of South Dakota, with headquarters in Sioux Falls, S. Dak., numbers among its membership the major industrial activity of the State, and includes operations such as mining, flour milling, packing, quarrying, woodworking, sheet-metal processing, printing, etc., as well as baking.

This statement regarding the Wagner Labor Disputes bill is made in response to a telegram received from Senator Walsh on March 21 reading:

"Regret because of prolonged hearings last year Committee cannot hear you separately, also National Association of Manufacturers before Committee Thursday presented complete case of all members, but if you wish to supplement that will print brief from you in record."

We do wish to supplement the presentation made by the National Association of Manufacturers by calling to your attention several factors which are the peculiar viewpoint of States industrially small, but with great potentialities for development if labor relations are not warped and hamstrung by the enactment of national legislation predicated on desire for dictatorial powers and control by certain groups.

Our viewpoint is based on certain geographic and economic factors which exist in several other of the Middle and Western States the same as in South Dakota. We refer to geographic isolation and small scattered population which make for small industries and more personal relationship between employer and employee. Geographic differences are seldom recognized in establishing national policies such as proposed in Senate bill 1958. As a specific example we would cite the N. I. R. A., which when applied to this State caused weeks and months of confusion, and necessitated adjustment, exemptions, special dispensations until today in actual operation it is just one mass of confusion. South Dakota has only 16 towns over the 2,500 population figure. There are several hundred smaller than that. With certain rules and regulations effective in only a few towns, and in those towns applied to only a few industries or operations, the lack of uniformity breeds confusion, irritation, and trouble. We believe that would be even more true if the proposed labor disputes bill were in operation.

Industry in South Dakota with a few exceptions has not gone much beyond the stage where the employer calls his men by their first names. He knows when the children have their tonsils out, when the mortgage falls due, when the Johns and Janes in the various families go away to college, when they graduate, and many of the little family personalities which create good will and pleasant relationships. The employee has confidence in the employer and the employer plays fair with the men on his pay rolls. A business must be very large in this State before this relationship is entirely lost.

But when national patterns are built, and new policies written from the viewpoint of those whose contracts have been limited to small areas of industrial activity or to a particular type of labor relationship, any attempt to apply such patterns and policies to regions like that of South Dakota just doesn't work.

There is little labor trouble in South Dakota, we believe because of the relationship existing between employer and employee, but since the enactment of the N. I. R. A., with its 7 (a) we have had agitation and some disputes. It is a fact that this has seldom arisen from irritation inside the plant, but has been caused by outside propaganda.

We are definitely opposed to any legislation which will encourage continued interference with labor relations and especially condemn this bill which establishes as a policy of the United States the encouragement of the closed shop.

We condemn the doctrine of majority rule. It is un-American to insist that if 51 men in a plant decide on a certain plan of action the other 49 must be bound by it. We believe that only that representation which is truly representative of the workers should be recognized, and no shop is going to have employees 100 percent of the same mind. Forcing the minority to abide by the decision of the majority is coercion of the worst kind, and the proponents say that this bill aims to prevent "coercion."

The legalization of the closed shop is contrary to the attitude of mind of both employers and employee found in South Dakota. Less than 1 percent of the employment of this State is organized. There isn't a member of this association who feels that he has a right to demand that the men working for him pay tribute to any organization for the privilege of having that job.

We also object to the list of unfair labor practices where the unfairness is defined entirely as acts of the employer. If such practices are unfair for the employer, they are equally unfair for the employee. If the employee or labor representative is relieved from responsibility, he can through ignorance, prejudice, or lack of judgment jeopardize the jobs of those he presumably represents by unwise action or unreasonable demands. He should be under the same restraint and responsibility that the employer is put under.

More than that, the set-up of the National Labor Relations Board proposed by this bill creates a body with authority exceeding any need or demand. A reading of the powers granted this proposed Board indicates that powers of remote control are to be secured under the false pretense of "protecting commerce."

Proposals such as this will only continue the uncertainty in the employer's mind occasioned by the conflicting administration and interpretation and misunderstanding regarding 7 (a) which is now in the minds of both employers and employees. A concrete evidence of that came up yesterday. An employer who has built one of the major industries of the State called our office with this problem:

"We decided sometime ago to reduce the personnel in one department. The newest man on is, of course, the one we expected to lay off. Today I learn that he is an officer in a small labor group recently organized. Now, if we go ahead as planned will we have to spend the next month proving that he was not discharged for union activities?"

According to Senate bill 1958 the Labor Board as it would be set up could step in and build up a case, have a trial, summon witnesses and create a situation where there was no situation more than a matter of factory routine which could easily be misinterpreted.

It would seem that there is no necessity for such legislation as proposed. Let the industrial States legislate as necessary to protect proper relationships between their employers and employees.

It may be that some States need much more machinery for adequate protection than they have now. If so, encourage that. But do not arbitrarily impose legislation of the nature of the Wagner labor disputes bill on the country as a whole. Drastic reform may perhaps follow recovery but it should not be imposed when it can act only as a handicap to recovery by encouraging an unbalanced employee relationship, and intereference from outside sources.

Compulsory patterns of action are not suited to the widely diversified types of employer-employee relationship existing in the United States today. The type of employee—native and foreign—the type of industry, the living conditions, and numerous other differences make a compulsion such as suggested impractical. The Wagner labor disputes bill would tend to keep in a turmoil the very situations which it is aimed to alleviate.

BRIEF OF THE MANUFACTURERS ASSOCIATION OF CONNECTICUT, INC.

PRESENTATION

The Manufacturers Association of Connecticut, Inc., before the date of hearings on Senate bill 1958 were called, asked for an opportunity to be heard. On March 21 officers of the association were notified by the Chairman of the Committee on Education and Labor, Senator David I. Walsh, as follows:

"Regret because of prolonged hearings last year committee cannot hear you separately, also National Association of Manufacturers before committee Thursday presented complete case of all members; but if you wish to supplement that, will print brief from you in record."

In compliance with that telegram, we herewith submit the opinion of the manufacturers of the State of Connecticut in regard to Senate bill 1958.

QUALIFICATION

The Manufacturers Association of Connecticut, Inc., is made up of a membership of practically all of the manufacturers in the State of Connecticut of any importance both large and small. The association has been in continuous existence since 1815, becoming incorporated in 1910. Without exception, all members of the association are operating under so-called "codes of fair competition" which include, in accordance with the National Industrial Recovery Act, the wording of section 7 (a) of that act. They, consequently, have had full opportunity to know the operation of that section of their respective codes and to know of the decisions that have been rendered by local, district, and Federal labor boards. They have reviewed the detailed provisions of the so-called "Wagner labor-disputes bill." They have viewed it in light of the Wagner labor-disputes bill of last year.

OBJECTIONS TO THE BILL

Even though there has been an evident attempt to soften the provisions of the original Wagner labor-disputes bill, the manufacturers of the State of Connecticut are convinced that its principal purpose is to unionize the employees of their plants under the single banner of the American Federation of Labor and its affiliates. The bill can do nothing other than strengthen the inequitable decisions of the boards referred to, many of which have already been rejected by the courts. The bill ignores the fact that the great majority of acts of illegal coercion and intimidation are exercised by representatives of labor unions, and that the rights of employers must be subjugated to the alleged rights of union members.

The creation of a permanent Federal labor board of three members, with full authority to set up multitudinous district and local boards, and to authorize such boards to call before them any whom they desired, upon very short notice, would leave employers without the small rights which they now have in refused to be hamstrung, coerced, and intimidated.

As we believe has been pointed out by others in the instant hearing, the power to call employers to answer any charge which might be made against them shall not be affected under the bill by any means of adjustment that has been or may be established by an agreement, code, law, or otherwise. In other words, the bill would nullify any legislation which might hereafter be enacted. Under the bill, the country can and undoubtedly would be littered with agents of the various boards created. Agents would have general and broad authority to investigate so-called "unfair practices" and enter upon any sort of fishing expedition. In other words, an army of "snoopers" would be developed who could very easily "make trouble if they did not find it." This fear cannot be unfounded, if we are to profit by the experience gained under the operation of the present law, Executive orders, and administrative orders.

The bill would grant a general and broad authority of subpena enforced by proceedings for contempt through the district courts of the United States. Unfair labor practices are those relationships with labor which the "snoopers" and their informers determine in their own minds to be unfair.

We believe that there is grave danger of political control because of the method of appointment and the expiration of terms of individual members. We believe that the power of the board to make its own rules and regulations, which it may rescind or amend at will, will lead to even greater abuses than those under which industry has been operating through the permission granted under the N. I. R. A. for unlimited and uncontrollable Executive and administrative orders. Industry cannot continue to operate under executive legislation. In its hearings, the board is not governed by the rules of evidence, the employer has not right to cross-examine the witnesses, and yet the board, without attempting to sustain its findings or prove its case by evidence, may have its findings of facts made conclusive. In other words, the board is at one time an investigating body, a prosecuting agency, a court, and an enforcer of its own opinions and its own findings. In making its findings, it can, and it will, find only against the employer. Anyone who has analyzed the decisions of the present boards can have no doubt of that outcome.

Under the bill, it is only the employer who can be guilty of unfair labor practices. The company union is an unfair labor practice. The employer is unfair and will be convicted in many cases under misinterpretations if he interferes with the formation of any sort of a labor organization within his plant. If he takes any part in the formation of any employee-group, or if he renders such a group any financial or other support, he is guilty of practicing unfairly. The bill is obviously and certainly an involuntary closed union-shop contract imposed upon employers. The provision of the bill stating that "representatives designated or selected for the purpose of collective bargaining by the majority of the employees in a unit appropriate for such purposes, shall be the exclusive representatives of all the employees in such unit for the purposes of collective bargaining" gives clear evidence of the indisputable fact that the Federal Government under the domination of union labor seeks to act as the membership forcer of organized labor. The so-called "majority rule" has not been sustained by the courts. One of the purposes of the bill, therefore, is to set aside the existing decisions so that a breathing space may be secured for further application of the iniquitous rule.

Under the bill, the board has full power to decide whether in order to effectuate the policy of the proposed act the unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining shall be the employee unit, craft unit, plant unit, or other unit. The various boards have already conceived unbelievable plans to effectuate the closed-union-shop policy, but they have not, to our knowledge, conceived such a direct method of districting for election purposes as is provided for in this section of the bill. The Federal Government may aid the unions in the creation of horizontal or vertical unions in such a manner as to best suit the purposes of labor leaders to the detriment of nonunion workers, investors, management, and the public. Union labor still has its right to strike. That right we do not question. That equal rights for the use of defensive weapons should, in justice, be given to employers ought not to be questioned. Of the constitutional questions involved in the bill, little need be said. The drafters know of its unconstitutionality. Regulation of hours of labor, as well as a regulation of all employment relationships in manufacturing establishments is intrastate in character and cannot be made otherwise. Any attempt to make it otherwise by Federal enactment is merely an attempt to stall for time with the hope that the ulterior motives will be accomplished before cases can be adjudicated.

The author of the bill, the President of the United States, the Administrator of the National Industrial Recovery Act, and other representatives of the President, have repeatedly, in public statements, written and spoken, given full assurance to management that section 7 (a), and the board decisions that have arisen out of that section, did not mean what organized labor has interpreted them to mean, and yet labor's interpretation has been written throughout the Wagner labor disputes bill.

The public, who have paid the bill incident to the operation of the N. I. R. A., who have met the ever-increasing costs of unprecedented labor unrest, and whose lives and fortunes have been endangered, recognizes inequalities in the bill. Industrial management cannot live under it. The great army of workers, who see coercion, intimidation and loss of work time, do not want it. Investors know that labor unrest, with resultant loss of savings, is inevitable if the bill is enacted.

The bill on its present basis cannot be amended to protect the rights of the public, the workers, the investors, and managements. It ought to be rejected by all Members of Congress who have given any thought to the causes of the continuance of the depression.

Brief of Manufacturing Chemists' of the United States Contra Wagner Labor Disputes Bill

Industry opposes the Wagner labor disputes bill upon the same fundamental grounds urged against the measure that was introduced in the Senate last year (S. 2926, 73d Cong., 2d sess.); namely, that it is invalid in law and unsound as to policy and method.

In the face of the criticism directed against its predecessor, some of which even its distinguished sponsor admitted was justifiable, it seemed reasonable to anticipate that if similar legislation were again put forward it would be more temperate in substance, more reasonable in form, and more inclined toward cooperation than coercion.

However, the drastic and arbitrary provisions of the present measure are eloquent of how vain and unfounded was such a hope. Little apparent attempt has been made to meet and overcome the objections raised to the original proposal. On the contrary, the proponents seem to have been impelled to expand and extend many of the most objectionable features of the earlier bill; and, at the same time to introduce certain new and no less unreasonable additions. Consequently, all the old objections apply to the instant bill with increased force.

The major premise of this proposed legislation, its justification—one might almost say, its slogan—is "equality of bargaining power." This is an excellent catch phrase, and one well designed to attract favorable attention and secure immediate and universal support. But where is the evidence of all this equality which the bill declares to be its policy and its object of attainment, and which is so constantly stressed by its proponents? A reading of the bill discloses no equality. It speaks of the rights of employees and the obligations of the employers, but is silent respecting the obligations of employees and the rights of employers.

Employees are granted "the right to self-organization", to "bargain collectively", and to "engage in concerted activities." The right to strike is expressly guaranteed, without any limitation or restriction whatever. One searches vainly for any enumeration of the corresponding obligations that should accompany such rights. There is no requirement that the form of organization adopted by employees be such as to insure its legal responsibility. This has been advocated by no less an authority than Mr. Justice Brandeis (See Business—A Profession, Brandeis, p. 94), and was called to the attention of the distinguished sponsor of the present bill when its predecessor was before the Senate Committee on Education and Labor (Record of Hearings, S. 2926, p. 342). It seems impossible that so important a feature could have been inadvertently omitted from the present measure.

During the past 18 months the country has been torn by industrial strife of a bitterness almost unparalleled in our history. Strike followed strike with tremendous rapidity—each accompanied by threats, intimidation, molestation, and violence to persons and property. We think the question may well be asked, Would not the enactment of this bill not only guarantee the right to strike but also invite strikes?

Our history of industrial relations generally follows and parallels that of England. England has preceded us in the enactment of legislation dealing with industrial relations, collective bargaining, and trade disputes. The benefit of their knowledge and experience is available to us. Why, may we ask, have not the proponents of this bill availed themselves of that knowledge and experience? The right to strike was also recognized in England, but at the same time precautions were taken to provide against the certain adverse results of such activities. Why have not the proponents of the present bill inserted provisions designed to secure equality and protection similar to those of the British Trade Disputes and Trade Unions Act? In the absence of such provisions, deemed necessary by the experience of another great nation, where is the equality of bargaining power extolled in the declaration of policy of the present measure?

In further pursuit of the attainment of this equality of bargaining power, the bill defines, in four categories, "unfair labor practices", when engaged in by an employer. There is no definition of, and no prohibition against, unfair labor practices by employees or organizations of employees. It would seem impossible that in the midst of so much emphasis on equality, such an omission could be deliberate. Yet the same omission was called to the attention of the sponsors of the bill during the course of the hearings on its predecessor (S. 2926, 73d Cong., 2d sess.), and it was admitted (pp. 348, 366, Record of Hearings, S. 2926) that intimidation or coercion "when it comes from any source, either a trade organization, or a company union, or an employer, ought to be made an unfair labor practice."

It was likewise admitted (p. 373, Record of Hearings, S. 2926) that certain types of strikes were unjustified and should not exist. But we search vainly in the instant measure for any limitation or restriction of the right to strike.

It has been said repeatedly by the proponents of the bill that it is not its object to outlaw "company unions", but merely "company-dominated unions." As a practical matter, however, under the language of the bill descriptive of unfair labor practices, it becomes impossible for an employer to cooperate with his employees in the formation or maintenance of an employees' organization without subjecting himself to the charge that he is "coercing", "dominating", or "interfering" with them. Yet there is no restriction against interference, domination, or coercion of employees by an outside labor organization. We contend that in permitting such a situation to obtain, the bill is unfair, unsound, and unjust.

Two of the most significant features of the measure are the provisions found in section 9 (a) and (b). Subsection (a) of section 9 provides that—

"Representatives designated or selected for the purposes of collective bargaining by the majority of the employees, in a unit appropriate for such purposes, shall be the exclusive representatives of all the employees in such unit for the purposes of collective bargaining * * *"

Subsection (b) of section 9 provides that—

"The Board shall decide whether, in order to effectuate the policy of this act, the unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining shall be the employer unit, craft unit, plant unit, or other units."

Minorities are ignored. They are bound by the action of the majority in their unit. And it is for the National Labor Relations Board, created by the bill, to designate what that unit shall be. Thus 100 percent of a particular employer's employees might form an organization for the purpose of bargaining collectively with him, and he might be prohibited from recognizing or dealing with them because the Board had designated a craft unit or some "other unit" of which they were not members, or with which they did not desire to affiliate themselves, as the "exclusive representatives of all the employees in such unit." It is difficult to imagine a situation more unfair, unjust, and socially unsound; more restrictive of the freedom of contract; more subversive of individual rights; and more productive of discord, misunderstanding, bitterness, and strife.

Under the terms of this bill the employees composing these minorities will become a new class of "forgotten men." They will be compelled to labor under terms relating to wages, hours, and conditions of labor imposed by others without their consent. They may be forced to join organizations with which they do not desire to affiliate. We do not think that the Constitution sanctions the imposition by Federal enactment of "majority rule" of this sort. In fact the Supreme Court has already condemned such legislation. In Adair v. United States (208 U. S. 161), the court said (p. 174):

"While, as already suggested, the right of liberty and property guaranteed by the Constitution against deprivation without due process of law is subject to such reasonable restraints as the common good or the general welfare may require, it is not within the functions of government—at least in the absence of contract between the parties—to compel any person, in the course of his business and against his will, to accept or retain the personal services of another, or to compel any person, against his will, to perform personal services for another. The right of a person to sell his labor upon such terms as he deems proper is, in its essence, the same as the right of the purchaser of labor to prescribe the conditions upon which he will accept such labor from the person offering to sell it. * * * In all such particulars the employer and the employee have equality of right, and any legislation that disturbs that equality is an arbitrary interference with the liberty of contract which no government can legally justify in a free land. * * *."

Furthermore, what precisely is meant by the phrase "majority of employees in a unit" who are to select the representatives for purposes of collective bargaining? Does it mean a plurality of the votes cast at an election for the purposes of choosing representatives; or a majority of the votes cast by those voting, but less than a majority of all the employees in the unit; or does it mean an actual majority of all the employees in the unit whether voting or not? How are official representatives to be selected when several groups in the particular unit support different candidates and refuse to yield? If representatives are successfully elected and "certified" by the Board, must the employer recognize and attempt to reach an agreement with them? Assuming the employer refuses to recognize the certified representatives or bargain with them, will the Board attempt to force him to do so on the ground that his refusal amounts to an unfair labor practice?

These questions provide a most fruitful field for endless dispute, misunderstanding and litigation. If this is the "clarification" of section 7 (a) that labor has been assured the bill will bring about, then labor is doomed to suffer a crushing disappointment.

The procedure provided for the hearing and adjudication of charges of unfair labor practice constitutes a most unusual example of judicial process. Whenever there is a charge, or the Board "shall have reason to believe" that any person has engaged or is engaging in an unfair labor practice, it has the power to cause a complaint to be filed stating the charges and containing a notice of hearing at a "place" therein fixed "not less than 3 days after the serving of the complaint." Within these 3 days the defendant is supposed to digest the complaint, prepare his answer thereto, secure his witnesses, and transport them to the place of hearing. When he arrives he may discover that the complaint has been amended to include charges against which he is not prepared to defend himself. In fact, during the hearing, or at any time thereafter before making its order respecting the case, the Board, which serves in the triple capacity of prosecutor, judge, and jury, may amend the complaint without notice to the defendant and without granting him any further opportunity to be heard. The Board in conducting its proceedings is not bound by any of the rules of evidence. Its orders may be based on evidence consisting of hearsay, supposition, and conjecture. In the event of an appeal it is provided that the Board's findings of fact supported by such "evidence" shall be conclusive. Is this the "due process of law" guaranteed by the fifth amendment to the Constitution?

If on the basis of the testimony taken the Board is of the opinion that the defendant is guilty of an unfair labor practice, it may issue an order to cease and desist therefrom and, without the intervention of a jury, award damages in the nature of "restitution" in order to "effectuate the policies" of the bill. A more flagrant violation of the seventh amendment is hard to imagine.

Section 13 of the bill possesses great potentialities for persecution, oppression, and general mischief making. It grants the Board and its agents power to investigate and copy the records of any person being proceeded against "at all reasonable times." The attendance of witnesses and the production of records in the course of such investigation may be required, on subpena, from any place in the United States or any of its territories or possessions. This investigatory and inquisitorial power may be exercised in connection with any controversy relating to the presentation of, or disputes with, employees. The section seems designed to further encourage the sort of snooping by a Federal agency which has already been vigorously condemned by the United States Supreme Court.

The entire authority of the National Labor Relations Board is predicated on the assumption that the relations between an employer and his employees "affect" interstate commerce, and that the regulation of such relations by Congress is consequently justified under the power granted it by the Constitution to regulate interstate commerce. This assumption and attempted regulation is made in the face of a long and consistent line of decisions of the United States Supreme Court from Coe v. Erroll (116 U. S. 517), down through United Mine Workers v. Coronado Coal Co. (259 U. S. 344) and United Leather Workers v. Herkert (265 U. S. 457) to the recent lower court decision in the Weirton case, holding that production and all the incidents in connection therewith, including the relations between an employer and his employees, are matters within the control of the several States and do not affect interstate commerce to the extent that the intervention of Congress is justified.

In United Leather Workers v. Herkert, supra, the court said (p. 464):

"The sole question here is whether a strike against manufacturers by their employees, intended by the strikers to prevent, through illegal picketing and intimidation, continued manufacture, and having such effect, was a conspiracy to restrain interstate commerce under the antitrust act because such products, when made, were, to the knowledge of the strikers, to be shipped in interstate commerce to fill orders given and accepted by would-be purchasers in other States, in the absence of evidence that the strikers interfered or attempted to interfere with the free transport and delivery of the products, when manufactured, from the factories to their destination in other States, or with their sale in those States.

"We think that this question has already been answered in the negative by this Court. In United Mine Workers v. Coronado Coal Co. (259 U. S. 344, 66 L. ed. 975, 27 A. L. R. 762, 42 Sup. Ct. Rep. 570), a coal-mining company in Arkansas changed its arrangement with its employees from a closed shop to an open shop. The local union resented the change and the avowed purpose of the company to protect nonunion employees by armed guards. Violence, murder, and arson, were resorted to by the union. Seventy-five percent of the output of the mine was to be shipped out of the State, and a car of coal prepared for interstate shipment was destroyed by the mob of strikers and their sympathizers. It was contended that, as the result of the conspiracy was to reduce the interstate shipment of coal from the mines by 5,000 tons or more a week, this conspiracy was directed against interstate commerce, and triple damages for the injury inflicted could be recovered under the Federal antitrust law. But this court held otherwise, and reversed judgment for a large amount on the ground that the evidence did not disclose a conspiracy against interstate commerce, justifying recovery under the law."

If, as the court declares, the violence, destruction of property, and prevention of the manufacture of goods, which sometimes grow out of and result from the relations between employers and employees, only remotely and indirectly affect commerce, how can it be maintained that the original relations themselves and the acts of the parties in leading up to such relations affect commerce to such an extent as to constitutionally justify Federal regulation? We contend that it cannot, and that in attempting to do so the bill is clearly unconstitutional.

Viewed as a whole, the bill cannot attain the objects which it seeks to accomplish. On the contrary it will, if enacted, inevitably result in misunderstanding, suspicion, bitterness, disillusionment, and industrial strife. Industrial recovery will be hampered and the development of cooperative and sympathetic relations between employers and employees will be most seriously impeded. We reiterate, therefore, our contention that the bill is unsound in policy and invalid in law.

Respectfully submitted.

MANUFACTURING CHEMISTS' ASSOCIATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
By WARREN N. WATSON, Secretary.

STATEMENT SUBMITTED BY MUSKEGON EMPLOYERS ASSOCIATION

To the Committee on Education and Labor of the United States Senate:

On March 9, last, this association wired Senator David I. Walsh, chairman of your committee, asking your committee for time when a representative of industry in western Michigan might be heard in opposition to Senate bill 1958, known as "Wagner labor disputes bill." Your committee, through its clerk, advised us that our request to appear had been listed and we would be advised later as to time.

Under date of March 19, having heard nothing further, we again wired your committee requesting that you set time for us to appear. On March 21 we were advised by Senator Walsh that we could not be heard separately, but that your committee would be glad to receive a brief from us. We are, therefore, taking this means of recording with you our opposition to this bill.

At the very outset we desire to state that we are authorized to represent some 90 industrial concerns employing upward of 30,000 employees. These industrial companies are located throughout the manufacturing centers of western Michigan, including cities of South Haven, Holland, Grand Haven, Kalamazoo, Grand Rapids, and Muskegon.

In addition to the above we are authorized to speak for the Muskegon branch of National Metal Trades Association, the Greater Muskegon Chamber of Commerce, the Metal Manufacturers' Association of Grand Rapids, Grand Rapids branch of the National Metal Trades Association, and the Grand Haven Chamber of Commerce.

On behalf of the various associations and industrial concerns whom we represent, we desire to protest most strenuously against the passage of this bill.

Under section 8 of this proposed bill it is declared to be unlawful for employers "to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in section 7." The rights referred to in section 7 are "the right of self-organization, to form, join, or assist labor organizations to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing and to engage in concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection."

Under paragraph 3 of section 2 the term "employee" is defined as including "any employee, and shall not be limited to the employees of a particular employer unless the act explicitly states otherwise."

Construing the language of section 8, above referred to, in the light of the definition of an employee as set forth in paragraph 3 of section 2, it must mean that any employee of any employer will be given the lawful right to "assist" labor organization by sympathetic strikes, picketing, boycotting, and by any other means which might come under the head of "concerted activities."

The National Labor Relations Board now in existence has already held that in accordance with the provisions of section 7 (a) of the National Industrial Recovery Act there can be no bargaining unless a contract results. The language above quoted must therefore be taken to mean that employees have the right to force their employers to "bargain" with their representatives.

Paragraph 2 of section 8 provides that it shall be unfair labor practice for an employer "to dominate or interfere with the formation or administration of any labor organization or contribute financial or other support to it."

Our understanding is that Senator Wagner, the author of this bill, has claimed that it is not the purpose of the bill to make unlawful various plant organizations now in existence. Decisions of the National Labor Relations Board have already been made which in effect hold that plant organizations are unlawful. To our way of thinking, the words "dominate or interfere with" must be construed in line with these decisions and have for their purpose the outlawing of plant organizations.

Paragraph 3 of section 8 provides that it shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer "by discrimination in regard to hire or tenure of employment or any term or condition of employment to encourage or discourage membership in any labor organization: Provided, That nothing in this act, or in the National Industrial Recovery Act, as amended from time to time, or in any code or agreement approved or prescribed thereunder, or in any other statute of the United States, shall preclude an employer from making an agreement with a labor organization * * * to require as a condition of employment membership therein, if such labor organization is the representative of the majority of the employees in the appropriate collective-bargaining unit covered by such agreement when made."

Under this language an employer could be compelled to execute what is commonly known as a "closed-shop" agreement with any labor organization which represents a majority of the employees. The practical effect of this paragraph is to make it almost impossible for the employee to have any direct relations with his employer. The employer would at all times be under the constant threat that he has "encouraged" or "discouraged" membership in a labor organization and that he has discriminated by so doing.

Paragraph 4 of section 8 provides that it shall be an unfair practice for an employer "to discharge or otherwise discriminate against an employee because he has filed charges or given testimony under this act." This provision leaves the door wide open for any employee to file any charge whatsoever, no matter how fanciful it may be, without any fear of the consequences. It permits him to give any testimony that he may desire in any hearing without any regard to the truth and with no fear of consequences. An unscrupulous employee could run down his employer's business. He could make any remarks concerning his employer that he chose. He could undermine the morale and make the maintenance of discipline in the employer's plant absolutely impossible with no fear of the consequences to himself.

At no place in the bill is any attempt made to make it unlawful for any labor organization directly, or through its agents or servants, to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in section 7. The paid labor organizer is permitted to do anything that he chooses to gain his ends. He may threaten, he may make extravagent statements, he may make rash and impossible promises, he may even incite and encourage physical violence, without any fear of prosecution or punishment for himself or the organization which he represents, under the provisions of this act.

Section 9, subdivision a, of the bill attempts to enact into law the now famous decision of the National Labor Relations Board in the Houde Engineering case, namely, the majority rule. This section provides that "representatives designated or selected for the purposes of collective bargaining by the majority of the employees in a unit appropriate for such purposes shall be the exclusive representatives of all the employees in such unit for the purposes of collective bargaining in respect to rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, or other basic conditions of employment."

The right of any individual employee to bargain for himself is taken from him. It would become unlawful for an employer to make any contract or agreement with any group of employees if that group were not in the majority. It makes it unlawful for any employer to enter into any contract or agreement with any individual employee. The only right that is preserved to the minority or to the individual is to "present grievances" to their employer through representatives of their own choosing, but under the terms of the act itself such grievances cannot be enforced in respect to rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, or other basic conditions of employment. In other words, grievances concerning dark stairways, lack of heat, poor ventilation, or similar things of a more or less minor character could be brought up by the minority, but the principal and basic conditions affecting the relationship of employer and employee could only be discussed through representatives of the majority.

We submit that the Congress should never attempt to pass a law which would take away from the individual employee his rights to bargain for himself in all matters pertaining to wages, hours, and basic conditions of his employment. We make the positive statement that the vast majority of the workers in this country desire to retain and insist upon retaining this right to themselves. As proof of this statement we respectfully call the attention of this committee to the results of the elections that were but recently had under the jurisdiction of the automobile board in the automotive industry. The vast majority of those employees participating in those elections stated in their secret ballots that they desired to represent themselves as individuals. If this bill were to be enacted into law, the unfortunate employee who happened to be working in some plant, or a unit of that plant, which was controlled by the American Federation of Labor, or some other labor organization, would find himself in the position of where he must either join the union or seek work in some other plant.

This would inevitably result in forcing more men out of work and increasing our welfare rolls. If this bill is enacted into law it must also follow that under this section the majority, no matter how much majority might be acquired, would have the sole and exclusive power to sell the labor of the minority at such prices and on such terms as it might see fit.

Every industrial plant affected thereby would automatically become a "closed shop" under the sole domination and control of that organization having as members the majority of the employees. Whether the influence and domination of that organization is good or bad would make no difference. So long as it retains the majority it absolutely controls the policy of that plant. It is also true that majority once obtained would never be lost unless the plant closed its doors, because no employee could work in that plant unless he became a member of the organization controlling such majority.

The bill further provides that a new National Labor Relations Board shall be established. This Board is to be perpetual and is given exclusive power to prevent those things declared by the bill to be unlawful. Under its provisions if any employer should be found guilty of any conduct declared by the bill to be unlawful, this National Labor Relations Board is given the power to issue "cease and desist orders" which would immediately become effective even though such employer conceives himself to be aggrieved and appeals therefrom to the Circuit Court of Appeals. Such an order would remain in effect unless a stay was granted by specific court order. Even in that event the findings of fact as determined by the Board, if there is any evidence whatever to support such findings, would be conclusive and final and not subject to reversal or modification by the courts.

The Board is given absolute authority to make, amend, and rescind such rules and regulations as it deems necessary to carry out the purposes of the act, and is given powers to investigate all of the affairs of any employer even to the extent of examining documents and reports that may have been made by such an employer to some other governmental department under the absolute pledge of secrecy.

Penalties for violations of any of the provisions of the proposed act are fixed by fine or by imprisonment. Under its provisions no industrial employer within the confines of this country would be free to operate his business as the best interests of himself and his employees might require. Nor would any employee ever again be free to fix the terms upon which his personal labor might be sold.

We firmly believe that a lasting prosperity in this country can never be obtained until industry is permitted to operate its business for the benefit of its employees, its stockholders, and itself without such governmental interference as is contemplated by the provisions of this act.

Every industry of the United States would be placed under the domination and control of the National Labor Relations Board and the American Federation of Labor if this bill should become law.

On behalf of those whom we represent we most strenuously protest against its passage and urge an unfavorable report by your committee.

Respectfully submitted.

MUSKEGON EMPLOYERS ASSOCIATION,
By L. H. SESSIONS, Attorney.

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF FINISHERS OF TEXTILE FABRICS,
New York, March 27, 1935.

Re: National Labor Relations Act, Wagner bill, S. 1958.

DAVID I. WALSH,
Chairman Senate Committee on Education and Labor.

MY DEAR SENATOR: We are forwarding herewith to each member of your honorable committee a statement prepared on behalf of the members of the National Association of Finishers of Textile Fabrics in opposition to the above bill.

This bill has been considered in meetings of the members of this association and this brief has been carefully prepared and this opposition statement is being submitted only after reaching the deliberate conclusion that the form of regulation provided by this bill will not be in the interest of the finishers and their employees.

We trust that this brief will be read by your honorable committee and given such consideration as we believe it merits.

Respectfully submitted.

ALBERT L. SCOTT, President.

STATEMENT ON BEHALF OF THE MEMBERS OF THE NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF FINISHERS OF TEXTILE FABRICS IN OPPOSITION TO THE PENDING NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS ACT TO CREATE A NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD

This statement, in opposition to this bill, is submitted on behalf of the members of the National Association of Finishers of Textile Fabrics. A list of the members of this association is annexed.

The number of employees directly engaged in this finishing branch of the textile industry is in excess of 40,000. The various finishing plants are located almost entirely in the New England and Southeastern States, and vary in size, some employing a small number of employees, others a greater number, and in some instances from one to several thousand employees. Depending upon the location of the particular plant, the customs and habits of the employees, and all the surrounding circumstances, different methods of dealing with employment conditions, individually and collectively, have been used. These methods, developed through a long period of years, with great care and much expense, have adequately safeguarded the welfare of all the employees in every way. Problems affecting employment relations have been amicably and satisfactorily considered and determined, fairly and equitably to all interested parties. Whatever controversies or disturbances have arisen in this branch of the finishing industry concerning labor conditions did not originate from within this finishing industry. Almost invariably they came about through strife and discord outside the ranks of these cotton finishers, and the efforts of others, not employed by these finishers, to raise issues having no merit, and which if they had had any merit could have been speedily, amicably, and satisfactorily adjusted by these finishing employees and employers themselves.

This proposed bill has been carefully considered and the cotton textile finishers are unanimously opposed to its passage for the reasons herein generally and specifically stated.

BASIC REASONS FOR OPPOSITION

This bill is legally invalid. Its provisions cannot be reconciled with any of the decisions of the United States Supreme Court interpreting those phases of the Federal Constitution defining and limiting the powers of Congress in matters relating to commerce, impairment or limitation of the freedom of contract, reasonable search and seizure, deprivation of property without due process, fair trial by a jury, preservation of State rights and powers, and the general welfare.

The bill is unsound in theory and incapable of practical application. It is based upon irreconcilable and contradictory ideas and terms, such as compulsory collective bargaining. It seeks to outlaw certain acts and conduct on the part of employers, and such acts are condemned in terms not susceptible of definite ascertainment or specific performance and enforcement, except, if legal, that they can be enforced through an arbitrary decision of the Labor Board, whose decisions are to be final and conclusive on the facts, put into a record where rules of evidence to insure a fair trial need not be applied nor followed. The employer could not at any time know in advance whether he was acting in accordance with or in violation of this proposed law. He and his employees, who might not approve of the principles advocated by the representatives of the majority of employees, are deprived of virtually all freedom in dealing with employment conditions. The declaration of policy declares in favor of "full freedom", by the worker, of association, self-organization, and designation of representatives of his own choosing for collective bargaining. The bill specifically limits that "full freedom" and individual choosing by subjecting the freedom and judgment of employers and minority employees to the dictates of the representatives of the majority of the employees. The Board has the power to determine which organized unit shall be recognized for purposes of collective bargaining, and under its own rules of procedure may certify what representatives have been designated or selected.

The declaration of policy in section 1 of the bill does not contain an accurate statement of the true contents and full purport of the provisions of the bill itself. They are in conflict. It is not merely a measure to establish and preserve equality of opportunity in bargaining through the protection of the right to fairly and freely organize. It is not simply an attempt to compel parties to negotiate (bargain) collectively; in operation it is designed to force the making of agreements. The unfair labor practices apply only to the employer; no conduct of employees or their organization, as regards their interfering, restraining other employees in associating, and organizing for collective bargaining purposes and selecting their own representatives is defined as fair or condemned as unfair.

The bill would not equalize the bargaining power of the respective parties. It would not promote the free flow of interstate commerce but would engender strife and discord and create a fertile field for endless litigation. It undertakes to apply compulsion where coercion cannot be applied and that too in an illegal manner. In the finishing industry, especially at this time, this bill would do incalculable damage and harm to these employers and employees.

THE FINISHING INDUSTRY

Membership in this finishers' association comprises practically all the plants which finish cotton-textile fabrics. These plants also finish rayon and cotton and rayon mixtures, but this association does not include plants which do not finish cotton fabrics. Since cotton is the principal ingredient of the goods finished, these finishers are referred to as "cotton finishers." They are called

"job finishers" because, to a very large degree, numerically and as regards the yardage finished, the goods are finished for another who is the owner. The gray goods are woven by the mills who sell the gray goods to converters, and who in turn contract with the job finisher to do the finishing. However, some plants are equipped to perform all three functions, weave, finish, and convert, that is, sell the finished goods. "Finishing" includes bleaching, dyeing, mercerizing, printing, etc. Not being the owner of the goods, and merely contracting for the doing of certain work, the job finisher is in constant jeopardy because he cannot control nor regulate his source of supply nor the market conditions of either the raw materials or the finished products. Charges for finishing services are directly affected by the costs of the raw materials, and the prices for the finished fabrics. Competition among finishers is severe because of the surplus plant capacity, and this competition is aggravated by increased operating costs of the mills and converters. Such increased costs on the part of the mills and the converters are not entirely reflected in the prices for the finished articles, but competition all along the line has forced some of them to be absorbed by lowering finishing charges. That is what has happened; it is the condition today; finishing charges are less, on many fabrics, than actual cost.

COMMERCE

The decisions of the United States Supreme Court are unanimous to the effect that factory labor is intrastate commerce and is exclusively within the jurisdiction of the States and not the Federal Government. It is urged that collective bargaining is an instrumentality necessary to provide for the free flow of interstate commerce, and hence within the power of Congress to regulate, under the clause of the Constitution which gives Congress power to regulate interstate commerce. An instrumentality which is a necessary part of interstate equipment and essential to its operation, or an operation which necessarily and substantially affects admittedly interstate transactions, will be regarded as a part of the interstate commerce. But that which is incidental to it, or remote, has been reserved to the States.

The United States Supreme Court, without exception, has said that manufacture and mining are not interstate commerce. The Shreveport case and the so-called "Packers cases" contain nothing to the contrary.

Section 2, paragraphs (6) and (8), of the bill define "commerce" and the term "affecting commerce." These definitions add nothing to the power of Congress. Since Gibbons v. Ogden, decided by Chief Justice John Marshall in 1824, 110 year ago, the Supreme Court has decided innumerable cases involving this same issue as to what "affects" interstate commerce. The character of interstate commerce cannot be changed by adding such a qualifying word. There is nothing bizarrely new in the word "affects" in this connection. To be candid, and in the interest of passing a valid law, one should look askance and with misgivings upon any proposal which plumes itself on novelty, when dealing with the constitutional characteristics of interstate commerce. "Truth changes her garments frequently—like every seemly lady—but underneath the new habit she always remains the same."

Strikes are not new; it is not proposed to outlaw them; nor prevent them by compulsory arbitration or compulsory agreements covering issues out of which a strike might result. It is proposed to induce and limit collective bargaining, and thereby, as claimed, obviate a possible strike or lockout which would possibly prevent continued manufacture. This possible cessation or impairment of manufacture is what the bill vaguely terms as creating "further obstacles to the free flow of commerce", and that the proximate cause is a refusal to negotiate (bargain) collectively and exclusively with designated representatives of a majority of the employees. Certainly, if goods are not produced they cannot later be shipped across State lines. Section 15 of the bill says: "Nothing in this act shall be construed so as to interfere with or impede or diminish in any way the right to strike." That is reassurance in the broadest terms of an existing right. There is nothing about the right to close a plant, yet, if it were done, is there any assurance that the employer would not be charged with "interfering, restraining or coercing employees in the exercise of their rights to organize, choose representatives for collective bargaining and other mutual aid or protection", as an unfair labor practice?

There is no real or well-founded apprehension that there will not be an abundance of goods produced and shipped, if those who are willing to work are permitted to do so without interference. The whole idea about compelling collective bargaining in employment relations to provide for the free flow of commerce, is too remote and speculative to be seriously considered as being a part of the interstate commerce.

This bill is based upon the assumption that the denial of the opportunity to bargain collectively would be the cause of strikes which would interfere with the free flow of interstate commerce by preventing continued manufacture of goods. This is precisely the view adopted by the Federal circuit court of appeals in the United Leather Works International Union v. Herkert et al. (1922) (284 Fed. Rep. 446), but which was reversed by the United States Supreme Court. The conspiracy charged was that by too many pickets, assaults, threats, and intimidation of employees, the plaintiffs were prevented from manufacturing and selling goods in interstate commerce. The Federal circuit court of appeals stated:

"It is contended that because manufacture is not commerce and is not interstate commerce, the restriction or prevention of the manufacture of articles which by interstate commerce contracts and transactions, sellers have agreed to sell, make, transport to, and deliver in other States, and the prevention of existing interstate commerce in such articles in this way is not remediable by Federal courts under the Antitrust Act.

"It is true that manufacture alone is not interstate commerce. But it is equally true that when manufacture becomes an essential part of an indispensable step in the execution of an interstate commerce contract or transaction, or in the continuously flowing current of interstate commerce, as such manufacture was and is in this case, it becomes a part of, or step in, that interstate commerce to such an extent that a Federal court of equity is vested with the power and is subject to the duty to enjoin the execution of a combination or conspiracy to prevent, or practically prevent, the performance of such contracts, or to prevent or drastically restrict such interstate commerce by preventing the manufacture which constitutes one of its indispensable, intermediate steps or parts. While manufacture alone is not interstate commerce, neither is buying or selling, or contracting to buy or sell the goods, or loading or packing or shipping the goods, when considered by itself alone, interstate commerce, yet, each and all of these may become parts of and steps in interstate commerce, and when they shall become the restriction or prevention of these steps, which has the necessarily intended, direct and inevitable effect of stopping or drastically restraining that interstate commerce by the execution of the conspiracy to restrain or destroy it, may be lawfully enjoined by the Federal court.

Upon an exhaustive review of the above decision of the circuit court of appeals, the United States Supreme Court, through Chief Justice Taft, reversed the above decision of the lower court and stated the following (1924) (265 U. S. 457):

"While the bill averred that the defendants had instituted a boycott against the complainants and were prosecuting the same by illegal methods, there was no evidence whatever that any attempt was made to boycott the sale of the complainants' products in other States, or anywhere, or to interfere with their interstate shipments of goods ready to ship.

"The sole question here is whether a strike against manufacturers by their employees, intended by the strikers to prevent, through illegal picketing and intimidation, continued manufacture, and having such effect, was a conspiracy to restrain interstate commerce under the Antitrust Act because such products when made were, to the knowledge of the strikers, to be shipped in interstate commerce to fill orders given and accepted by would-be purchasers in other States, in the absence of evidence that the strikers interfered or attempted to interfere with the free transport and delivery of the products when manufacture from the factories to their destination in other States. or with their sale in those States.

"We think that this question has already been answered in the negative by this Court (citing United Mine Workers v. Coronado Co., 259 U. S. 344).

"This review of the cases makes it clear that the mere reduction in the supply of an article to be shipped in interstate commerce, by the illegal or tortuous prevention of its manufacture, is ordinarily an indirect and remote obstruction to that commerce. It is only when the intent or necessary effect upon such commerce in the article is to enable those preventing the manufacture to monopolize the supply, control its price, or discriminate as between its would-be purchasers that the unlawful interference with its manufacture can be said directly to burden interstate commerce.
